Frank Briscoe Incorporated v. NLRB

637 F.2d 946 (3d Cir.), January 6, 1981—247 NLRB 13

On petition to review Board Order

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, HIGGINBOTHAM, Circuit Judge and SCHWARTZ, District Judge*

947

SEITZ, Chief Judge: Frank Briscoe, Inc. (Briscoe) petitions for review, and the National Labor Relations Board (Board) cross-petitions for enforcement, of an order of the Board. The order of the Board is based on the finding that Briscoe violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) when it refused to recall certain employees because some of them had engaged in protected, concerted activity by filing charges against Briscoe with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). See 247 NLRB No. 6 (1980). We have jurisdiction under 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f) (1976).

I.

Briscoe, a New Jersey corporation engaged in general contracting in the construction industry, was the general contractor for the construction of the multi-million dollar convention center in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Briscoe employed between twenty and fifty ironworkers to work on the convention-center project, the number varying according to the working conditions at a given time. Pursuant to Briscoe's national collective bargaining agreement with the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Workers (Union), the vast majority of these ironworkers were hired through the Union's hiring hall.[1]

During January and February of 1979, production problems plagued the convention-center project. The entire project was shut down during the second week of February because of poor weather conditions. On February 13, 1979, Ironworker Superintendent Jack Godwin informed Union Steward George Cook that certain workers would have to be laid off.

Cook, accompanied by the general foreman, then went to a "shanty" where the ironworkers gathered before work. There, he read the names of twelve ironworkers, including Jeffrey, a trainee, who were to be laid off. According to Cook, he was instructed to tell the men that this was a general layoff, and that they would be recalled.

On February 14 and 16, four of the laidoff ironworkers, including Jeffrey, and a fifth ironworker who had been demoted but not laid off, filed charges of racial discrimination with the EEOC. Each of the five complainants is black. Two of these ironworkers filed charges on February 14, and the other three filed charges on February 16. Briscoe received notice of these charges on February 22 and 23.

After the layoff, each of the eight ironworkers involved in this unfair labor practice suit requested, either at the jobsite or at the Union hiring hall, that he be recalled when Briscoe began rehiring. Mr. Hanna, whose testimony the administrative law judge credited, is the Union's business representative in charge of referring workers to jobs from the hiring hall. He testified that temporarily laid-off ironworkers requesting to be recalled normally would be preferentially referred back to the job. However, Mr. Hanna testified that none of the ironworkers laid off on February 13 were referred back to the convention-center jobsite because he had been told by Briscoe's Job Superintendent that Briscoe "didn't intend to hire the men back and * * * as long as [the] discrimination charges [were] filed with the EEOC, if [Briscoe] did take some of the people back, then there would be definite grounds for discrimination." Mr. Hanna informed those ironworkers who requested to be recalled that he would not refer them back to the jobsite, because Briscoe would not recall any of the workers who had been laid off on February 13 as long as the EEOC charges were pending. According to Mr. Hanna, had it not been for Briscoe's refusal to recall these workers, he would have referred these workers back to the job.

Briscoe began hiring ironworkers again on March 5, hiring twenty-nine workers between that date and April 2. With the sole exception of Jeffrey,[2] none of the ironworkers laid off on February 13 was, or has since been, recalled.

*Hon. Murray M. Schwartz, United States District Judge for the District of Delaware, sitting by designation.

[1] Under the national agreement with the Union, Brisco is not required to hire all its workers directly through the hiring hall, it also may accept on-the-job applications. However, since early March 1979, Briscoe has hired primarily through the hiring hall.

Eight of the workers, including three of the black ironworkers who had filed discrimination charges, brought an unfair labor practice charge against Briscoe for refusing to recall them because some of the workers had filed charges with the EEOC.[3] After conducting the hearing, the administrative law judge found that the black workers who had filed the EEOC charges had engaged in concerted activity protected under section 7 of the NLRB. Further, he found that Briscoe had refused to recall any of the ironworkers laid off on February 13 because some of them had filed EEOC charges. He concluded that this failure to recall the workers violated section 8(a)(1) of the NLRB. The Board affirmed the ruling, findings, and conclusions of the administrative law judge, and adopted his order with one minor modification. Briscoe petitions for review, and the Board cross-petitions for enforcement of this order.

II.

First, Briscoe argues that the record does not support the Board's holding that the ironworkers engaged in protected, concerted activity when they filed discrimination charges with the EEOC. Briscoe also argues that the Board erroneously relied on the "constructive concerted activity" doctrine enunciated in Interboro Contractors, Inc., 157 N.L.R.B. 1295 (1966), enforced 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967), which was rejected by this court in NLRB v. Northern Metal Co., 440 F.2d 881 (3d Cir. 1971).

We have consistently held that to qualify as concerted activity, "it must appear at the very least that [the conduct] was engaged in with the object of initiating or inducing or preparing for group action or that it had some relation to group action in the interest of the employees." Mushroom Transportation Co. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 683, 685 (3d Cir. 1964) (emphasis added). Determining whether particular conduct constitutes "concerted activity" is basically a factual inquiry. See Edward Blankstein, Inc. v. NLRB, 623 F.2d 320, 321 (3d Cir. 1980). We are bound to uphold the Board's determination if it is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f) (1976).

The witnesses who testified before the administrative law judge concentrated on the reasons for Briscoe's refusal to recall the workers laid off on February 13, and thus their testimony is not directed to whether filing the EEOC charges was concerted activity. We believe, however, that the following evidence supports the Board's finding: (1) All five of the EEOC complainants filed charges within three days of the layoff (two of them filed on February 14, and the other three filed on February 16); (2) these complaints are similar in nature; (3) the complaints filed by the two trainees who had been laid off referred to discrimination against other trainees, and a third complaint alleged that the complainant had previously complained that Briscoe discriminated against blacks by not hiring enough trainees, thus indicating that the individual complainants intended to benefit workers other than themselves. Compare Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 1009 (3d Cir. 1980) (employee refusing to work because unsafe conditions endangered not only himself but also other employees engaging in concerted activity) with Northern Metal Co., 440 F.2d 881 (employee attempting to secure holiday pay only for himself not engaging in concerted activity).

Further, the testimony before the administrative law judge contains ample evidence that Briscoe lumped the charges together and viewed "the blacks" as a group with respect to those charges. The evidence that Briscoe clearly knew of the EEOC charges and viewed the complainants as a group distinguishes this case from Tri-State Truck Service v. NLRB, 616 F.2d 65, 71 (3d Cir. 1980) (employer "must have knowledge, or reason to know, that employee activities have coalesced into group action for mutual aid or protection"). After reviewing the record, we are satisfied that there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's determination that the ironworkers engaged in concerted activity by filing the EEOC charges.

[2] Briscoe explains that Jeffrey was laid off on February 13 because of its mistaken impression that the collective bargaining agreement required that all trainees be laid off before any journeyman could be laid off. When Briscoe realized this mistake, it recalled Jeffrey on February 26.

[3] Seven of these workers, including two EEOC complainants, filed the unfair labor practice charge on April 20. An eighth worker, who also had filed an EEOC charge, was added to the unfair labor practice complaint at the beginning of the hearing before the administrative law judge.

Briscoe's argument that the Board impermissibly relied on the Interboro doctrine [4] by adopting the findings of the administrative law judge does not alter our conclusion. Although the administrative law judge cited Interboro, he did so in a footnote in which he correctly rejected Briscoe's contention that filing EEOC charges could benefit only other black workers because success could come only at the expense of the white workers. Further, Interboro was one of five cases cited by the administrative law judge in this footnote, and three of the other cases involved facts showing traditional concerted activity. Therefore, given the context of the reference to Interboro and the other cases cited, we are satisfied that the Board's finding of concerted activity is not based on the "constructive concerted activity" doctrine of Interboro.

Having found that substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that filing the EEOC charges constituted concerted activity, we must examine the Board's conclusion that this activity was protected under section 7. In order to be protected under section 7, the concerted activity must be "for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection." 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). Activities relating to conditions of employment are for "mutual aid or protection." We conclude that concerted activity directed toward ending alleged discriminatory employment practices falls within this standard, and thus deserves protection under section 7, at least as long as it does not violate another important principle of labor law, such as the principle of exclusive representation. See e.g., Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, 420 U.S. 50, 70, 95 S.Ct. 977, 988, 43 L.Ed.2d 12 (1975) (national labor policy embodying principles of nondiscrimination does not require an exception to the exclusivity principles of section 9(a)); United Packinghouse Workers v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 1126, 1135 (D.C. Cir.) ("racially integrated working conditions are valid objects for employee action"), cert. denied sub nom., Farmers' Cooperative Compress v. United Packinghouse Workers, 396 U.S. 903, 90 S.Ct. 216, 24 L.Ed.2d 179 (1969). The record amply supports the conclusion that the EEOC complainants, by seeking to end Briscoe's alleged discriminatory practices against other workers as well as against themselves, were acting for "mutual aid or protection," and thus were protected under section 7.[5]

III.

Next, Briscoe argues that the evidence on the record does not support the Board's finding that Briscoe refused to recall the ironworkers because some of them had filed EEOC charges. After reviewing the testimony presented to the administrative law judge, we are satisfied that substantial evidence supports the finding that Briscoe intended the February 13th layoff to be a temporary cutback because of poor weather, and that it later refused to recall the workers because of the pending EEOC charges. There was ample testimony that the weather at the time of the layoff was extremely poor; that Briscoe told Cook, the Union steward, to tell the laid-off workers that the layoff was temporary and that they would be recalled; and that Mr. Hanna, as well as the workers themselves, believed that the layoff was temporary. In fact, Briscoe's Job Superintendent admitted to the administrative law judge that he had represented to the Pennsylvania unemployment insurance authorities that the employees were laid off because of lack of work and not for cause. There was also ample testimony that Briscoe had informed Mr. Hanna, as well as some of the white workers laid off on February 13, that Briscoe would not recall any of the laid-off workers as long as the charges were pending, and that Briscoe could not recall any of the white workers because, if it did, then it would have to recall the blacks who had filed the EEOC charges.

[4] On appeal, the Board disavows any reliance on Interboro, and concedes that Mushroom Transportation Co. controls the question whether there was concerted activity.

[5] Briscoe also argues that, by relying on the "presumption" of concerted activity derived from the Interboro line of cases, the Board erroneously shifted the burden of proof and required Briscoe to demonstrate the reason for its initial decision to lay off the workers, [illegible] be the issue in each of the EEOC charges. Briscoe thus appears to be arguing that the Board forced it to try the EEOC charges in an unfair labor practice proceeding. We disagree. Any shifting of the burden was not the result of this alleged presumption, but was the result of the Board's demonstrating that Briscoe had retaliated against the protected, concerted activity engaged in by these workers. Any duplication in what Briscoe will try to prove in the EEOC and the Board proceedings derives not from any attempt on the Board's part to try an EEOC charge, but from the fact that Briscoe's alleged nonretaliatory reason for not rehiring the workers, i. e. that they were poor performers, necessarily implicates the reason for the original layoff.

Moreover, a review of the record does not indicate that the evidence in support of the Board's finding is "overborne by evidence calling for contrary inferences." NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 340 U.S. 498, 502, 71 S.Ct. 453, 455, 95 L.Ed. 479 (1951). The job-performance records that Briscoe sought to admit at the hearing to demonstrate poor work performance did not chart the performance of individual ironworkers, but only charted the performance of the four crews. Moreover, the workers who were laid off on February 13 did not all come from one crew. Thus, the job-performance records do not support Briscoe's contention that the ironworkers were laid off because they were poor workers. Therefore, we conclude that the finding of the Board, that Brisco refused to recall the workers because some of them had engaged in protected, concerted activity by filing EEOC charges, is fully supported on the record.

IV.

Finally, Briscoe argues that the only remedy available to the workers for Briscoe's refusal to rehire them in section 704(a) of title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-3(a) (1976) (prohibiting retaliation by an employer when an employee has opposed the employer's discriminatory practices or has participated in any title VII proceeding). We cannot determine whether Briscoe is arguing that the Board erred in finding that filing the EEOC charges was concerted activity protected under section 7, and thus that section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA was not implicated, or that section 704(a) of title VII is the exclusive remedy for retaliation against employees who oppose employer discrimination regardless of whether such opposition may also constitute concerted activity protected under section 7. We have already addressed and rejected the contentions that filing the EEOC charges was not concerted, protected activity, and that the Board erroneously relied on the "constructive concerted activity" doctrine enunciated in Interboro Contractors, Inc., 157 N.L.R.B. 1295, enforce 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967). Thus we will enforce the order of the Board unless section 704(a) of title VII provides the exclusive remedy for the ironworkers here involved.

Nothing in the text of title VII itself addresses the relation between section 704(a) and section 8(a)(1). However, the legislative history of title VII demonstrates that Congress intended to allow an individual to pursue rights independently under both title VII and other applicable statutes, including the NLRA. For example, in response to a suggestion that title VII would adversely affect rights under the labor laws, Senator Clark, one of the sponsors of the bill, introduced an interpretative memorandum that states:

> "Nothing in title VII or anywhere else in this bill affects rights and obligations under the NLRA and the Railway Labor Act. The procedures set up in title VII are the exclusive means of relief against those practices of discrimination which are forbidden as unlawful employment practices by sections 704 and 705. Of course, title VII is not intended to, and does not deny to any individual, rights and remedies which he may pursue under other Federal and State statutes. If a given action should violate both title VII and the [NLRA], the [Board] would not be deprived of jurisdiciton. * * * [T]itle VII would have no effect on the duties of any employer or labor organization * * *, and these duties would continue to be enforced as they are now,"

110 Cong.Rec. 7207 (1964) (emphasis added). In adddition, the Senate defeated an amendment that would have made title VII the exclusive federal remedy for most unlawful employment practices. See 110 Cong.Rec. 13,650–52 (1964). Further when the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972 (EEOA) was enacted, a similar amendment was rejected. See H.R.RepNo.92–238, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 66 (1971) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin. News 1972, p. 2137 (minority views on H.R. 1746 ("charges of discrimination in employment conditions may still be brought under the [NLRA];" "our attempt * * * to make title VII an exclusive remedy * * * was rejected"). The Senate Committee Report on the EEOA provides that neither the "provisions regarding the individuals's right to sue under title VII, nor any of the other provisions of this bill, are meant to affect existing rights granted under other laws." S.Rep.No.92–415, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 24 (1971). Thus the legislative history demonstates the title VII was intended to supplement, not replace, existing methods of combatting employment discrimination. See, e. g. Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., 415 U.S. 36, 48–49, 94 S.Ct. 1011, 1019–20, 39 L.Ed.2d 147 (1974); United Packinghouse Workers v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 1126, 1133–34 n.11 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Farmers' Cooperative Compress v. United Packinghouse Workers, 396 U.S. 903, 90 S.Ct. 216, (1969).

Moreover, judicial interpretation of both title VII and the NLRA supports the conclusion that certain conduct may be protected by both statutes, and thus an employee may resort to the remedies of either statute. For example, in Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 565–66, 98 S.Ct. 2505, 2512–13, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978), the Supreme Court noted that the " 'mutual protection' clause [of section 7] protects employees from retaliation by their employers when they seek to improve working conditions through resort to administrative and judicial forums." The Court then cited with approval several Board cases, including King Soopers, Inc., 22 N.L.R.B. No. 80, 1975–76 N.L.R.B. Dec. (CCH) ¶ 16,631 (1976), in which the Board held that filing EEOC charges was protected, concerted activity, and that section 704(a) did not provide the exclusive remedy for retaliation. See 437 U.S. at 566 n.15, 98 S.Ct. at 2512 n.15 (not addressing question of what may constitute concerted activity). See also Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., 415 U.S. 36, 94 S.Ct. 1011, 39 L.Ed.2d 147 (holding that an employee pursuing a grievance concerning racial discrimination to final arbitration does not forfeit his private cause of action under title VII); Young v. IT&T, 438 F.2d 757, 762 (3d Cir. 1971); United Packinghouse Workers, 416 F.2d 1126. We conclude that, when the Board finds that the conduct of employees constitutes concerted activity protected under section 7, and that the employer has refused to recall a group of employees because some of them were exercising these section 7 rights, the fact that some of the employees[6] also have a remedy under section 704(a) does not deprive the Board of jurisdiction.

We do not believe that the holding of the Supreme Court in Great American Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Novotny, 442 U.S. 366, 99 S.Ct. 2345, 60 L.Ed.2d 957 (1979), is inconsistent with our conclusion. In Novotny, the Court did not consider whether title VII provides the exclusive remedy when the same factual occurrence gives rise to violations of "two 'independent' right," id. at 378, 99 S.Ct. at 2352, which is the issue we address in this case. Instead, the Court held "that § 1985(c) may not be invoked to redress violations of Title VII." Id. Nor do we believe that the Court's holding in Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, 420 U.S. 50, 70, 95 S.Ct. 977, 988, 43 L.Ed.2d 12 (1975), supports Briscoe's suggestion that section 704(a) should be the exclusive remedy even when the employees' conduct is also protected by section 7 of the NLRA. On the contrary, we believe that Emporium Capwell supports our conclusion that section 8(a)(1) protects employee from employer retaliation for engaging in protected, concerted activity even when section 704(a) also provides protection. In Emporium Capwell, the Court held that the national labor policy of nondiscrimination did not protect the decision of a group of minority employees to bypass the grievance procedures of the collective bargaining agreement in favor of attempting to bargain directly with the employer in derogation of the exclusivity principles of section 9(a) of the NLRA. In reaching this conclusion, the Court recognized that "national labor policy embodies the principle of nondiscrimination as a matter of highest priority." Id. at 66, 95 S.Ct. at 986. Moreover, in rejecting the contention that to further this policy an exception should be made to the exclusivity principle, the Court reasoned:

> This argument confuses the employees' substantive right to be free of racial discrimination with the procedures available under the NLRA for securing these rights. Whether they are thought to depend upon Title VII or to have an independent source in the NLRA,[23] they cannot be pursued at the expense of the orderly collective-bargaining process contemplated by the NLRA.

[6] Although Briscoe argues that § 704(a) is the exclusive remedy for all the ironworkers laid off on February 13, it never addresses whether those ironworkers who did not file EEOC charges would have a remedy under tille VII. The record does not disclose whether they also "opposed" Briscoe's alleged racial discrimination and thus would be protected from retaliation by § 704(a). Because we reject Briscoe's contention that § 704(a) provides the exclusive remedy for an employer's retaliatory conduct that also violates § 8(a)(1), we need not address this issue.

Id. at 69, 95 S.Ct. at 988 (emphasis added) (in footnote 23, the Court cited United Packinghouse Workers, 416 F.2d 1126, which held that racially integrated working conditions are valid objects for employee action protected under the NLRA, and that title VII does not provide the exclusive remedy for employment discrimination).

Finally, we emphasize that we are not holding that all conduct protected by section 704(a) is necessarily protected by section 8(a)(1). As the Supreme Court stated in Emporium Capwell, even if section 704(a) protects the employees' conduct, "the same conduct is not necessarily entitled to affirmative protection from the NLRA." 420 U.S. at 71–72, 95 S.Ct. at 989 (emphasis added). On the other hand, when employees engage in concerted activity for mutual aid and protection, which ordinarily would be protected by the NLRA, the mere fact that this concerted conduct was manifested in the form of filing EEOC complaints does not conver the employees' complaint under the NLRA into one exclusively under title VII. Therefore, we hold only that where employees engage in concerted activity protected under section 7, the fact that such conduct also may be protected from retaliation by section 704(a) does not deprive the NLRB of jurisdiction.

V.

We conclude that there is substantial evidence on the record to support the finding of the Board that the workers, by filing the EEOC charges, engaged in concerted activity protected by section 7. We also conclude that substantial evidence supports the finding of the Board that Briscoe intended the February 13 layoff to be temporary, and subsequently did not recall the workers because some of them had filed EEOC charges, thus violating section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA. Further, we find that the Board was not deprived of jurisdiction to remedy Briscoe's retaliation against the workers for exercising their section 7 rights merely because the workers who had filed the charges also could pursue a remedy under section 704(a).

VI.

Briscoe's petition for review of the order of the Board will be denied. The Board's cross-petition for enforcement of the order of the Board will be granted.

Murray M. Schwartz, District Judge, dissenting: I concur in two of the majority's conclusions: 1) that there is substantial evidence in the record to support the Board's finding that Briscoe in refusing to rehire the laid-off ironworkers retaliated against all of them because some had filed EEOC charges; and 2) that filing of charges was "concerted activit[y] * * * for mutual aid or protection * * *." [1] I part company with the majority when it assumes that such activity is protected concerted activity "under Section 7 [of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 157],[2] at least as long as it does not violate another important principle of labor law * * *." (Majority opinion p. 950).

In the instant matter Briscoe is charged with commission of an unfair labor practice under section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1),[3] in that it retaliated against laid-off employees by refusing to rehire because some of their number filed charges with the EEOC. In Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, 420 U.S. 50, 95 S.Ct. 977, 43 L.Ed.2d 12 (1975), the employer was charged with an unfair labor practice under section 8(a)(1) by reason of its retaliatory firing of picketing employees. In that case the employees were assumed to be engaged in concerted activity for the purpose of collective bargaining over issues of employment discrimination. The Supreme Court did not automatically assume the activity was protected. Instead it posed the issue as whether "in light of the national policy against

[1] The collective bargaining agreement is not part of the record in this case. At oral argument all counsel agreed this Court would have to treat the matter as it was handled before the Board, i.e., as concerted activity falling within the "mutual aid or protection" language of section 7 rather than the "collective bargaining" language of the same section. If there were an anti-discrimination clause in the collective bargaining agreement, Briscoe and the union would have arguably conferred jurisdiction upon the NLRB. See Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers v. NLRB, 49 U.S.L.W. 2388 (D.C.Cir. Nov. 28, 1980). That question and another posed by the majority at its note 6 are not before this panel.

[2] Section 7 reads in pertinent part:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid protection. * * *

[3] Section 8(a)(1) provides:

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

racial discrimination in employment, the National Labor Relations Act protects concerted activity by a group of minority employees to bargain with their employer over issues of employment discrimination." Id. at 52. Similarly, in the instant matter, the question this Court must answer is whether Congress intended that the National Labor Relations Act protect concerted activity by a group of minority employees who file charges with the EEOC when Congress expressly allocated adjustment or retaliation claims under Title VII to the EEOC.[4] The majority has answered the question in the affirmative. This separate opinion arises from the belief that this court should not permit the NLRB to arrogate to itself power Congress has placed elsewhere.

In recent years the Supreme Court has expressed considerable concern that employment discrimination matters be addressed in the appropriate forum. See NAACP v. Federal Power Commission, 425 U.S. 662, 96 S.Ct. 1806, 48 L.Ed.2d 284 (1976); Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, 420 U.S. 50, 95 S.Ct. 977, 43 L.Ed.2d 12 (1975); Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., 415 U.S. 36, 94 S.Ct. 1011, 39 L.Ed.2d 147 (1974); see also International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Local 790 v. Robbins & Myers, Inc., 429 U.S. 229, 97 S.Ct. 441, 50 L.Ed.2d 427 (1976). It has demonstrated the same concern in assuring that Title VII is not used as a substantive ground for finding violations of other statutes.[5] See Great American Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Novotny, 442 U.S. 366, 99 S.Ct. 2345, 60 L.Ed.2d 957 (1979); Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, supra.

Notwithstanding Supreme Court concern, the question of whether Congress intended to give jurisdiction to both the EEOC and NLRB when there is employer retaliation due to the filing of EEOC complaints is one of first impression at the appellate court level. Included within this question are two important sub-issues: allocation of jurisdiction between two governmental agencies and whether an unfair employment practice, a substantive right created by Title VII, can be remedied by the NLRB under the guide of an unfair labor practice. A broad overview of the legislative history of the Title VII and the NLRA, an unwillingness to conclude that Congress intended two administrative agencies to have separate jurisdiction over the same act of employment discrimination, and controlling case law lead to the conclusion that the majority result is unacceptable.

Careful scrutiny of the legislative history of Title VII cited in the majority's able opinion reveals it is of no aid. The issue before the Court is whether employer retaliation for filing charges with the EEOC is within the jurisdiction of the NLRB. Thus, any argument that passage of Title VII was not intended to strip the NLRB of whatever statutory authority it had over employment discrimination prior to passage of Title VII does not advance the inquiry.[6] The focus of this Court is narrow: whether a newly created unfair employment practice which did not and could not exist prior to passage of Title VII and for which a remedy was specifically provided in Title VII is also an unfair labor practice[7] under the NLRA.

Conversely, the legislative history of the National Labor Relations Act conclusively demonstrates the Congress did not intend for the NLRB to have an active civil rights role. See generally Axelrod and Kaufman, Mansion House—Bekins—Handy Andy: The National Labor Relations Board's Role in Racial Discrimination Cases, 45 Geo. Wash.L.Rev. 675, 682–88 (1977). When the Wagner Act of 1935 was debated, Congress paid scant attention to civil rights problems and summarily rejected concerns of the National Association for Advancement of Colored People and National Urban League. When [5] See infra pp. 956–957.

[6] The Title VII legislative history cited by the majority supports the proposition that passage of Title VII did not contract the jurisdiction of the NLRB, but does not address the issue confronting this panel—whether a newly created statutory right under Title VII should be a basis for an unfair labor practice charge. This is best illustrated by the language immediately preceding the excerpt from the interpretive Memorandum of Senator Clark cited in the majority opinion (Majority op. at p. 951). The missing language reads:

> it has been asserted that it would be possible to deny unions their representation rights under the National Labor Relations Act and the Railway Labor Act. This is not correct.

110 Cong. Rec. 7207 (1964).

Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act,[8] it added prohibitions of certain union practices, but expressed rejected efforts to insert prohibitions aimed at remedying employment discrimination. Finally, when Congress considered the Landrum-Griffin Act,[9] which regulated internal union affairs, it rejected an amendment aimed at union discriminatory policies. 105 Cong. Rec. 15722–24 (1959).

Congress did not act to eliminate employment discrimination until 1964 when it passed Title VII. Responsibility for eradicating employment discrimination could have been lodged in the NLRB. Instead, a new Commission, the EEOC, was born. Similarly, Congress could have provided the EEOC with statutory implementation machinery like that of the NLRB. It did not. Political compromise resulted in an enforcement mechanism for Title VII vastly different from that of the NLRA.

Under Title VII

> [a]nyone aggrieved by employment discrimination may lodge a charge with the EEOC. That commission is vested with the 'authority to investigate individual charges of discrimination, to promote voluntary compliance with the requirements of Title VII, and to institute civil actions against employers or unions named in the discrimination charge.' Thus, the Commission itself may institute a civil action. If, however, the EEOC is not successful in obtaining 'voluntary compliance' and, for one reason or another, chooses not to sue on the claimant's behalf, the claimant * * * may demand a right-to-sue letter and institute the Title VII action himself without waiting for the completion of the conciliation procedures.
> In the claimant's suit, the federal district court is empowered to appoint counsel for him, to authorize the commencement of the action without payment of fees, costs, or security, and even to allow an attorney's fee. Where intentional engagement in unlawful discrimination is proved, the court may award backpay and

Johnson v. Railway Express Agency, supra, 421 U.S. 454, 458, 95 S.Ct. 1716, 1719, 44 L.Ed.2d 295 (1975). [citations omitted]. Thus, under Title VII the emphasis is on individual rights, conciliation and, if unsuccessful, filing of a law suit in the federal district court. "By contrast, once the General Counsel of the NLRB decides to issue a complaint, vindication of the charging party's statutory rights becomes a public function discharged at public expense, and a favorable decision by the Board brings forth an administrative order." Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, supra, 420 U.S. at 72, 95 S.Ct. at 989.

The enforcement philosophies and mechanisms of the two statutes as recited above cannot be reconciled. Filing of an unfair labor charge will be an impediment to successful conciliation, irrespective of who prevails. Can we seriously attribute to Congress an intent to have the parties take part in the conciliation process at the same time they are engaged in an adversarial proceeding before the Board? Further, unless Congress explicitly so states, it is singularly inappropriate to attribute to that body an intent that an employer should be forced to appear before two administrative agencies for the same alleged act of employment discrimination. Implicit in the majority's holding is that Congress intended to apply inconsistent enforcement philosophies and irreconcilable statutory enforcement schema to the same episode of employment discrimination in instances where the same is not expressly covered in the NLRA. This untenable result is even more difficult to accept when it is remembered that the two statutes have completely different objectives. The NLRA seeks to minimize industrial strife by guaranteeing employees the most basic "collective rights" of industrial self-determination by "'encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining'" through majoritarian rule and the principle of exclusive representation. Emporium Capwell, supra, 420 U.S. at 62, 95 S.Ct. at 984, quoting 29 U.S.C. § 151. Title VII, on the other hand, seeks to eradicate employment discrimination through exercise of rights by individual claimants.

On two occasions the Supreme Court has answered in the negative the question whether the substantive rights conferred by Title VII may be used as the basis for relief under other statutes. In Great American Federal Savings & Loan Association

v. Novotny, reversing this unanimous en banc court, it stated: "The right Novotny claims under section 704(a) did not even arguably exist before the passage of Title VII. The only question here, therefore, is whether the rights created by Title VII may be asserted within the remedial framework of § 1985(c)." 442 U.S. at 376–77, 99 S.Ct. at 2351. While preserving independently based rights, whether the same be contractual, see Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., supra; International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Local 790 v. Robbins & Myers, Inc., supra, or statutory, see Johnson v. Railway Express Agency supra, the Supreme Court forbade suit under section 1985(c). In Emporium Capwell, the contention was made that the "congressional policy of protecting from employer reprisal employee efforts to oppose unlawful discrimination as expressed in § 704(a) of Title VII" had to be a violation of section 8(a)(1) [10] of the NLRA or "the integrity of § 704(e) will be seriously undermined." 420 U.S. at 71, 95 S.Ct. at 989. The Supreme Court expressly rejected this invitation to make the substantive rights of Title VII a basis for an unfair labor practice charge stating that rights entitled to protection under section 704(a) of Title VII are "not necessarily entitled to affirmative protection from the NLRA." Id. at 71–72, 95 S.Ct. at 989–990.

The Emporium Capwell opinion also answered in the most direct language possible the issue that necessitates this dissent.

"Questions arising under Title VII must be resolved by the means that Congress provided for that purpose * * *. What is said above does not call into question either the capacity or the propriety of the Board's sensitivity to questions of discrimination. It pertains, rather, to the proper allocation of a particular function—adjudication of claimed violations of Title VII—that Congress has assigned elsewhere." Id. at 71, n.25, 95 S.Ct. at 989 n.25 [emphasis added]. The concluding language of the Emporium Capwell majority has gone unheeded by this panel's majority.

> In order to hold that employer conduct violates § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA because it violates § 704(a) of Title VII, we would have to override a host of consciously made decisions well within the exclusive competence of the Legislature. This obviously, we cannot do.

Id. at 73, 95 S.Ct. at 990 [footnote omitted]. Given that the NLRA and Title VII have diverse objectives and vastly different enforcement philosophies and mechanisms for adjustment, it can be confidently predicted that today's decision will eventually involve this Court in conceptual difficulties which will only be resolved by a broad based retreat.

In summary, because the decision of the majority does violence to an overall view of the legislative history of the NLRA and Title VII, attributes to Congress the intent to expose an employer to two administrative agencies with conflicting statutory philosophies and mechanics of enforcement for the same unfair employment practice, and does not give the necessary fealty to the holdings of Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Organization, supra, and Great American Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Novotny, supra. I respectfully dissent.

NLRB v. International Credit Service, a Division of Lucas County Credit Bureau, Inc.

651 F.2d 1172 (6th Cir.), January 6, 1981–240 NLRB 715

On petition to enforce Board Order

This case is before the Court on the application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order issued against Intenational Credit Service, a division of Lucas County Credit Bureau, Inc., of Toledo, Ohio on February 12, 1979, and reported at 240 N.L.R.B. No. 102. The Board found the company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to execute the collective bargaining agreement, by unilaterally implementing employee wage increases, by engaging in direct dealing with the employees, and by refusing to furnish within a reasonable time wage information requested by the Union. The order requires the company to cease and desist from engaging in those unfair labor practices, and from in any way interfering with, restraining, or coercing the employees in the exercise of the rights under the Act. Affirmatively the company was ordered to execute the written agreement.

[10] While the emphasis throughout has been on Section 7 of the NLRA, Briscoe was charged with a violation of section 8(a)(1) which by its terms makes any concerted activity protected by section 7 an unfair labor practice. see notes 2 and 3, supra.

*Honorable Howard T. Markey, Chief Judge, United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, sitting by designation.

The NLRB certified the Toledo Printing Pressman and Assistants' Union No. 55, an affiliate of the International Printing & Graphic Communications Union, AFL-CIO in March 1977. Negotiations on a collective bargaining contract began shortly thereafter. The Union's chief negotiator was Fred Larson, an International Representative. The employer was represented by the President of the company, J.W. Orrin. The record establishes that at the initial bargaining session Orrin acknowledged his authority to represent the company. He stated he chose not to have his attorney present. Orrin testified and claims here he made it clear that negotiations were not be considered final until his attorney had reviewed the contract. Mr. Larson testified that Orrin merely requested he be allowed to submit the final agreement to his attorney at the conclusion of the bargaining sessions.

After the negotiations were completed and Orrin was in possession of the contract and a set of office rules in the form of a separate document, incorporated by reference in the contract as requested by Orrin upon learning the office rules had been left out of the contract, the papers were sent to the attorney. The union members became impatient with the delay in signing the documents and threatened to strike. Orrin expressed concern over the contents of certain articles in the contract, stating some contained substantive terms not agreed upon during the negotiations.

Larson suggested wage increases be implemented to avert the strike, subject to approval by the employees. The employees rejected the wage increase. Orrin initiated the wage increase without employee approval. The employees went on strike. Orrin continued to refuse to sign the contract and the office rules. A meeting was held and the contract was reviewed point by point. Orrin continued to insist discrepancies existed and refused to sign.

The existence of an agreement is a question of fact, and it is the Board's function to determine whether the employer refuses to sign and honor the bargain produced by the negotiations. N.L.R.B. v. Strong, 398 U.S. 357, 361, 89 S.Ct. 541, 544, 21 L.Ed.2d 546 (1969); N.L.R.B. v. Truckdrivers Union No. 100, 532 F.2d 569, 571 (6th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 859, 97 S.Ct. 160, 50 L.Ed.2d 137 (1977); Arco Electric Company v. N.L.R.B., 618 F.2d 698, 699 (10th Cir. 1980). We should enforce the Board's order if we find substantial evidence supports the finding that an agreement was reached. Adams Potato Chips, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 430 F.2d 90 (6th Cir. 1970). Upon careful review of the record, we do not believe that a final agreement was ever reached by the parties in this case. Discrepancies between notations made by Orrin and the agreement in its final form are too apparent to satisfy us that certain substantive terms in the contract are reflective of agreements made during the bargaining session. However, it is our further conclusion that the company did engage in the other unfair labor practices cited. We therefore deny enforcement of the order insofar as it directs the company to execute the written agreement, but enforce it in all other respects.

637 F.2d 822 (1st Cir.), January 7, 1981—247 NLRB 253

On petition to review Board Order

Before CAMPBELL and BOWNES, Circuit Judges, and KEETON,* District Judge

825

LEVIN H. CAMPBELL, Circuit Judge: In Texas Instruments, Inc. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 1067 (1st Cir. 1979), we vacated and remanded that part of a decision of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) finding that Texas Instruments, Inc. (TI) violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3) (1976), when it discharged six employees for disseminating information classified by the company as confidential. See Texas Instruments, Inc. 236 NLRB 68 (1978). Subsequent to our remand the

*Of the District of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

Board issued a Supplemental Decision and Order affirming its earlier order in the case. 247 NLRB No. 37 (Jan. 15, 1980). TI now petitions for review and reversal of the Supplemental Decision and Order, and the Board cross-petitions for enforcement.

I

The facts in the case are set out in our earlier opinion, 599 F.2d at 1069–70, but we partially restate them here in the interest of clarity.

The six employees whose termination triggered this litigation worked at Texas Instruments' plant in Attleboro, Massachusetts and belonged to a small group called the Union Organizing Committee. As members of the Committee, they sought to elicit support for unionization of the Attleboro plant by occasionally distributing union leaflets at the plant gates and by generally showing their support for the union. Prior to the present incident, the six employees had received satisfactory or good performance ratings and at least one was promoted. In May 1977, however, they ran afoul of TI's company security policy, which as applied in the present context is challenged as invalid.

As a major manufacturer of sophisticated electronic products which deals extensively with the Department of Defense, TI

> "has had, since 1960, a well developed internal security system, to deal adequately with defense security demands, to protect itself against those who would seek highly valued technological product and process information, and to safeguard certain managerial information including 'competitive or business intelligence'. There are two levels of classification: 'TI Strictly Private' and 'TI Internal Data'. The former is the more sensitive and is applied to all 'important TI information or material of a proprietary nature, the unauthorized use or disclosure of which could seriously impair the interests of TI'."

TI effectuates its classification program in part by means of a rule requiring immediate discharge for deliberate disclosure of "strictly private" material to unauthorized persons. See 599 F.2d at 1072; 247 NLRB No. 37, supra, slip op. at 4–5. A company handbook given to each employee lists "disclosure of classified or proprietary material to unauthorized persons" among the "major infractions [which] may be considered grounds for termination." TI's Personnel Manual provides that if such a security violation "was deliberate and resulted in compromise of information, immediate termination will result." The mandatory nature of the penalty for deliberate disclosure of classified information is borne out in practice. Testimony by company witnesses indicated that wilful (as contrasted with negligent) commission of a major infraction has regularly led to termination. In its Supplemental Decision, the Board found that "[d]uring the approximately 20 years that this security system has been in effect, [TI] has consistently applied this sanction [i. e., termination] in the five cases where it had been proven that such classified information was revealed." 247 N.L.R.B. No. 37, supra, at 5.

TI employees are generally apprised of this policy through the company handbook and staff and department meetings. In addition, the treatment of confidential information was apparently a frequent topic in a monthly company newspaper circulated among employees at the Attleboro plant.

Of present concern is the application of this security rule to certain wage information gathered and analyzed by TI. As a matter of corporate policy, TI seeks to make wages and benefits at each of its plants competitive with other employers in the area. To implement this policy the company conducts an annual area wage survey which solicits information from both union and nonunion employers about the number of persons they employ in specific job categories and their minimum, maximum and average rates of pay for each category. In seeking the cooperation of other employers, TI advises them that "all data will be treated with strict confidence."

TI compiles the wage information it receives into two reports. One report is distributed to the companies participating in the survey. It lists the average rate of pay for each job category at each company and identifies the companies only by code letters, thus ensuring the anonymity of the data. The other report is far more detailed and circulation of the few copies produced is restricted to a small number of high level TI Management personnel.[1] It comprises roughly fifty separate "wage recommendation sheets," one for each job category, that show the number,. as well as the minimum, maximum and average wage, of employees in that category at each company. The companies are identified by name and arranged on the sheets according to pay scale, with the highest-paying company listed first. Arrows in the right-hand margin of each sheet indicate TI's rank in the survey, the compensation staff's recommended wage increase for that job category and where the proposed increase would place TI in relation to the other companies. Counsel for TI stated in oral argument that the second report also contains information about company profitability, recent wage increases and the reevaluation of jobs, but this is not apparent from the record. This more extensive report is used by TI's top management to determine the company's wage schedule and has always been classified "TI Strictly Private"; indeed, every page of the report is stamped with this classification.

Sometime prior to May 25, 1977, a copy of the most recent version of this second, highly confidential wage survey report

> "was anonymously mailed to the Organizing Committee's post office box. Members of the Committee were never implicated in the mailing. After receipt of the papers, members of the Committee discussed the information; realized that it would be helpful in their attempts to unionize the company, inasmuch as organized plants were shown to be paying higher rates; and cut off the 'Strictly Private' label, reduced and reproduced in a leaflet two comparative tables of wages, one comparing rates for a grade 2–3 bench-worker at TI and sixteen other named plants and the other comparing rates for a grade 10 toolmaker at TI and 15 other named plants. Narrative material pointed to the moral:
> > 'The key thing for setting the wages in this area is what the union shops are doing. Take G.E., for example, doing the same work we're doing but making well over $1.00 more an hour, because workers there have struggled over the years through their union for a decent wage. If it wasn't for these organized places paying better wages to bring the average up, we'd be down there with Balfours.' "

599 F.2d at 1070.

The leaflets were first distributed on May 25, 1977 at 6:30 a.m.. TI management personnel soon discovered that the material contained reproductions of two wage recommendation sheets. Augat and Balfours, two companies at or near the bottom of the wage survey tables, also became aware of the contents of the leaflet (the source of their information is not specified) and called TI on May 25 to express concern. The leafletting continued at 3:30 p.m.

> "and management representatives contacted four of the distributors, informing them that the leaflet contained 'Strictly Private' matter and warning them that > continued distribution would subject them to summary termination. They and others met in the evening. One of them testified, 'We discussed it and our decision was that if the company did have any rights in the matter, had any claim on the material or anything of that sort; then they would have confiscated the leaflet right on the spot or taken some kind of measures against us. And, since that hadn't happened, we decided to go out again the next day.' "

599 F.2d at 1070.

On the next morning, May 26, the leaflets were again distributed, notwithstanding renewed warnings. Later in the day

> "the six people who had been distributing the leaflets were interviewed and then suspended. Five days later TI concluded that evidence was lacking to implicate the employees in the original leak of the data, but that the six employees had wilfully disseminated classified materials and that company policy required immediate termination."

599 F.2d at 1070. The employees were suspended on May 26, and then terminated several days later. This unfair labor practice proceeding was subsequently initiated.

[1] The ALJ, in his initial disposition of the case, indicated that only 16 copies existed apart from the one received by the Union Organizing Committee. 236 NLRB at 70.

The original disposition of the case by the administrative law judge (ALJ) and the Board is described in our previous opinion. See 599 F.2d at 1070–71. In remanding to the Board, we indicated that further proceedings were to focus "on the issues of the validity of the rule invoked by the company to justify the discharges, just as * * * in Jeanette Corp. v. NLRB, 532 F.2d 916 (3d Cir. 1976)." 599 F.2d at 1073. If the rule were found invalid under section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), then discharges pursuant to the rule would necessarily be violations of section 8(a)(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976).

> "This is so because the employer's asserted motivation—i.e., enforcement of a rule—must be in support of a rule not prohibited by labor law. If it is not it could not support a discharge even if the motivation to enforce the rule, a neutral not an anti-union objective, were the employer's only motivation for that discharge."

599 F.2d at 1072 (footnote omitted). See Republican Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 805, 65 S.Ct. 982, 988, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945). We went on to state, however, that if the rule were found valid, then "the Board would face the task of assessing motive" in order to decide the propriety of the discharges. 599 F.2d at 1073. See Part IV, infra.

The Jeanette case cited in our previous opinion identifies three stages in assessing the validity of a company rule. Initially the NLRB carries the burden of establishing that the employer's conduct pursuant to a company rule could have adversely affected employee rights protected under section 7 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). Such a showing is sufficient to render the rule "prima facie violative of section 8(a)(1)" and the burden in the second part of the inquiry "falls on the employer to demonstrate 'legitimate and substantial business justifications' for his conduct." 532 F.2d at 918. Finally, if such justifications are forthcoming, the Board must " 'strike the proper balance between the asserted business justifications and the invasion of employee rights in light of the Act and its policy.' " 532 F.2d at 918, quoting NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375, 378, 88 S.Ct. 543, 545, 19 L.Ed.2d 614 (1967) and NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 33–34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1797, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027(1967). The test laid out in Jeanette is for the most part based upon an approach developed by the Supreme Court in the Fleetwood Trailer and the Great Dane Trailers cases, supra.[2]

In a Supplemental Decision and Order issued following our remand the Board structured its reasoning to conform to the analysis in Jeanette. The Board first turned to the question whether "the employees, while leafleting [sic], were engaged in protected concerted activity." Determining that they were, the Board said,

> "It is clear that the employees, by engaging in such activity were encouraging collective action, to improve wages. This is evident from the wording of the leaflet, set out above, which indicates that the objective of the members of the Committee in disclosing the confidential wage data was to enforce their argument that only by means of a union could higher wages be assured. The wage information involved herein * * * [is] the type of data necessary to employees for making an informed decision about unionization."

247 NLRB No. 37, supra, slip op. at 8–9. Next, the Board reviewed the business justifications proffered by TI for its rule prohibiting disclosure of confidential information. It noted at the outset that > "This is not a case of lack of evidence tending to justify the rule * * * . On the contrary, because of the highly technical and defense-related material it handles, [TI] has in general shown that it has serious security interests which it justifiably is seeking to protect. In view of these genuine security needs, and the fact that there is no evidence or claim that the rule was unlawfully pro-

[2] In Great Dane Trailers the Supreme Court described two possible permutations of this analysis. First, where employer conduct is " 'inherently destructive' of important employee rights," the Board can find an unfair labor practice "even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations." 388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797. This case does not involve such a situation. See 599 F.2d at 1072 n.5. Second, "if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is 'comparatively slight,' an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct." Id. Implicit in the discussion of these two situations is the existence of a third possibility: employer conduct that affects no employee rights. The Board in the present suit treated the case as an example of the second situation; as will be explained in Part III, infra, we feel the case is correctly decided as an instance of the third situation.

mulgated, [TI's] rule, on its face, appears to be valid."

Id, at 9. The Board therefore went on to examine TI's specific justifications for applying its rule to the particular conduct at issue in this case.

TI argued that the wage recommendation report obtained by the Committee was properly treated as confidential, and its dissemination was an adequate ground for discharging the employees, because TI had assured companies participating in the area wage survey that the information they provided would be kept confidential. The Board held that an unsolicited assurance of confidentiality "does not automatically cloak [the wage survey data] with such status" and found "little evidence that the breach of [TI's] pledge by its employees resulted in damage to TI's reputation * * * ." Id., at 10.

TI also asserted that disclosure of the information in the wage recommendation report could result in competitive harm to the participants in the survey, including itself. In the first proceeding before the Board in this case the company offered this argument in justification of both the rule presently in question and a rule barring employees from divulging TI's own wage schedules to outsiders. As the Board pointed out in its Supplemental Decision, our earlier opinion upheld its initial determination that the latter rule was invalid since "TI, in mounting its annual wage survey, gives out its own wage data to every one of its competitors within a 25 mile radius." 599 F.2d at 1073–74. Based on that portion of our previous holding in the case and the finding of the Board upon remand that "it would be difficult for any competitor to utilize the limited information divulged by the handout to TI's disadvantage," the Board rejected this second business justification. Id., at 11.

Finally, TI argued that the wage recommendation reports were properly treated as confidential due to their important role in management's formulation of TI's own wage schedule. The Board held that > "this type of information (area wage surveys), is not automatically entitled to be withheld as confidential documents, especially when [TI] relies on them to determine its own wage rates. Moreover, TI itself breached the integrity of that alleged confidentiality by releasing similar information to its participating employers, and in selectively disclosing to its employees portions of its survey to support its position of a competitive wage scale."

Having found the discharged employees' conduct to be an exercise of rights protected by section 7 of the NLRA, and having rejected TI's justifications for terminating the employees pursuant to its pertinent security rule, the Board concluded that "the analysis undertaken herein requires striking the balance in favor of the employees in exercising their Section 7 rights as opposed to the interest of the employer in enforcing its rule." Id. The rule as applied in this case was thus declared invalid, and the Board found it unnecessary to determine whether some other even more egregious motive caused the discharges.

III

We disagree with the Board's conclusion that TI was prohibited, as a matter of law, from enforcing its security rule with respect to conduct such as occurred here, i.e., its employees' deliberate[3] disclosure of confidential wage survey material, gathered for management purposes and marked "strictly private," that had come to the employees' attention irregularly, outside proper channels. Contrary to the Board's ruling, we do not believe the employees' conduct as described was activity protected by the NLRA. It follows that TI's rule prohibiting deliberate disclosure of confidential company information, which the Board correctly held to be valid on its face, could be validly applied on these facts to prohibit and penalize dissemination of the information in question.

[3] The Board has not argued that the employees' conduct here was other than deliberate and knowing. In its Supplemental Decision the Board describes the employees as having, "while engaged in organizational leafleting [sic], knowingly distributed material which contained classified wage survey information * * *." 247-NLRB No. 37, supra, slip op. at 1. The record shows that the anonymously mailed wage survey, each page of which was stamped "strictly private," was in the possession of the small Organizing Committee, to which the dischargees belonged, for approximately a month before it was used. All six employees were stipulated to have participated in one or more meetings at which the material was discussed and a decision made to incorporate it in an organizational pamphlet. Company witnesses testified that all six employees admitted, prior to discharge, that they knew the material was classified. All six employees had received TI's booklet, listing the rule against distribution of classified material and stating that violation thereof was a "major infraction" which may be considered grounds for termination." It was stipulated that five of the six discharged employees were present on May 25 at a meeting after the leafletting had commenced during which it was discussed that TI's officers had warned that the information was classified and the distributors' actions could result in discharge. Notwithstanding these warnings, the employees decided to continue to distribute the material, and leafletting proceeded the next day with all but one of the six, James Mallen, participating.

Conduct falls within the protection of the NLRA if it involves the exercise of a right guaranteed to employees by section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157. See Fleetwood Trailer, Co., supra, 389 U.S. at 378, 88 S.Ct. at 545; Great Dane Trailers, supra, 388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797; 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). In its Supplemental Decision and in its brief to this court, the Board contends that the employees' dissemination of TI's confidential company information was an exercise of their right to exchange information about the benefits and drawbacks of self-organization and accordingly was protected under the NLRA. While it is true that the Supreme Court has recognized a right in employees to exchange organizational information as a necessary incident to "the right to self-organization" expressly guaranteed by section 7, see NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 113, 76 S.Ct. 679, 684, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956); Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945), it is also true that an abstract invocation of this right does not automatically shield an employee's acts from sanction under 830 a company rule. Not all conduct that can, in some general sense, be characterized as an exercise of a right enumerated in section 7 is afforded the protection of the Act. See NLRB v. Local 1229, IBEW, 346 U.S. 464, 74 S.Ct. 172, 98 L.Ed. 195 (1953); Keosaian v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 36, 38–39 (1st Cir. 1980); R. Gorman, Labor Law 296–317 (1976). For example, concerted activity that violates state or federal law, that irresponsibly exposes an employer's property to possible damage or that constitutes insubordination or disloyalty may be found to fall outside the scope of the NLRA even if undertaken in the interest of self-organization or collective bargaining. See R. Gorman, supra, at 311–17. We do not mention these examples as an exhaustive delineation of the contours of section 7, nor in order to capture the unique circumstances of the present case, but simply to suggest the proper approach to defining employee rights under the Act: rights under section 7 must in each instance be understood in relation to the concrete facts of a particular case. See Fleetwood Trailer Co., supra, 389 U.S. 375, 88 S.Ct. 543, 19 L.Ed.2d 614; Great Dane Trailers, supra 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027; Keosaian, supra, 630 F.2d at 38–39; NLRB v. Knuth Brothers, Inc., 537 F.2d 950, 953–57 (7th Cir. 1976). It is not enough to decide, as did the Board, that the discharged employees had a right to disseminate information in furtherance of their organizational goals; it must also be asked whether they had a right to distribute this information. Based on a variety of factors drawn from precedents of the courts as well as the Board, we find they did not.

As an initial consideration, the discharged employees would have had no right in the present context to have insisted upon receiving access to TI's wage recommendation reports.[4] This point was conceded by counsel for the Board in oral argument and is well established in case law. See Decaturville Sportswear Co. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 886, 889–90 (6th Cir. 1969); NLRB v. Clearwater Finishing Co., 203 F.2d 938 (4th Cir. 1953); Southern & Western Lumber Co., 212 NLRB 668 (1974); cf. Vitrionic, Inc., 183 NLRB 1067, 1077–78 (1970) (seeking information from employer to assist consumer boycott against it); Montgomery Ward & Co., 146 NLRB 76 (1964) (seeking information related to employee grievance). Indeed, other cases go farther and indicate that the employees, once having stumbled across TI's confidential data, would have had no right knowingly to use the classified wage survey information, gathered by management solely for its own internal use, in their organizing activities. In its opinion in Ridgely Manufacturing Co., 207 NLRB 193, 196–97 (1973), the Board states as a "rule of thumb" the proposition "that employees are entitled to use for self-organizational purposes information and knowledge which comes to their attention in the normal course of work activity and association but are not entitled to their Employer's private or confidential records." Accord NLRB v Florida Steel Corp., 544 F.2d 896, 897 (5th Cir. 1977); Bell Federal Savings & Loan Association, 214 NLRB 75, 78 (1974).[5] It seems clear that the TI wage recommendation sheets anonymously mailed to the Union Organizing Committee came to the attention of the discharged employees outside the normal course of their employment.

[4] This is not a case involving the right of a bargaining representative to request information needed for the proper performance of its duties in negotiating, administering or policing a contract. See Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 303, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1125, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 435–36, 87 S.Ct. 565, 567–68, 17 L.Ed.2d 495 (1967); Western Mass. Elec. Co. v. NLRB, 589 F.2d 42, 46 (1st Cir. 1978). An employer's duty to furnish information to his employees as defined in cases of this nature derives from the statutory duty to bargain. TI being nonunion, the duty to bargain is not implicated here.

A second factor to be considered is the confidential nature of the information in the wage survey report. This is not a case involving information gathered by the employees themselves; information already effectively released by the company; or information so generally known in the outside world as to be beyond protection,[6] see News-Texan, Inc., v. NLRB, 422 F.2d 381, 386 (5th Cir. 1970); Southern & Western Lumber Co., supra, 212 NLRB at 669; in which the information was readily accessible to employees, see Southern & Western Lumber Co., supra, 212 NLRB at 669; Ridgely Manufacturing Co., supra, 207 NLRB at 197; or in which nothing in the nature of the information suggested its confidentiality, see Southern & Western Lumber Co., supra, 212 NLRB at 669. See generally notes 3, supra. The data had been compiled through the efforts of TI's officials entirely or limited executive use. Certain of it, consisting of evaluations and wage recommendations by TI's staff, was internal to TI itself. The rest, while gathered from outside firms, had been specially compiled. TI clearly had a proprietary interest in its wage survey report. There was evidence that it cost TI around $10,000 to prepare the report, and that no similar compilation existed elsewhere. While TI's employees would certainly have had a right to disseminate any bits of the outside wage data they had obtained from outside sources, they had no right to appropriate their employer's confidential work product.[7] Each page of the company's report from which the discharged employees excerpted data for their leaflet was stamped "Strictly Private." And TI's employee manual and newspaper described TI's rule against disclosure of confidential information and the security system. In comparable situations, courts and the Board have held employees' use of confidential company information to be outside the protection of the NLRA. See Florida Steel Corp., supra, 544 F.2d 896; Clearwater Finishing Co., supra, 203 F.2d 938; Vitrionic, Inc., supra, 183 NLRB at 1078–79.

As a final consideration, we note the absence of evidence, even assuming this would be relevant, that the employees' organizing activities were somehow peculiarly dependent upon having access to the confidential information. Cf. NLRB v. J. P. Stevens & Co., 563 F.2d 8, 24–25 (2d Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1064, 98 S.Ct. 1240, 55 L.Ed. 2d 765 (1978) (refusing to order company to disclose wage rates, job descriptions, and dates for hire for employees in context of organizing campaign and in absence of a showing "that the employees' ability to learn the advantages of self-organization is in any way dependent upon the union's access to such * * * information"). Accord Textile Workers Union v. NLRB, 388 F.2d 896, 906 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 836, 89 S.Ct. 112, 21 L.Ed.2d 107

[5] Bell Federal Savings can be read to define employee rights more narrowly than Ridgely. In Bell, the Board held that a switchboard operator's disclosure to a union official of the number of calls received by the company president from his attorney was not protected activity. The Board distinguished her action from the conduct of employees who use information obtained in the course of their work apparently on the fact that the information about the president's calls, though obviously gathered in her normal duties, was not "openly available" to employees in general. 214 NLRB at 78. The Board also noted that her conduct was "a breach of trust justifying discipline" and that the union could have obtained directly the name of the company's bargaining representative. These factors are discussed infra.

[6] The Board found that "TI itself breached the integrity of that alleged confidentially by releasing similar information to its participating employers, and in selectively disclosing to its employees portions of its survey to support its position of a competitive wage scale." This is an overstatement. The information disclosed to other employers pertained to wages, see 599 F.2d at 1073–74, but was anonymous and not detailed. See Part I, supra. Further, testimony by two TI employees would have supported a finding that on one occasion in January 1977, a single page was posted on a company bulletin board disclosing the pay scale for certain job classifications of six or seven of the participants in the area wage survey. It is not clear whether this emanated from a company source. The record thus does not indicate that TI at any time abrogated the confidential status of the detailed wage survey report it retained for internal use. In Florida Steel Corp., supra, 544 F.2d 896, partial and restricted release of confidential information did not make similar, but undisclosed information nonconfidential. 544 F.2d at 897–98 & n3. We believe the same to be true in this case.

[7] Mary Clinker, one of the discharged employees, testified that in an interview with TI management personnel prior to her discharge she challenged TI's concern with the disclosure of the wage material, claiming that she could have obtained the same information simply by calling friends employed at the companies participating in the wage survey. One of the interviewers, she stated, said in response, "[w]hen [she] called up and found out how much they were making, then [she] could go ahead and print it; but they had done the calling so [she] didn't have any right to print what they had done."

(1968). Through upon remand the Board found in the record no proof "that other means were 'readily available' to the employers here to acquire the same or similar data," it also pointed to no evidence suggesting that without the confidential TI information, the employees' organizing efforts would have been stymied. Reflective of the lack of dependency of the employees' organizing activities upon this material is the absence of any prior request therefor addressed to management. It may be true, as the Board argues, that "the distribution of leaflets setting forth the benchmark employers' wage rates and union status was * * * directly relevant to the Company employees' organizing campaign," but the conclusion does not follow, as the Board would have us decide, that disclosure of this particular compilation, put together by TI's management for its own purposes and secured from other firms upon promises of confidentiality, was therefore the exercise of an employee right and so "a most basic form of protected concerted activity." As we have already observed, surpa, not every activity in furtherance of self-organization is protected under section 7 of the NLRA. Even were we to assume—and we do not so hold—that the need for proprietary information might in pressing circumstances support a right on behalf of organizing employees to use that information, the facts of this case do not reveal any such circumstances.

To support finding an employee right in the present case that would trigger the protection of the NLRA, the Board argues that the discharged employees did not steal or misappropriate TI's confidential information. The presence or absence of subreption and misappropriation is certainly a significant factor in deciding whether employee conduct is a protected exercise of a section 7 right. Compare News-Texan, Inc., supra, 422 F.2d at 386, and Southern & Western Lumber Co., supra, 212 NLRB at 669, with Florida Steel Corp., supra, 544 F.2d at 897–98, and Clearwater Finishing Co., supra, 203 F.2d at 939, and Vitrionic, Inc., supra, 183 NLRB at 1078. However, this factor by itself is, at most, one element among many. Furthermore, the conduct at issue was by no means wholly innocent. The manner in which the employees received TI's wage survey report certainly suggested that the anonymous sender had obtained it through questionable means or was circulating it in breach of confidence. Nevertheless, they reproduced parts of the report in their organizing leaflet, being careful to cut from each page that they used the label "Strictly Private." [8]

Finally, the Board claims that disclosure of the confidential material "did not threaten any commercial harm to the Company." Such a consideration would be more appropriate to an inquiry into the employer's business justifications for its termination of the employees—a portion of the Jeanette inquiry which for present purposes we do not reach, see infra. Even, however, if commercial harm were relevant to the existence of and employee right under section 7, see Knuth Brothers, Inc., supra, 537 F.2d 950; News-Texan, Inc., supra, 422 F.2d 381; Vitrionic, Inc., supra, 183 NLRB 1067, its presence or absence would be but one factor; mere absence of resulting harm would not by itself demonstrate that the activity was protected.

Our examination reveals no basis sufficient to support a finding that the discharged employees' unauthorized and knowing use, in an organizing leaflet, of a confidential wage survey prepared by TI management for its own purposes, was the exercise of a right guaranteed by section 7 of the NLRA. As the employees' conduct was therefore not "protected activity," we need not go on to the other Jeanette criteria. That is, we need not review the Board's balancing, in light of the Act and its policies, of TI's proffered justifications for application of the rule on these facts, against a supposed invasion of employee rights. No such invasion of employee rights existed. Applied to the materials and to the conduct in question, the company security rule was valid.

In our previous opinion, we stated that if upon remand the rule were found valid, the Board would still face the task of assessing motive, i.e., of determining whether the discharges were, in fact, prompted by infringement of the valid rule or were instead prompted by an impermissible anti-union purpose. 599 F.2d at 1073. See also, NLRB v.

[8] In oral argument counsel for the Board claimed that this was necessary to fit the sheets onto the leaflet. An examination of the layout of the leaflet and the proximity on the wage sheets of the classification labels to the material reproduced in the leaflet would suggest that this was not the case.

Wilson Freight Co., 604 F.2d 712, 723 (1st Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 962 (1980) 100 S.Ct. 1650, 64 L.Ed.2d 238. As on remand the Board decided that the rule was not valid, it never undertook an assessment of motive. Now, following our reversal of the Board, it must be asked if the rule, rather than an illegal anti-union purpose, was the true basis for discharge. This question requires consideration of another: should the issue of motive be remanded to the Board yet another time? We think not, on this record. We would conclude differently if there remained a genuine issue of fact to be decided. The record, however, discloses no substantial basis in fact on which the Board could reasonably reject TI's contention that the employees were discharged because of their violation of the confidentiality rule. Indeed, the Board has not argued for remand in the event its determination of invalidity is overturned; its arguments have been addressed solely to upholding that determination. In the circumstances, we believe the discharges must be held to be lawful.

In our previous decision, we mentioned two steps as being required in the analysis of an employer's motive.

> "The first is the determination that a significant 'bad', or anti-union, motivation contributed to the discharges. The second is the subsequent weighing of the employer's defense that a 'good' reason for the discharge existed and would have produced the discharge even in the absence of the bad reason."

599 F.2d at 1073 (footnote omitted). On the first point, the record contains only the most marginal evidence of a "bad" motivation. TI was openly opposed to unionization of its plants, but that, without more, would not offend the NLRA, nor support a finding of anti-union motive. See NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 670 (1st Cir. 1979); Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 735, 743-44—(5th Cir. 1979). While TI management personnel knew of the discharged employees' organizational activities, TI had given the employees good performance ratings, and had recently promoted one of them. There is no evidence of improper anti-union conduct, such as prior harassment of these or others on account of protected activities.

By contrast, there is persuasive evidence in the record that TI had a "good" reason for the discharges: the six employees had openly and knowingly violated a rule which not only prohibited disclosure of classified material but made such conduct a major infraction constituting grounds for discharge. The conduct of the employees in this case plainly fell within the purview of that rule. TI furnished considerable evidence of the seriousness with which it took its security program, and of its persistent efforts to enforce all aspects of it throughout its large organization. The record indicates that wage survey reports have for some time been treated as confidential by TI and that the one disseminated by the employees had its "strictly private" classification stamped on every page. Dissemination of the information was shown to be both knowing and deliberate. See note 3, supra. The rule, therefore, was clearly violated and under TI policy termination was the mandated penalty. This penalty is spelled out in company manuals and has been consistently pursued in fact. See supra. Without evidence of improper or inconsistent application of what has been determined to be a valid company rule, we can see no basis on which a supported finding could be made that the six employees would not have been fired but for their union activities. See Eastern Smelting, supra, 598 F.2d at 671. Compare First Data Resources, Inc., 241 NLRB No. 114, slip op. at 14-15 (1979). The Board's discussion in its Supplemental Decision as to the presumed lack of harm resulting from disclosure of the wage survey information, see Part II, supra, does not supply the necessary quantum of evidence. In assessing motive

> "the factfinder is bound to weigh the employer's asserted justification with some delicacy and deference. 'It is important in cases involving business judgment that the Board not set up its own standard, and then conclude that, since the employer had another, it was ipso facto suspect.' Eastern Smelting supra, 598 F.2d at 673. The ALJ and the Board cannot dismiss an employer's justification entirely, as having no weight or substance at all. Rather there must be a weighing of the relative strengths of the good and bad motivations, not to determine how the Board would have behaved under similar circumstances but to determine what in fact motivated the employer."

599 F.2d at 1073. See also Wilson Freight Co., supra, 604 F.2d at 721–22; Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 595, 603 (1st Cir. 1979); Stone & Webster Engineering Corp. v. NLRB, 536 F.2d 461, 467, (1st Cir. 1976) ("The Act was not intended to guarantee that business decisions be sound, only that they not be the product of antiunion motivation." (emphasis in original)). The breach of confidence at issue, whatever its ultimate effect in fact, is not patently trival. TI had a legitimate interest in protecting the integrity of its security system and in preserving an image of reliability among companies with which it dealt. Compare First Data Resources, supra, 241 NLRB No. 114, slip op. at 14–15. In the final analysis, there would be no way to uphold the Board to this record without giving to the discharged employees a perference over other employees who would be bound by TI's rule and could not claim the benefit of having engaged in organizational activities. While the NLRA protects against retaliation on account of union activities, it does not license activists to violate valid company rules with impunity. "Union membership is no guaranty against discharge." Schwob Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 297 F.2d 864, 871 (5th Cir. 1962), quoted in Florida Steel Corp., supra, 587 F.2d at 743.

The Board's petition for enforcement is denied and its Supplemental Decision and Order is set aside in whole.

NLRB v. Midland Ross, Inc.

653 F.2d 239 (6th Cir.), January 8, 1981—239 NLRB 1205

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WEICK, KEITH and KENNEDY, Circuit Judges

The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of two orders issued by the Board, one finding that defendant violated Sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discriminatorily terminating employee Earl A. Rose for engaging in union activities; the second finding that defendant violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the certified union.[1] Both cases have been consolidated on appeal.

Midland Ross is an Ohio corporation engaged at its Louisville, Kentucky facility in the business of warehousing and distributing plastic products. Earl Rose was hired in January, 1975, to work in the Louisville warehouse along with three other employees. In July, 1976, John Schneider, was hired as supervisor and plant manager and charged with making the warehouse run more smoothly and efficiently. Sometime in the fall of 1976, Schneider and Gerald Ose, Director of Marketing for the Material Handling Division, discussed reducing the number of warehouse personnel by one. The proposed budget for 1977 dated January, 1977, showed three instead of four warehousemen. The reduction was scheduled for implementation sometime in the second quarter of 1977. As the warehouseman with the least seniority, Rose would be the employee terminated.

On March 14, 1977, Schneider completed a morgage reference form for Rose answering the question "probability of continued employment" as "Good". About a week later, Dave Collier, the lead warehouseman, told Rose and two of the other warehouse employees that they were suspended for three days for tampering with another employee's time cards in violation of company rule 12. They appealed to Schneider at which time Rose remarked, "If we had a union in here, this kind of stuff wouldn't happen." Schneider reduced the suspension from three days to the balance of that afternoon.

On March 24, Ose sent Schneider a memo asking how the plan for reducing the warehouse employees by one was going.

Following the time card incident, Rose discussed organizing with two other warehousemen, Wood and Downs. Rose contacted, and arranged a meeting with the assistant to the president of local 89. Subsequent to this meeting, Rose passed out authorization cards at work where they were completed. The cards were signed on March 28, 1977. Schneider was notified three days later of the union's demand for recognition.

On April 11, 1977, Rose went on vacation. Several days later he asked for and was granted two more vacation days although he was told that the company "needed him". When Rose called on April 18, 1977, to request several more vacation days he was told he was terminated for lack of work. Two days after Rose was terminated for lack of work, Wilbur Allison, the fourth warehouse employee, quit the warehouse after he was threatened with suspension. The stamping work performed by Allison was redistributed to the Dawson Springs facility after Allison quit.

Several discussions took place among Ose, Tom Bruser, Industrial Relations Manger, and George Gardner, Midland's labor counsel, between March 31 and April 15. On April 15, Schneider was told to proceed with the decision to terminate Rose.

On May 19, 1977, the Board conducted an election in a unit comprised of Midland Ross's five warehouse employees including Rose who had been terminated the month before. Midland Ross challenged Rose's ballot claiming that Rose was not an employee at the time of the election and thus was ineligible to vote. The Board disagreed and ordered Rose's ballot counted resulting in three votes for and two against the union. Midland Ross admits that it has refused and continues to refuse to bargain with the union certified as exclusive bargaining representative on January 29, 1979. The company argues that the Board's finding that Rose was improperly terminated for union activities is not supported by substantial evidence. Thus Rose was no longer an employee and ineligible to cast the vote which resulted in electing the union.

Midland Ross contends that there is no substantial evidence that it knew that Rose was active on behalf of the union. Although the evidence is not extensive, we hold that in view of the very small work force involved, Rose's statement "if we had a union", followed a week later by the union demand for recognition permits the inference that Midland Ross knew of Rose's union activities. This inference, when added to the timing of the discharge which occurred immediately after Schneider had stated that Rose was needed at work and had completed the mortgage information form stating the probability of his continued employment was good is substantial evidence that the discharge was due in part to his union activity, rather than the explanation offered by Midland Ross. Although we might well reach a conclusion different than that of the Board's, it's inferences are reasonable and thus entitled to affirmance by the Court.

Accordingly, the Board's application for enforcement of its orders is granted.

The Timken Company v. NLRB

652 F.2d 610 (6th Cir.), January 8, 1981—236 NLRB 757

On petition to review Board Order

Before ENGEL and KEITH, Circuit Judges, and CELEBREEZE, Senior Circuit Judge

This case arises from the Timken Company's petition to review and set aside an NLRB order issued on June 7, 1978 and reported at 236 NLRB NO. 87. The Board filed a cross-appeal for enforcement of its order.

The Board found that the Timken Company maintained an employee handbook always in effect at the Company's Bucyrus Plant. It contained a section entitled "Your Conduct and Responsibilities" which states:

> As an employee of the Timken Company, you should not engage in any conduct or activity that interferes with your own work or that of any other employee or with plant operations or the maintenance of Company premises.

The handboook also proscribed:

> Soliciting for the purpose of collecting money for any purpose whatsoever on working time.
> Violation of or disregard of good housekeeping practices, safe practices or safety, fire, plant protection, or other work rules or regulations. Careless or negligent use of Company property.

However, the Board found that Company employees frequently sold a variety of items at the plant on Company time and often sought signatures on petitions. No employees were disciplined for these activities.

On January 25, 1977, employees Nancy Clark, Roger Redden and Robert Fruehling arrived at the plant before their work shift and began to pass out literature on behalf of the UAW. Clark and Redden were distributing information just inside the entrance to one plant area and Fruehling just inside the entrance to another. When Company personnel noticed the union activity, Supervisors Charles Crall and Louis Meyers approached Clark and Redden and told them they would have to go outside to distribute and if they refused they would be suspended. Crall and Meyers approached Fruehling and told him the same thing.

On January 31, just after the Company allegedly prohibited union distributions in the plant, the union filed a petition with the Board for a representation election. Fruehling was principal organizer for his shift and obtained 50 to 60 signed cards. On April 6, the representation election was held and lost by a 657 to 469 vote.

About the end of April, employee Edward Pollack was having a conversation with Supervisor Charles White. Fruehling walked by and White said, "That's one fellow we don't need around here, a union pusher."

Fruehling was scheduled to work overtime on Saturday, May 7th. He called the plant at 8:00 A.M. and reported that he would be absent since he was going out of town. The guard who took the call routinely wrote this information on a form and gave it to Fruehling's supervisor. When Fruehling returned to work on May 9th, his supervisor asked him about where he had been on Saturday; Fruehling replied that he didn't want to say. His supervisor then filed a report with the Shift Superintendent Frank Lambert, with no recommendation for disciplining. Lambert found the report when he arrived at work on May 10th. He reviewed Fruehling's personnel file, which contained a "final written warning" issued in August 1976. However, as Lambert was aware, Fruehling had not been absent for any reason between August 1976 and the May 1977 incident. Lambert forwarded Orweiler's report to Plant Manager Robert Tull with an oral recommendation that Fruehling be discharged. Tull consulted with his superiors in the Company hierarchy including the Company's Director of Industrial Relations, before deciding what action to take. They concluded Fruehling should be discharged, and fired him on May 10th.

The Board found that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by impliedly prohibiting distribution of union literature in non-work areas within the plant building and by applying its rule concerning solicitation and distribution against union activity and not against other distributions. Further, the Board found that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening reprisals against employees who engaged in union or other protected concerted activities. Finally, the Board found that the Company violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employee Robert Fruehling for engaging in union activities. The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found and from in any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act. Affirmatively, the Board's order requires the Company to offer immediate and full reinstatement to Robert Fruehling, to make him whole for any loss suffered as a result of the Company's discrimination against him, and to post an appropriate notice.

It should be noted that the Board's ruling constituted a complete reversal of the ALJ's findings in this case

It is the opinion of the court that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that employee Robert Frueling was discharged because of his union activities. However, we find that substantial evidence does not support the Board's finding that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act: (1) by threatening its employees with reprisals if they engaged in union activity; (2) by applying its rule against solicitation by employees in a manner that had a disparate effect on union campaigning; or (3) that it modified its solicitation rule so that it unlawfully prohibited union solicitation in nonworking areas in the plant.

Accordingly, that portion of the Board's order requiring the reinstatement of Robert Fruehling and requiring the Company to make him whole for any loss suffered as a result of the Company's discrimination is hereby enforced. However, enforcement of the order in all other respects is denied.

CELEBREZZE, Senior Circuit Judge, would deny enforcement of the order and dissents.

Dallas Stage Employees Local Union 127 v. NLRB

633 F.2d 1195 (5th Cir.), January 9, 1981—247 NLRB 818

On petition to review Board Order

Before COLEMAN, Chief Judge, CHARLES, CLARK and REAVLEY, Circuit Judges

REAVLEY, Circuit Judge: The Dallas local of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees (the International or IATSE) was charged with unfair labor practices under § 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act,

29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.[1] The NLRB (the Board) found that the local's threat to recommend withholding of the International trademark if the employer hired a sound mixer who was not a union member was coercive within the meaning of the Act. Since the Union threatened only legal action in protecting the integrity of its trademark, the decision of the Board is unwarranted by law and contrary to other decisions of the Board. We set aside the Board's order.

There is no dispute over the facts. Mulberry Square Productions, a Dallas-based corporation engaging in the production and distribution of motion pictures, began hiring personnel for its upcoming motion picture, "The Double McGuffin" in August, 1977. Terrence Donnelly, the production manager, contacted Bernard Blynder at Blynder's home in Miami, Florida, concerning possible employment as sound mixer for the movie. Blynder indicated his interest in the job, and Blynder and Donnelly began to discuss details of the employment. Blynder told Donnelly that his union membership card had been suspended by the Miami local, and Donnelly informed him that his employment with Mulberry Square was conditional on getting the union card reinstated prior to production of the movie. In November 1977, Donnelly again called Blynder to finalize the employment agreement. He also inquired into Blynder's situation with the union and found that it remained unchanged.

In November of 1977, independent of the hiring of Blynder, Mulberry Square and the Dallas local of the International began negotiations for a new collective bargaining agreement. At the second bargaining meeting, held in late November or early December, Frank Duran, Mulberry Square's chief negotiator, submitted to the Union a list of the crew already hired for the production of "The Double McGuffin." Duran wanted to avoid any problems with the Union on this production and asked the Union's chief negotiator, E. W. Bradford, to look over the list to determine if there were any problems. At the next meeting, Bradford informed Duran that he has checked the crew list and, although Mulberry Square could hire whomever they wished, the Union had problems with two of the names on the list—one of which was that of Bernard Blynder. Bradford objected to Blynder's employment because he did not have a union membership card from an IATSE sound local. Duran, inexperienced in the film industry and in the collective bargaining process, asked about the consequences of hiring someone who was not a union member. Bradford explained that the International has a registered trademark or seal (the "bug") and that the International would permit the producer to place it on a film only if the union is satisfied that the film was produced entirely by IATSE members. Bradford further explained that if the "bug" is not on the film, IATSE projectionists might refuse to run the film or might run it improperly.

Section 7, 29 U.S.C. § 157 provides:

§ 157. Right of employees as to organization, collective bargaining, etc. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities * * *.

Section 8, 29 U.S.C. § 158 provides, in pertinent part:

§ 158. Unfair labor practice

(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

* * * * *

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization

* * * * *

(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

(1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title.

(2) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a)(3) of this section * * *.

Blynder was unsuccessful in getting his union membership reinstated. Nevertheless, in later conversations with Bradford, Donnelly insisted on using Blynder as the sound mixer in the upcoming production. Bradford responded that Mulberry Square could hire whomever they wanted, but if they insisted on hiring Blynder, a nonmember, he would have to recommend to the International that the "bug" be withheld.

After all efforts to get Blynder's membership reinstated failed, Mulberry Square, fearful of the union withholding its seal, hired a union member to replace Blynder as sound mixer.

The NLRB charged the Dallas Local with unfair labor practices in violation of § 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. A hearing was held before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), whose decision was adopted by the entire Board. The ALJ found that Bradford's threat to recommend that the International withhold the seal if Blynder was hired was coercive, causing Mulberry Square to discriminate against Blynder by discharging him because he was not a union member. We disagree.

The union seal or "bug" is a registered trademark of the International, and the International has the authority to grant or deny a producer the right to its exhibition. The International has the right to maintain the integrity of its trademark and issue it only when all of the production crew are union members. The local also has the right, if not the duty, to recommend to the International situations in which it feels the bug should not be issued. Although maintenance of the integrity of the seal has the purpose of promoting the employment of union members under union conditions, this activity is protected by the Act. NLRB v. Circle Bindery, Inc. 536 F.2d 447, 452 (1st Cir. 1976).

Admittedly, protection of the seal may not be used to justify illegal action on the part of the Union. In NLRB v. Washington-Oregon Shingle Weaver's District Council (Sound Shingle Co.), 211 F.2d 149, 151 (9th Cir. 1954), cited by the ALJ, the court held that the union was entitled to protect and even enjoin the unlawful use of its registered trademark, but could not engage in an unlawful secondary boycott to protect the trademark. Rather than threatening illegal activity, such as a secondary boycott, in the present case Bradford merely described or predicted action which the union was fully entitled to take. In response to Mulberry Square's request for information, Bradford indicated that if Blynder, a non-member, were hired, he would be compelled to recommend that the International withhold the bug. Upon further inquiry, he informed Duran of the possibilities of economic consequences to films lacking the bug. He did not tell Mulberry Square that they could not hire Blynder, and, in fact, carefully insisted that Mulberry Square could hire whomever they pleased. He did not threaten any action beyond the withholding of the bug.

A threat of legal activity by a union has never before been considered violative of the Act. In fact, the Board has consistently upheld a union official's honest statement that he intends to take lawful action as not violative of § 8(b)(1)(A) or (2). See, e.g. Carpenters Local 2361 (Adams Insulation Co.), 248 N.L.R.B. No. 59, 103 L.R.R.M. 1444 (1980) (letter threatening lawful informational picketing, not unlawful recognitional picketing, is not coercive within the meaning of the Act); Lodge No. 199 of District 12, IAM (Baltimore Rebuilders), 235 N.L.R.B. No. 209, 98 L.R.R.M. 1270 (1978) (letter informing employees of lawful termination of participation by employer in union's pension plan as result of decertification of union not coercive).

The Board asserts that Motion Picture Studio Mechanics, Local 52, International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Moving Picture Operators v. NLRB (Michael Levee Productions, Ltd.), 593 F.2d 197 (2d Cir. 1979) is applicable here. That case also involved the hiring of a sound mixer who was not a union member. There the union official threatened unknown action (of a kind "for me to know") upon the hiring of the non-member, and the threat was found to be coercive. In Michael Levee the union made no mention of withholding the bug, a legal activity, but threatened some unknown action intending to coerce and resulting in the employer's refusal to hire the non-member. Here the union threatened only lawful activity—withholding the bug—if Blynder was hired. Also, Mulberry Square had manifested an intent from the beginning to hire Blynder only if his union membership was reinstated.

The Board puts great emphasis on the numerous occasions on which Bradford repeated his threat to recommend withholding of the bug. In his opinion the ALJ indicated that had there been only one comment, the threat may have been acceptable under the Act. The Board apparently found this to be indicative of the union's motive, or intent, to keep Mulberry Square from hiring Blynder. We regard the Union's objective, whatever it may have been, as irrelevant. As long as a union limits itself to threats of legal activity, it may do so for whatever reason it chooses. See Adams Insulation, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1446. Under the Act, a union is entitled to make honest statements that it intends to do a lawful thing, especially in response to inquiry by the employer.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

NLRB v. Gulf States Canners, Inc.

On remand from 585 F.2d 757

Before AINSWORTH, GARZA and SAM D. JOHNSON, Circuit Judges

PER CURIAM: We consider an application for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board which requires the respondent, Gulf States Canners, Inc., to bargain collectively with Local 891 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the victor in a representation election held among production, maintenance and quality-control employees working for respondent at its facility in Clinton, Mississippi. Gulf States has refused to bargain as means of challenging the results of the election, which it argues was unfairly influenced through the purchase of gasoline for employees by union representatives.

This is the second application for enforcement in this matter; we denied enforcement of the first after holding that the board had incorrectly based its decision on a consideration of whether the union, in purchasing the gasoline, had intended to influence the outcome of the election. The cause was remanded so that the board could apply a legal standard based upon effect rather than intent: "* * * the assay should seek to find whether the questioned action by an election candidate had a tendency to influence the outcome of the voting." N.L.R.B. v. Gulf States Canners, Inc., 585 F.2d 757, 759 (5 Cir. 1978). It was further noted:

> The tendency-to-influence test requires an examination of the challenged action in the light of all the relevant facts, including whether the size of the benefit bears a proper relationship to the actor's stated purpose in conferring it, the number of employees receiving the benefit, the views of the employees concerning the purposes of the payments, and the timing of the payments. Id.

The court stated that, as "the facts here are undisputed, and the application of the tendency to influence test presents strictly a question of law," no hearing would be necessary on remand.

The board has, on remand, complied with our instructions. Applying the tendency-to-influence test to the facts previously ascertained,[1] it concluded in a supplemental order that "the union's action in purchasing the gasoline for two eligible voters during its organizational campaign was not objectionable conduct and does not require setting aside the election herein."

In this election objection case, it is our duty to determine whether the board has acted within the "wide degree of discretion" entrusted to it by Congress in representation matters. See N.L.R.B. v. A.J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S. Ct. 324, 327, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946). This court has noted that a decision by the board "warrants special respect," and that review is limited to "a determination of the reasonableness of the board's finding." Contract Knitter, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 545 F.2d 967 (5 Cir 1977). The employer bears a heavy burden of rebutting the presumption that "ballots cast under the safeguards provided by board procedures reflect the desires of the participating employees."

[1] The relevant facts are summarized in the board's supplemental order of June 20, 1979, for which enforcement is sought:

> At the first union meeting, more than 1 month prior to the election, the union announced its offer to provide gasoline to employees who transported other workers to the union meetings and/or who campaigned on behalf of the union at their fellow employees' homes. After this meeting, one employee, designated as witness D in the regional director's report, requested gasoline from a union representative. According to witness D's account of this conversation, he asked, "Didn't you say you were buying gas?" to which the union representative replied, "No, I am not buying gas. I said if you knew of anyone who wanted to come to the meeting but didn't have a ride I would furnish the gas to get that person. Oh, do you want some gas?" Witness D at that point answered, "Yes," and the union representative said "Okay." The union representative then purchased approximately 12 dollars worth of gasoline for witness D. A week later, after the second union meeting, witness D approached the union representative and, as set forth in his affidavit, stated, "I need some gas," to which the union representative replied, "Okay, follow me." (At that time, the union representative again purchased approximately the same amount of gasoline for witness D). On this occasion, another employee, witness C, who had followed witness D and the union representative to the gas station, received approximately 7 dollars worth of fuel.

We cannot hold that the board abused its discretion in finding that the conduct alleged did not have such a tendency to influence the election that a new election is required. A simple showing of misconduct alone is not sufficient to mandate that result; the employer must also show that the acts "interfered with the employees' exercise of free choice to such an extent that they materially affected the results of an election." N.L.R.B. v. Gulf States Canners, Inc., 585 F.2d at 759. See also N.L.R.B. v. Sumter Plywood Corporation, 535 F.2d 917, 920 (5 Cir. 1976); N.L.R.B. v. Golden Age Beverage Co., 415 F.2d 26, 30 (5 Cir. 1969). The board was justified in holding that such an effect was not shown here.

ENFORCED.

Equitable Gas Company v. NLRB

637 F.2d 980 (3d Cir.), January 14, 1981—245 NLRB 260

On petition to review Board Order

Before ALDISERT, ROSENN and GARTH, Circuit Judges

982

GARTH, Circuit Judge: This appeal requires us to review an order of the National Labor Relations Board which determined that the Petitioner, Equitable Gas Company, had refused to bargain over its decision to subcontract customer remittance work. We conclude that on this record, Equitable's subcontract with Mellon Bank was not a mandatory subject of collective bargaining, and therefore Equitable did not violate Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (1976).

In order to increase its cash flow and save on overhead charges that might otherwise have to be passed on to consumers in a high energy cost context, Equitable entered into a contract with Mellon Bank on September 21, 1978, whereby, effective January 1, 1979, Equitable transferred to Mellon certain customer remittance work which theretofore had been performed by bargaining unit employees[1] in Equitable's Treasury Department. Prior to this transfer, Equitable had subcontracted out bargaining unit functions on several occasions, but at no time did these subcontracts result in any employee layoffs, although the bargaining unit jobs were eliminated.[2] Most significantly, in-house mail delivery has been permanently subcontracted to an independent company for the past nine years, resulting in the elimination of two bargaining unit messenger jobs. With regard to each subcontract, Equitable met with the union, informed the union of its decision to subcontract, and discussed the effects of the decsion upon bargaining unit employees. No objection or protest was over registered by the union respecting the contracting out of these collection functions.

The union, in turn, through negotiation of its collective bargaining agreements, had repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, sought to restrict Equitable's subcontracting right through collective bargaining. During negotiations in 1969—1970, 1971 and 1977, the union submitted to Equitable proposals which, if accepted, would have limited or prohibited Equitable from subcontracting any bargaining unit work. During the collective bargaining negotiations, these proposals were discussed, and in each instance were opposed by Equitable. Through the years, certain provisions in the collective bargaining agreements pertaining generally to transfers, lay-offs reassignments, probations, displacements, and the like, were negotiated and agreed to by the parties.[3] At no time prior to the 1980 collective bargaining agreement, however, did Equitable ever agree to a subcontracting clause in its collective bargaining agreement with the union.[4]

[1] The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 1956, AFL—CIO ("IBEW"), was and is the collective bargaining representative of about 320 Equitable employees, inlcuding the remittance clerks.

[2] The record reveals that the Mellon arrangement was one of a series of subcontracts made with various banks, including Mellon, to handle customer remittance work performed by IBEW bargaining unit employees. These previous arrangements were made when Equitable closed seven of its branch offices over a 13 year period.

Other subcontracts let by Equitable involved the performance of functions such as keypunching, drafting, clerical work, and field work dealing with investigations and the delivery of discontinuance notices.

[3] See, e.g., Art. IV, Sections M, N, O of the 1977 Contract (A. 223-24)

Prior to Equitable's subcontract with Mellon, Equitable's remittance clerks physically opened the mail, separated the enclosed checks from the accompanying billing coupons, forwarded the coupons to the computer room for tabulation, and processed the remaining checks. After the clerks balanced the checks and coupons, they forwarded the checks to the cashier for deposit. The actual deposits were made in the bank the following day by a contract messenger service. Under this arrangement, Equitable could process in one day only sixty percent of the checks received on any given morning.

Under Equitable's arrangement with Mellon, customer remittances are forwarded directly to a "lock box" maintained by Mellon, where they are picked up by Mellon's employees, and processed throughout the night. The system is almost entirely automated,[5] resulting in an acceleration of at least two days in the processing of payments and crediting of deposits to Equitable's Mellon Bank account. The Mellon system is therefore superior to Equitable's former procedure in that it provides a more efficient service, resulting in an acceleration of, and increase in, Equitable's cash flow, as well as improved updating of customer accounts. This accelerated system provides Equitable with an additional $700,000 per day in available hard cash, which reduces Equitable's need to borrow money on the market.

Prior to entering into the Mellon subcontract, Equitable had four clerks processing remittances. One clerk position had become vacant early in August, 1978, and was not filled. The remaining three employees affected were transferred to other departments in Equitable. They obtained equivalent or higher paying positions by exercising their seniority rights as provided in the collective bargaining agreement. No other jobs were affected and Equitable did not lay off any employees as a result of the Mellon subcontract.

Representatives of Equitable met with the union on three separate occasions. On September 21, 1978, Equitable's Assistant Treasurer explained the advantages that would result from the arrangement with Mellon. On September 25, 1978, Equitable informed the Union that negotiations with Mellon Bank had taken six to eight weeks to complete and that the remittance work contract had been signed with Mellon on September 21, 1978. The following day, the IBEW filed charges with the NLRB.

On October 16, 1978, when Equitable met with the union for the third time, the IBEW requested a copy of the Mellon contract and relevant cost data so as to enable the union to make a bid for remittance work on behalf of Equitable's employees. Equitable's Assistant Personnel Director rejected the union's request, stating that Equitable was not interested in obtaining any other "bids" for the job, as the cost of the Mellon operation was not a factor in the company's decision. The union representative walked out of the meeting and subsequently refused to discuss the matter further.

On November 28, 1978, the Regional Director issued a complaint alleging that Equitable had violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing to bargain over its decision to enter into the contract with Mellon, and by refusing to provide the union with a copy of the Mellon contract. A hearing was held on February 9, 1979, before an Administrative Law Judge.

[4] Prior to the argument in this case but after the briefs had been filed, Equitable and IBEW entered into a new collective bargaining agreement, effective from June 26, 1980 through June 2, 1982. Equitable moved to dismiss the NLRB's cross-application for enforcement of its order on the ground that this new agreement includes a clause governing Equitable's right of subcontract work, and therefore Equitable claimed the dispute underlying the NLRB's present order had become moot. The contract now provides:

> The Company will not contract out work that is regularly and customarily performed by the regular employees covered by this bargaining unit if such contracting out would cause, as a direct and immediate result, the lay-off of regular employees.

We reject Equitable's argument that the issues presented to us on this appeal are moot. Equitable has not agreed, and indeed vigorously opposes, the concept that under the relevant collective bargaining agreement, its subcontracts were subject to mandatory bargaining. Moreover, although its 1980 agreement with the union, which comes before us only in the context of a motion to dismiss and not as part of the reocrd, precludes the practice of subcontracting if employees would be laid off, it is undisputed that the agreement here had no such provision. Furthermore, none of the remittance clerks whose work is now performed by the subcontractor Mellon have ever been laid off. Hence, there is a substantial difference between the circumstances giving rise to the Board's order and the company's present circumstances. In addition, the Board, in its Affidavit responding to Equitable's motion, asserts that the union at no time "traded off" its rights under the Board's remedial order so as to obtain the 1980 contractual concession from Equitable. We need not decide these issues, however, in light of our ultimate disposition.

[5] The letters are mechanically opened, after which an operator physically separates the checks from the coupons. This physical separation by the operator is the only manual aspect of the entire operation; all other procedures are automated. The final product received by Equitable from Mellon is a magnetic tape showing all of the collections and a handmade deposit ticket.

In his May 15, 1979 decision, the ALJ concluded that Equitable had violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by not notifying the union prior to entering into the contract with Mellon, thereby depriving the union of an opportunity to bargain over Equitable's decision. The ALJ also determined that since Equitable had a duty to bargain over the contract, it should have provided a copy of the contract and the cost data sought by the union. The ALJ held that Equitable had committed independent Section 8(a)(1) and (5) violations by its refusal to supply this information. Moreover, although the ALJ declined to grant the General Counsel's request that Equitable be ordered to rescind its agreement with Mellon so as to restore the status quo ante, he entered a remedial order which required that Equitable bargain with the union over future decisions to subcontract work performed by its employees.

On September 24, 1979, the Board affirmed the findings and conclusions of the ALJ respecting the Section 8(a)(1) and (5) violations, but rejected his recommendation that a status quo ante order was inappropriate. The Board perceived "no undue hardship" to Equitable if the Mellon contract was voided (A. 6). It therefore modified the order entered by the ALJ and directed Equitable to reinstate its remittance clerk operation.[6]

Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), provides, in pertinent part, that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 * * *."[7] Section 8(a)(5) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively. The Board charged that Equitable had violated both sections of the Act by refusing to bargain collectively over its contract with Mellon. Equitable concedes it did not bargain with the union when it entered into the Mellon contract, but maintains that it had no duty to do so.

II

Equitable's petition thus presents essentially one critical question: is there substantial evidence to support the Board's findings which resulted in its determination that the Mellon subcontract was a mandatory subject of bargaining?[8] Our inquiry must therefore initially focus on whether a subcontract of customer remittance work under the instant circumstances constitutes a mandatory subject of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. In answering that inquiry, we must evaluate Equitable's conduct in terms of the Act's purposes, those factors deemed relevant in determining the need to bargain over particular subcontracting agreements, and the particular facts and circumstances presented by the instant record.

The Declaration of Policy set forth in Section 1 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 61 Stat. 136, 29 U.S.C. § 141 (1976), stresses the need to avoid "industrial strife which interferes with the normal flow of commerce." It goes on to state that a purpose of the Act is to "provide orderly and peaceful procedures for preventing the interference" by either labor or management with the legitimate rights of the other. The Supreme Court recognized the Act's emphasis on the "mediatory influence of negotiation" in the settlement of industrial disputes in its landmark decision, Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 210, 85 S.Ct. 398, 402, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964). The court there addressed the subject of subcontracts as they impact upon collective bargaining principles.

In Fibreboard, the employer gave the union notice of its intention to subcontract all of its maintenance work upon the expiration of the then existing collective bargaining agreement. The company had determined that substantial savings would be effectuated by such an agreement. In granting the Board's petition for enforcement of its order to reinstitute the company's maintenance operations and to reinstate the employees who had been engaged in maintenance work, the Court held that subcontracting which involves "the replacement of employees in the existing bargaining unit with those of an independent contractor to do the same work under similar conditions of employment" is covered by the phrase "terms and conditions of employmemt", and is thus a mandatory subject of bargaining under Section 8(d) of the Act.[9] Id. at 215, 85 S.Ct. at 405. The Court, however, carefully articulated the parameters of its holding: "Our decision need not and does not encompass other forms of 'contracting out' or 'subcontracting' which arise daily in our complex economy." Id. at 215, 85 S.Ct. at 405.

[6] Board member Truesdale was in agreement with the ALJ on all aspects of the decision, including the remedy. He therefore would not have required Equitable to rescind the Mellon contract or otherwise restore the status quo ante.

[7] Section 157 prescribes, among other things, that employees shall have the right "to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976).

[8] Two other questions are presented in Equitable's petition. The answers to both depend upon our disposition of the primary question: was the subcontract a mandatory subject of bargaining? In Section III, infra, of this opinion, we address Equitable's refusal to supply a copy of its Mellon contract and underlying cost data to the union, which is the subject of the second question presented in Equitable's petition.

In light of our disposition, we need not reach the third question presented in Equitable's petition, which concerns the propriety of the Board's status quo ante order.

Notwithstanding this caveat in the Court's opinion, Justice Stewart, joined by two other Justices, filed a concurring opinion in which he took pains to limit his endorsement of the majority opinion of the specific facts presented in Fibreboard. He emphasized the need for protecting managerial discretion with regard to those "decisions which are fundamental to the basic direction of a corporate enterprise," Id. at 223, 85 S.Ct. at 409. Stressing the narrow holding of the Court, Justice Stewart, stated:

> The Court most assuredly does not decide that every managerial decision which necessarily terminates an individual's employment is subject to the duty to bargain. Nor does the court decide that subcontracting decisions are as a general matter subject to that duty.

Id. at 218, 85 S.Ct. at 407.

B.

Following the Fibreboard decision, both the Board and various courts, when faced with "closing" or "subcontract" issues in a Section 8(d) context, inclined toward an approach which weighed the employees' interests against those of the employer. See, e.g., Westinghouse Electric Corp. (Mansfield Plant), 150 N.L.R.B. 1574 (1965); NLRB v. Royal Plating and Polishing Co., Inc., 350 F.2d 191 (3d Cir. 1965).

In Westinghouse, supra, the Board, one year after the Supreme Court's decision in Fibreboard, ruled that Westinghouse did not have to notify and consult with its union before contracting out work[10] that could be performed by its own employees. The Board, in emphasizing the need for flexibility in this area, set forth at least five relevant considerations which should be weighed in making such a determination:

> [B]earing in mind particularly that the recurrent contracting out of work here in question was motivated solely by economic considerations; that it comported with the traditional methods by which the Respondent conducted its business operations; that it did not during the period here in question vary significantly in kind or degree from what had been customary under past estab-

[9] Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act defines collective bargaining as "the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d) (1976).

In Brockway Motor Trucks v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 720, 725-26 (3d Cir. 1978), Judge Adams, writing for the Court, explained the content of a "mandatory subject of bargaining":

> A matter falling within the scope of Section 8(d)—namely, one involving "wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment"—is a mandatory subject of bargaining. In practical terms, the elaboration of the identity of mandatory subjects of bargaining is crucial, for such matters must be discussed in bargaining sessions before any unilateral action with respect to them is taken. If, for example, an employer proceeds on its own without submitting a mandatory subject to the bargaining process, it violates its duty under the NLRA, and its professed good faith in so doing will have no bearing upon the legality of its action. Moreover, if one party insists on the inclusion of such a subject in a collective bargaining agreement, the other party is obligated at least to discuss it. The converse of these propositions is also true. A permissive subject of bargaining need not be discussed at the bargaining table, and one party may not compel the other to address it as a condition of executing a collective bargaining agreement.

[10] Westinghouse contracted out the following work in the period covered by that proceeding:

> (1) about 400 maintenance subcontracts of which about 350 could have been performed by Respondent's maintenance employees; (2) about 800 contracts for tools and dies, most of which involved work within the capacities of employees in Respondent's tool-and-die department; (3) about 1,500 contracts awarded by the portable appliance division for the purchase of parts, of which 12 involved components previously manufactured at Mansfield; (4) about 5,000 contracts let by the major appliance department for purchase of components many of which could have been manufactured at the Mansfield Plant.

> lished practice; that it had no demonstrable adverse impact on employees in the unit; and that the Union had the opportunity to bargain about changes in existing subcontracting practices at general negotiating meetings—for all these reasons cumulatively, [sic] we conclude that Respondent did not violate its statutory bargaining obligation by failing to invite union participation in individual subcontracting decisions.

Id. at 1577.

Royal Plating, supra, involved a "plant closing" rather than a subcontracting arrangement. In that case, the court held that "an employer faced with the economic necessity of either moving or consolidating the operations of a failing business has no duty to bargain with the union respecting its decision to shut down." 350 F.2d at 196 (footnote omitted).

Thereafter, Brockway Motor Trucks v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 720 (3d Cir. 1978), traced the development and refinement of the Fibreboard doctrine through succeeding court decisions and Board interpretations. 582 F.2d at 727–731 Brockway has closed its Philadelphia facility, but had continued its operations in other areas. The court concluded that the determination as to whether an employer has a duty to engage in collective bargaining when shutting down a plant or a part of its operation, must "begin with the statutory commitment to collective bargaining and * * * proceed to balance the parties' interest in the decision at issue", focusing on the facts of each case. Id. at 731. The court in Brockway was unable to utilize this balancing approach, however, because it determined that the record lacked the firm, factual underpinning deemed necessary for such an analysis. Hence, for this reason, the majority opinion denied enforcement of the Board's order.[11]

More recently, the balancing approach announced in Brockway was applied in Electrical Products Division of Midland-Ross Corp. v. NLRB, 617 F.2d 977 (3d Cir. 1980), another case involving the partial closing of a plant. In weighing the union's interest in protecting its members' livelihood against the employer's interest in implementing its economic decisions with minimal interference or financial loss, the court held that a duty to bargain about the partial closing existed. It did so after stressing that although the union might not have prevented the closing, it could have made suggestions to minimize the effect of the closing on the workers. No countervailing considerations on behalf of the employer had been shown which would have overcome the presumption in favor of a duty to bargain.

Thus, it is now settled in the jurisprudence of this Circuit that when issues of subcontracting and partial closings are confronted in the context of the National Labor Relations Act, an initial presumption arises that they are mandatory subjects of bargaining. Applying the balancing analysis formulated in Brockway, this presumption can be overcome only if it appears that the empoyer's interests outweight the union's interests in a given situation. See Midland-Ross, supra, at 982. With these principles in mind, we turn to the record in this case.

C.

The ALJ, concluding that Equitable had violated its duty to bargain, relied almost entirely upon the criteria articulated in Westinghouse, supra. Ostensibly, he sought to apply the factors considered in Westinghouse, and to relate them to the Equitable-Mellon arrangement. We have difficult, however, in accepting his analysis. First, having established the frame-work for his examination, the ALJ failed to address all of the factors as they are discussed in Westinghouse. Second, and of greater importance, the findings which he made, and which the Board affirmed, leading to the conclusion that the Equitable-Mellon arrangement was a mandatory subject of bargaining, are not supported by substantial evidence, and therefore cannot be sustained. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Westinghouse, as we have previously observed, does not support a duty to bargain where the employer's unilateral action in subcontracting satisfies the following five criteria: (1) the recurrent subcontracting is motivated solely by economic considerations; (2) it comports with the company's traditional methods of conducting its business operations; (3) it does not vary significantly from prior established practices; (4) it does not have a demonstrable adverse impact on employees in the unit; and (5) the union had the opportunity to bargain about changes in existing subcontracting practices at general negotiating meetings.

[11] Judge Rosenn dissented, largely because he believed that NLRB v. Royal Plating and Polishing Co., Inc., 350 F.2d 191 (3d Cir. 1965), was controlling in that the closing of Brockway's Philadelphia facility was solely for economic reasons; no employees were replaced with others; and no anti-union animus existed.

The First Three Westinghouse Factors

The first criterion mentioned in Westinghouse is that the employer be motivated solely by economic considerations in contracting out work on a recurrent basis. This subject was never addressed independently by the ALJ. The second factor identified in Westinghouse is that the subcontract arrangement comports with "the traditional methods" by which the employer conducts its business operations. 150 N.L.R.B. at 1577. The third criterion stated is that the subcontracting arrangement not "vary significantly in kind or degree from what had been customary under past established practices." Id. at 1577.

These three factors are interrelated, at least in the instant case, and we therefore deem it appropriate to discuss them together. The same evidence which relates to Factor No. 1, requiring an economic motivation on the part of Equitable for "recurrent contracting out of work", is relevant to Factor No. 2, Equitable's traditional methods of operation, and Factor No. 3, Equitable's past established practices.

It is undisputed that Equitable's decision to subcontract its remittance work to Mellon was wholly governed by economic concerns looking toward increased efficiencies and increased, as well as accelerated, cash flow. The Mellon procedure also resulted in accelerated and more current updating of customer accounts. Moreover, if the economic motivations emphasized in Westinghouse had been intended as a contrast to anti-union motivation, it is clearly evident that this implicit "criterion" has been satisfied as well, for the record discloses a complete absence of any anti-union animus on the part of Equitable. See, e.g. Brockway, supra; Royal Plating, supra. Although recent decisions of our court suggest that the existence of an economic motivation behind a major change in the direction of a company may not, in and of itself, justify absolving an employer of the duty to bargain, see Brockway, supra, 582 F.2d at 738–40; Midland-Ross, supra, 617 F.2d at 982–83, the presence of economic considerations is nevertheless an important factor to be weighed in balancing the interests of the employer and the union. Cf. Royal Plating, supra, 350 F.2d at 196 ("an employer faced with the economic necessity of either moving of consolidating the operations of a failing business has no duty to bargain with the union respecting its decision to shut down").

Nor is it disputed that the subcontracts let by Equitable for years prior to the Mellon arrangement were motivated by similar economic concerns, and indeed in no instance until the present one did the union ever contest Equitable's right to contract out the particular functions which were the subject of these subcontracts. Equitable emphasizes, that under these circumstances, the Mellon subcontract can hardly be characterized as a "new, unprecedented threat" to employees, as the ALJ characterized it (A. 16). The company points out that Mellon's subcontract was the sixteenth in a series of subcontracts made with various banks in connection with the performance of Equitable's customer remittance work. Equitable claims that in each of these instances, it followed identical procedures with respect to its notice to the union and its bargaining over the effects of the particular arrangement. The record supports Equitable's contention. Equitable's brief states:

> Moreover, it is uncontested that over the past fifteen years the Company has consistently contracted other bargaining unit work to outside companies and the identical procedure of notice and effects bargaining has been followed (A. 15, 102, 104). This subcontracting has routinely occurred "every day continuing on a daily basis" (A. 103–104), has involved various bargaining unit functions, such as key punching, drafting, clerical work and mail delivery, and has resulted in permanent removal of work from the bargaining unit (A. 99–100, 102, 218)

Brief for Equitable at 16.

The ALJ, while recognizing that "the appropriate bargaining unit . . . had not over the years been insulated from the subcontracting of work performed by its members" (A. 15), nevertheless sought to distinguish the Mellon arrangement from the previous Equitable subcontracts, and found that the Mellon subcontract involved a type of subcontracting that had not been customary under past established practice. He concluded that the Mellon arrangement posed a threat to unit employees "insofar as it represented the first instance where unit work was removed and classifications eliminated due to technological advance" (A. 16). We do not agree that the evidence supports this determination.

As Equitable argues, and as the record discloses, Equitable's subcontracting practices through the years neither lacked in continuity nor were of a sporadic, recurrent nature.[12] To the contrary, the reduction of remittance clerk positions in Equitable's Treasury Department through subcontracting has been an ongoing process. Even apart from subcontracting of various bargaining unit functions on different occasions, Equitable had also entered into a series of subcontracts with various banks when it closed several of its branch offices, and had previously subcontracted its inhouse mail delivery operation, thereby permanently eliminating two bargaining unit messenger positions.[13] Moreover, the record reveals that the banks involved in the earlier fifteen subcontracts had developed a capacity for direct payment, (A. 91), which the Mellon subcontract entails.

Thus, our examination of the record fails to reveal substantial evidence supporting the ALJ's findings that Equitable's subcontracting operations were other than recurrent, that its decision to contract with Mellon varied significantly "in kind or degree from what had been customary under past established practice," Westinghouse, supra, 150 N.L.R.B. at 1577, and that the Mellon arrangement failed to comport with Equitable's "traditional methods by which [it] conducted its business operations," id. Indeed, the evidence is to the contrary, and in addition, it provides unequivocal support for Equitable's position that its motivation in entering the Mellon contract was dictated solely by economic considerations.

Westinghouse's Fourth Factor: Detrimental Impact on Employees

Although the Westinghouse decision does not single out any one of the five factors as being more significant than any other, a reading of subsequent subcontract cases impresses us that the most critical of the five criteria discussed in Westinghouse is the effect which the subcontract will have upon employees. See, e.g., American Cyanamid Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 356 (7th Cir. 1979); Brockway, supra; Western Massachusetts Electric Co. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 101, 106 (1st Cir. 1978); Puerto Rico Telephone Company v. NLRB, 359 F.2d 983, 987 (1st Cir. 1966); District 50, United Mineworkers of America v. NLRB, 358 F.2d 234 (4th Cir. 1966). Indeed, it appears that where there has been no adverse impact on existing working conditions an employer's decision to subcontract does not violate his obligations under Section 8(d) of the Act.

Here, the record clearly shows, and the ALJ accordingly found, that no layoffs resulted from the Mellon arrangement, which affected only three out of about 320 employees. The ALJ also found that the elimination of the remittance clerk jobs did not result in a diminution of earnings or loss of employment since the three affected employees were engaged by Equitable in other capacities, in which they received equal or greater salaries than they had formerly been paid.

Notwithstanding his findings that there were no layoffs and that the bargaining unit employees sustained no perceptible loss of employment or earnings, the ALJ found that the Mellon arrangement might generate a fear of future impairment of job opportunities. This "fear", which finds no expression in the record, led to the ALJ's conclusion that the employees suffered a significant detrimental impact by reason of the Mellon arrangement. His determination in this respect was predicated upon the nature of Equitable's past subcontracting expreience, and resulted in the ALJ concluding that Equitable's action, even if layoff free, should not be condoned if it "radiates against established employment interests in an unpredecented and fear inspiring fashion" (A. 15). We have earlier pointed out, however, that the ALJ's findings regarding Equitable's prior subcontracting experiences cannot be sustained, as

[12] The ALJ found that Equitable's "overall practice of contracting out work in the instant bargaining unit was sporadic, compartmentalized, and something less than the oft-repeated, readily anticipated means of operation contemplated by the line of decisions following Westinghouse." (A. 16)

they are not supported by the record. Thus, the very predicate upon which the ALJ determined that Equitable's employees were adversely affected, is gravely flawed.

The record facts are contrary to the findings and conclusions of the ALJ that the employees suffered by reason of the Mellon contract. Absent evidence to support a "demonstrable adverse impact on employees in the unit", Westinghouse, supra, 150 N.L.R.B. at 1577, we refuse to speculate about future impairment of work opportunity where the evidence does not support any such fact or conclusion.[14] See, District 50, UMW, supra.

Although we concede that the determination of what constitutes a "demonstrable adverse impact" may be difficult to explain, we are satisfied that where findings, fully supported by the evidence, reveal that no layoffs have resulted from the subcontracting practice and no diminution of earnings or loss of job opportunities have occurred, it cannot be said that the impact upon the employees was demonstrably adverse.

Westinghouse's Fifth Factor: Opportunity to Bargain at General Negotiating Meetings

In adopting the Westinghouse analysis, the ALJ did not address directly the fifth factor discussed in Westinghouse," . . . [did the union have] the opportunity to bargain about changes in existing subcontracting practices at general negotiating meetings * * *", Westinghouse, supra, 150 N.L.R.B. at 1577. The ALJ, however, did not focus on subcontracting as a bargaining issue in a negotiating context, but rather concentrated on whether the Union had "consciously yielded" or waived its right to insist on notice and bargaining. The ALJ's opinion addressing this issue reads:

> As for the negotiating history, the record merely discloses that during contract renewal sessions in 1969, 1971 and 1977 the Union proposed bans on the subcontracting of unit work. The proposals were discussed, though opposed by Respondent, and later dropped by the Union prior to entry of each succesive collective-bargaining agreement. Contrary to the Respondent, a Union's unsuccessful effort to obtain contract revisions imposing restrictions upon subcontracting greater than the duty of notification and consultation embodied in the Act, is not tantamount to a "conscious yielding." The more likely interpretation is that, in receding from a demand for more comprehensive restrictions, and joining an ultimate settlement of negotiations, the Union elected to rest upon its lesser statutory rights.[10] In sum, the Union's demands in past negotiations did not supplant the employees' right to the services of their representative with respect to Respondent's removal of unit work by sudden, unprecedented, unilateral action.
> [10] The fact that the Union was afforded an opportunity during contract negotiations to bargain with respect to subcontracting, though relevant to an assessment of whether the Westinghouse (Mansfield Plant) decision is controlling, does not independently satisfy Board requirements for a "waiver" of statutory rights. Here, that decision has been deemed inapposite on other grounds.

(A.17). We, on the other hand, need not address the subjects of waiver or conscious yielding. Our analysis requires no more than an evaluation of the union's opportunity to bargain, as one factor to be balanced in the overall determination of whether this subcontract was a subject of mandatory bargaining.[15] See Brockway, supra; Midland-Ross, supra.

[14] We have no occasion to decide whether Equitable's decision to subcontract with Mellon was solely an automation decision. Yet, we note that even where such automation decisions are unilaterally made by employers, it has been suggested by at least one commentator that the following standard shold be utilized to determine if such a decision requires bargaining within § 8(d) of the Act:

> [W]here a decision to automate will directly and foreseeably result in adverse impact on the bargining unit or its members, it should be a mandatory subject of bargining before its implementation. If adverse effects are neither immediate nor foreseeable, bargaining ought not be compelled.

Even under this standard, Equitable would not have been required to bargain with the union in light of the absence of evidence regarding a direct or foreseeable adverse impact on the bargaining unit or its members.

[15] The Press Co. Inc., 121 N.L.R.B. 976, 977-78 (1958), sets out the doctrine to which the ALJ adverted:

> It is well established Board precedent that, although a subject has been discussed in precontract negotiations and has not been specifically covered in the resulting contract, the employer violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act if during the contract term he refuses to bargain, or takes unilateral action with respect to the particular subject, unless it can be said from an evaluation of the prior negotiations that the matter was "fully discussed" or "consciously explored" and the union "consciously yielded" or clearly and unmistakably waived its interest in the matter.

Whether or not the ALJ's finding that the union had neither yielded nor waived its interest in subcontracting can be sustained is irrelevant in> * * * it is to be noted that no claim is made in this case that the Respondent has ever refused to honor a request for such bargaining; the sole issue before us is whether the Respondent transgressed its statutory obligation by not consulting with the Union about each of its thousands of annual subcontracting decisions which involved unit work. As one factor in the assessment of that specific issue, we take into account that the Union was in a position to, and in fact did, seek to negotiate adjustments in plant subcontracting policies. The relevant bargaining history thus shows, as already indicated, that the Union on three separte occasions sought contract language limiting the established subcontracting practice. Although discussion failed to produce agreement on such a provision, the Union did win agreement for improved benefits in the area of employment security. The fact that the Union does have an opportunity to bargain generally on request about Respondent's recurrent subcontracting practices, provides in our view a contributing, though not a controlling, reason for not imposing upon the Respondent the duty to bargain separately, at the decision-making level, about each of the thousands of individual subcontracts covering working that could be performed by its own employees.

Westinghouse clearly sets out the manner in which this last factor affects the ultimate balance. Westinghouse states:

As the ALJ recognized, the union in this case had sought prohibitions against the subcontracting of unit work during the contract renewal sessions in 1969–70, 1971 and 1977. In each instance, Equitable was successful in resisting these demands, and thus the collective bargaining agreement which governed the conduct of the parties during this dispute neither restricted nor defined the company's right to subcontract work without prior notice to the union.[16]

There is a striking similarity between the bargaining history of Equitable and its union, and the history reflected in the Westinghouse opinion. Both in Westinghouse and here, the unions sought to negotiate adjustments in plant subcontracting policies. In both situations, the unions, on three separate occasions, sought to limit through negotiation, the employer's subcontracting practices. In both situations, the unions won agreement under succeeding contracts for improved benefits. It is not unlikely that "the relinquishment of continuation of [these] restrictions may well [have] constitut[ed] the quid pro quo for some other contract objective." International Brotherhood, Local 249 v. Western Pennsylvania Motor Carriers Association, 574 F.2d 783, 789 (3d Cir.), cert denied, 439 U.S. 828, 99 S.Ct. 102, 58 L.Ed.2d 122 (1978).

We are aware, of course, that the opportunity to bargain is but one contributing factor to our overall analysis. Recognizing, however, that the union here, as in Westinghouse had, and continues to have, an opportunity to bargain generally respecting Equitable's subcontracting procedures, we find no reason to impose upon Equitable a duty to bargain separately about the instant Mellon subcontract.

D.

We have discovered no substantial evidence on our independent examination of the record which would support a finding that the Mellon subcontract constituted a significant variation from Equitable's past established practices, or that it was motivated by other than economic considerations. Most importantly, we have found no substantial evidence that the Mellon arrangement had a "demonstrable adverse impact" on employees in the unit. To the contrary, the evidence is otherwise. Finally, the evidence is uncontroverted that the union had the opportunity to bargain, and did bargain, about changes in Equitable's "existing subcon-sofar as a Westinghouse analysis is concerned. Westinghouse does not require an explicit waiver or a conscious yielding as a part of its formula. We observe that if it did, there would be far less need to assess or balance the other four factors identified in Westinghouse. As we read Westinghouse, it requires no more than an opportunity for the union to bargain generally about the employer's subcontracting practices. As we have stated in text, the union has exercised that opportunity since 1969, and indeed has finally succeeded in achieving its objective in the 1980 contract. See note 4, supra. Thus, in our view, the Westinghouse test as to this factor is less rigorous than the waiver test employed by the ALJ which, as we understand it, may exist as an independent ground for resolving a § 8(d) dispute. Because our analysis has proceeded along the Westinghouse track, a track which we believe the ALJ has also followed, we find no need to reach or decide any issue involving the union's waiver or "conscious yielding."

[16] Fortifying our conclusion that the subcontracting issue properly belongs on the bargaining table is the information we received after the record was closed in this case that the current agreement between the parties includes a subcontract clause. See note 4, supra.

tracting practices at general negotiating meetings. * * * ", Westinghouse, supra, 150 N.L.R.B. at 1577.

The Brockway and Midland-Ross decisions, however, instruct us that at least in a partial closing context, even where the motivation is purely economic, "there is an initial presumption * * * that a partial closing is a mandatory subject of bargaining." Brockway, supra, 582 F.2d at 735, quoted in Midland-Ross, supra, 617 F.2d at 982. Brockway has equated partial closing situations with subcontracting, and requires that the employees interests be balanced against those of the employer in order to resolve the duty to bargain. We need not devote extended discussion to such an analysis because we have already addressed each facet of the ALJ's findings which were adopted by the Board, and have found them wanting.

Although we recognize the employees' highly sensitive interest in job security, the record discloses that this interest has not been impaired. The record also shows that the employees have never been denied the right to be heard or negotiate over Equitable's subcontracting practices (see Section II C, supra, of this opinion). These two interests of the employees consequently have not suffered as a result of the Mellon arrangement. We acknowledge that the union has argued that bargaining over the Mellon contract would have permitted it to compete with Mellon insofar as costs of the remittance operation were concerned. Indeed, some suggestion appears that even though the expense would be substantial, a restructuring of the remittance office might have provided single-day banking if Equitable added a night shift and more armored car pickups.

The record, however, demonstrates that Equitable's concern has not been with costs [17] so much as it has been with increased efficiencies, updating of customer accounts, and the generation of a $700,000 daily cash flow. We cannot fail to recognize this concern when considering the operations of a gas company such as Equitable, in the context of our current energy difficulties.

As we have previously discussed, the record discloses no evidence of anti-union animus. It does disclose, however, a compelling motivation centered entirely on the economic considerations to which we have just adverted. It also discloses that this type of subcontracting practice has not been foreign to Equitable's operations.

On balance, therefore, we have no hesitation in concluding that the employer's interests in the benefits that accrued to it and to its customers from the Mellon arrangement far outweigh any interest which could be asserted by the three former employees of the remittance office.

The Board also affirmed the ALJ's conclusion that Equitable had committed an independent violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when it refused to furnish the union with a copy of the Mellon contract and underlying cost data relating to the arrangement. Our conclusion that the Mellon subcontract is not a mandatory subject of collective bargaining also disposes of these charges.

Information directly relevant to mandatory subjects of bargaining is regarded as "presumptively relevant", and must therefore be disclosed unless it is plainly irrelevant, Western Massachusetts Electric Co., supra. No obligation to provide information exists however, unless there is an obligation to bargain over the subject matter. See International Shoe Company, 151 N.L.R.B. 693, 699–700 (1965) (since union bargained away its right to require the company to negotiate transfer of work from bargaining unit, company is absolved from providing records pertinent to such a decision). Equitable therefore was not obliged to furnish the union with the information or document it sought. The Mellon contract and cost data information were neither presumptively relevant nor demonstrably germane to bargainable issues. See Western Massachusetts Electric Co., supra, 573 F.2d at 105, 107; International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. v. NLRB, 382 F.2d 366, 371–72 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1039, 88 S.Ct. 777, 19 L.Ed.2d 829 (1967).

As the Court stated in Western Massachusetts Electric Co., supra, 573 F.2d at 110:

> Just as a union cannot compel an employer to bargain over subjects that fall outside the ambit of "wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment," it cannot bootstrap a demand for information relating to these non-mandatory matters by its unilateral assertion of interest. Some action of the employer is necessary to make this kind of information relevant to bargaining.

[17] The Board's Brief admits that the record provides no reason to question Equitable's assertion that "the benefits it realizes from single-day banking make the comparative costs of processing bill payments at the bank or inhouse a relatively unimportant factor." Brief for Board at 17.

Moreover, data regarding subcontracting costs where bargaining is not required, is relevant only when lower costs are urged by the employer as a motivating factor behind the subcontracting decision. Such a rule affords the union an opportunity to evaluate the Company's economic claims. Western Massachusetts Electric Co., supra, 573 F.2d at 107. See also C-B Buick, Inc. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 1086, 1091 (3d Cir. 1974) (employer failed to bargain in good faith when it refused union's request for its financial data after employer had alleged it could not afford to accede to union demands).

As we have discussed in the preceding section of this opinion, the record here reveals that Equitable at no time asserted that the cost of contracting with Mellon to handle its customer remittance work was a factor in its subcontracting decision.

Thus, we do not agree with the ALJ's conclusion that the information and documents sought by the union were relevant. This being so, Equitable did not commit a violation of the Act by refusing to provide a copy of the Mellon contract or the cost data to the Union.

Our conclusion that Equitable did not violate Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to bargain over its subcontracting agreement with Mellon and by refusing to furnish the union with a copy of that agreement obviates any need to discuss the Board's status quo ante order which, by reason of our disposition, will be denied enforcement.

Having reached the conclusions expressed in the foregoing discussion, we will grant Equitable's petition for review and deny the Board's cross-petition for enforcement.

NLRB v. Hudson River Aggregates, Inc.

639 F.2d 865 (2d Cir.), January 14, 1981—246 NLRB 192

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FRIENDLY and OAKES, Circuit Judges, and OWEN, District Judge*

OAKES, Circuit Judge: This case, having as its principal issue whether an employer was properly treated as a successor, is here on a petition by the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order issued against Hudson River Aggregates, Inc. (HRA), on October 22, 1979. The Board, substantially adopting the recommended order of the Administrative Law Judge, directed HRA to cease and desist from certain unfair labor practices and to take affirmative steps to remedy its statutory violations. We grant the petition for enforcement.

FACTS

In early 1978 HRA bought two stone quarries, one each in Haverstraw and Tomkins Cove, New York, including the equipment and stockpiles, from Martin Marietta Aggregates, Inc. The contract of sale was executed on January 19, 1978, and the sale was closed effective March 1, 1978. HRA continued to operate the quarries in essentially the same manner as its predecessor had, with the exception of reactivating stone production at the Tomkins Cove quarry, which Martin Marietta had been using since 1975 simply for the sale of stockpiled stone. Because some of the equipment was in disrepair when Martin Marietta sold to HRA, production at the Haverstraw quarry did not begin until April 17, 1978.

For a period of at least thirty years, undisturbed by changes in the ownership of the two quarries, three separate units had represented the quarry employees. The truck drivers were represented by Local 445, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America; many of the other quarry employees were represented by Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL—CIO. The third bargaining unit at the quarries, Laborers Local 60, is not a party to this litigation.[1] When Martin Marietta terminated production and sold the quarries to HRA, it had collective bargaining agreements with each of these three unions. Out of a total of 57 Martin Marietta employees, 33 were Engineers Local 825 members, 8 were Teamsters Local 445 members, and 16 were represented by Laborers Local 60. Jay Boyle, president of HRA, was provided with copies of the collective bargaining agreements prior to the closing.

*Of the Southern District of New York, sitting by designation.

[1] On May 1, 1978, Laborers Local 60 petitioned the Board for an election. Action on that petition has been delayed pending the outcome of this unfair labor practices litigation.

HRA promised jobs to five of the drivers who had been employed by Martin Marietta. Nevertheless, when the business representative for Teamsters Local 445 called Boyle in late February and in early March to discuss representation of the drivers, Boyle said that he was not at that time prepared to discuss the matter and did not know whether he would ever be ready to do so.[2] Boyle said that his plans were not formalized and that the quarries might not open for a year. However, Boyle soon hired as plant superintendent the same person who had previously worked as superintendent for Martin Marietta and had a thirty-three-year history of employment at the Haverstraw and Tomkins Cove quarries. And between March 13 and March 17 Boyle hired four rank and file employees, none of whom had previously worked at the quarries. The president of Teamsters Local 854, an industrial union which at that time did not represent any employees of quarrying operations, notified Boyle on March 17 that the union had obtained authorization cards from these four employees and sought representative status. With only four employees on the payroll, Boyle immediately recognized Teamsters Local 854 as representative of all his employees and, after almost two weeks of contract negotiation during which no additional employees were hired, executed a three-year collective bargaining agreement with the union on March 28, effective April 1. The agreement contained a union security clause requiring all HRA employees to be members of Teamsters Local 854.

Almost immediately after execution of this agreement, HRA began hiring in earnest. The supervisory personnel remained essentially unchanged: of the four foremen hired, three had previously held supervisory positions and one had been a mechanic with Martin Marietta. On April 3 the company also hired 29 rank and file employees, 27 of whom were former Martin Marietta employees—18 members of Engineers Local 825 and 9 members of Laborers Local 60. One of the foremen advised these employees that they would lose their jobs if they did not sign Teamsters Local 854 authorization cards.[3]

On April 10, however, Engineers Local 825 informed Boyle that it in fact represented a majority of HRA's employees and asked the company to bargain. Boyle refused, saying the HRA employees were already represented by Teamsters Local 854. Also on April 10 the company hired one additional employee, who had not previously worked for Martin Marietta. And on April 17 the company hired 9 more men, 2 of whom were former Martin Marietta employees represented by Engineers Local 825, and 7 of whom had not worked for Martin Marietta. Thus, by the time production began at the Haverstraw quarry on April 17, HRA ahd hired a total of 43 employees, 29 of whom were former Martin Marietta employees—20 members of Engineers Local 825 and 9 members of Laborers Local 60. By November of 1978, HRA's work force had grown to 92 employees.

The five former drivers for Martin Marietta, to whom HRA had promised jobs, were not called in for work when production began on April 17. Instead, their jobs were filled by five new employees, hired that day, who had not previously worked at the quarries. Therefore, on April 17 Teamsters Local 445 filed charges against HRA with the Board, alleging unlawful discrimination against the five former Martin Marietta drivers and refusal to bargain. Teamsters Local 445 picketed HRA, and was subsequently joined by engineers Local 825, which also filed unfair labor practice charges against HRA. The picketing ended six weeks later, and the company hired the five drivers.

[2] HRA argues that testimony by the business representative for Teamsters Local 445, William Comiez, is illogical, is contradicted by Boyle's testimony, and is not worthy of belief. However, the Administrative Law Judge found that Comiez's testimony was not substantially contradicted by Boyle, and credited Comiez. Of course, a determination of credibility by an administrative law judge who has heard the witnesses' testimony is entitled to great weight and will be overturned only when the evidence to the contrary is very strong. NLRB v. Bausch & Lomb, Inc. 526 F.2d 817, 822 (2d Cir. 1975).

[3] Again, HRA argues on appeal that the foreman denied the allegations. But the Administrative Law Judge credited the testimony of three of the employees over that of the foreman, and we accept this determination by the examiner who heard the testimony.

The Board found that HRA had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3), by refusing to hire the five drivers, for the purpose of avoiding recognition and bargaining with Teamsters Local 445. Accordingly, the Board ordered HRA to make whole these employees for loss of pay suffered because of this discrimination. The Board further found that HRA had violated sections 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1)-(3), by prematurely recognizing Teamsters Local 854, and sections 8(a)(1) and (2), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1)-(2), by threatening employees if they did not sign Teamsters Local 854 authorization cards. The Board ordered the company to withdraw recognition from Teamsters Local 854 and to reimburse employees for fees and dues withheld from their pay pursuant to the union security clause. Finally, the Board found that HRA had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (5), by refusing to bargain with Engineers Local 825 and Teamsters Local 445, and ordered the company to recognize these unions as exclusive bargaining representatives of their respective units.

DISCUSSION

The Board properly found HRA to be a successor employer to Martin Marietta and therefore required to recognize and bargain with Engineers Local 825 and Teamsters Local 445. Section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5). Under the successorship doctrine, when a new employer takes over a business, but the employees' bargaining unit remains appropriate, the successor employer must recognize and bargain with the incumbent union. See NLRB v. Burns International Security Services, Inc., 406 U.S. 272, 281, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 1579, 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972). Relevant factors in determining whether a new employer is a successor, for purposes of bargaining obligations, include whether new employer is using the same supervisory personnel, equipment, and facilities as its predecessor, whether it is producing the same goods, and whether there is a substantial identity in the work force before and after the change in ownership. See Service, Hospital, Nursing Home and Public Employees Local 47 v. Cleveland Tower Hotel, Inc., 606 F.2d 684, 687 (6th Cir. 1979); IUEW v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 689, 694 (D.C.Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Middleboro Fire Apparatus, Inc., 590 F.2d 4, 6–8 (1st Cir. 1978). Successorship inquiries are very much related to the specific factual situation, Howard Johnson Co. v. Detroit Local Joint Executive Board, Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders International Union, 417 U.S. 249, 256, 94 S.Ct. 2236, 2240, 41 L.Ed.2d 46 (1974); Burns, 406 U.S. at 274, 92 S.Ct. at 1575, and continuity in the identity of the work force is one of the most important considerations, see Howard Johnson, 417 U.S. at 263–64, 94 S.Ct. at 2243–44; Cleveland Tower, 606 F.2d at 687; Nazareth Regional High School v. NLRB, 549 F.2d 873, 879 (2d Cir. 1977).

The Board in the instant case found that HRA is carrying on essentially the same business as its predecessor Martin Marietta did. HRA is performing the same quarrying operations on the same premises, using former Martin Marietta supervisors and equipment, and with employees performing essentially the same tasks as they did when the quarries were owned by Martin Marietta. Admittedly, HRA purchased a new stone crusher and planned to reactivate stone production at the Tomkins Cove quarry, where production had been halted in 1975, but a change in the scope of a business by a new employer does not, in itself, affect a successorship determination, see IUEW v. NLRB, 604 F.2d at 694; Middleboro Fire Apparatus, 590 F.2d at 8; Zim's Foodliner, Inc. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 1131, 1141 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 838, 95 S.Ct. 66, 42 L.Ed.2d 65 (1974). Rather, "[t]he essential inquiry is whether operations, as they impinge on union members, remain essentially the same after the transfer of ownership." IUEW v. NLRB, 604 F.2d at 694. The Board's finding that HRA's contemplated expansion of its production capacity did not alter the nature or structure of the enterprise is supported by substantial evidence and therefore will not be set aside. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488–91, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464–46, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); NLRB v. Bausch & Lomb, Inc., 526 F.2d 817, 822 (2d Cir. 1975).

Once it is established that HRA is continuing its predecessor's operations essentially unchanged, then the primary consideration becomes whether a majority of HRA's employees were formerly employed by Martin Marietta. This determination turns on which date is selected for examining the composition of HRA's work force.

The Board chose April 17 as the appropriate date, for that was when normal production at the Haverstraw quarry began, with a representative complement of 43 employees, which is comparable to the number employed by Martin Marietta when it sold the quarries to HRA. Indeed, the usual date selected for determining the bargaining obligations of a successor employer is the time of transfer of the business, when full operations begin. NLRB v. Ideal Laundry Corp., 422 F.2d 801, 804 (10th Cir. 1970) (per curiam); see Bellingham Frozen Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 674 (9th Cir. 1980) (successor employer's duty to bargain commences once it is clear that he intends to hire a majority of his work force from the ranks of his predecessor's employees), petition for cert. filed, 49 U.S.L.W. 3373 (U.S. Nov. 6, 1980) (No. 80-735); cf. Lammert Industries v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 1223, 1226 & n.5 (7th Cir. 1978) (employer must bargain with union when employees represented by the union are transferred to a new plant, even though the employer plans expansion and more employees subsequently are hired; "appropriate point of analysis is ordinarily the date the new facility opened and began full operations").

HRA argues, however, that its bargaining obligations should not have been determined until it reached its "full complement" of employees, more than six months later, in November 1978. It is true that the Supreme Court in Burns noted that in some situations.

> it may not be clear until the successor employer has hired his full complement of employees that he has a duty to bargain with a union, since it will not be evident until then that the bargaining representative represents a majority of the employees in the unit.

406 U.S. at 295, 92 S.Ct. at 1586. But we do not believe that an employer may always delay its bargaining obligations until it has expanded its business to the proportions contemplated when it purchased the enterprise. Although HRA contends that it did not hire a "full complement" of employees until November 1978, we have found no decision postponing determination of a successor employer's bargaining obligation for so long an interval following the commencement of its operations. Cf. Pacific Hide & Fur Depot, Inc. v. NLRB, 553 F.2d 609, 614 (9th Cir. 1977) (emphasizing that time at which successor employer held to have hired "full complement" was less than sixty days after it commenced operations). In this case, where HRA was not rebuilding a collapsed operation, but rather starting up the business essentially as it was when sold by Martin Marietta—though concededly HRA had plans for expansion—we think that the Board properly found that the 43 employees at work on April 17 were a representative complement of HRA's work force.

Certainly, the point at which a successor employer has hired a sufficient complement of workers for determining the employer's bargaining obligations will vary from case to case. In NLRB v. Pre-Engineered Building Products, Inc., 603 F.2d 134 (10th Cir. 1979), where the successor employer took over a collapsed business and had to rebuild both production demand and work force, the court held that bargaining obligations should not have been determined when the employer had hired only four employees. Because the predecessor employer had employed as many as 41 employees, the successor, according to the court, should have been allowed to hire more employees before its bargaining obligations were set. Indeed in that case, the successor had not taken over an enterprise in full operation, but rather was trying to rebuild a defunct business. See also Pacific Hide, 553 F.2d 609 ("full complement" can be determined only by considering the facts in each case; held that employee complement of 10 was not sufficiently representative, but that employee complement of 19—just one more than the predecessor's work force—which was reached a short time after the successor began its operations, was representative).

HRA took over an on-going business, continuing its operations essentially unchanged. The Board, in an effort to balance the objective of selection of a bargaining representative by the maximum number of employees with the objective of employee representation as early as possible, see Pre-Engineered Building Products, 603 F.2d at 136, decided that the April 17 start-up date was controlling. We agree that April 17 was an appropriate date to use for determining HRA's bargaining obligations. On that date, of the 43 employees, 20 were formerly members of Engineers Local 825, 9 were formerly members of Laborers Local 60, and 14 were, as far as the record shows, unaffiliated.[4] Since 5 of the 43 employees were truck drivers, the Board was justified in concluding that the 20 workers who were previously members of Engineers Local 825 constituted a majority of the persons employed as operating engineers on April 17. As a successor employer, HRA should have recognized and bargained with that union.

HRA has challenged the appropriateness of the three bargaining units at the quarries, asserting that a single, plant-wide unit is proper. However, the Board found the historic units to be appropriate, and this conclusion in supported by evidence in the record. The Board is given broad discretion to determine appropriate bargaining units, 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), and that determination will not be disturbed unless found to be arbitrary, see South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, 425 U.S. 800, 805–06, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976) (per curiam); IUEW v. NLRB, 604 F.2d at 695–96; Wheeler-Van Label Co. v. NLRB, 408 F.2d 613, 616 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 834, 90 S.Ct. 90, 24 L.Ed.2d 84 (1969). The bargaining unit approved by the Board need not be the most appropriate unit, only an appropriate unit. MPC Restaurant Corp. v. NLRB, 481 F.2d 75, 78 (2d Cir. 1973). And a successor employer's duty to bargain does not depend on prior Board election and certification of the incumbent union. Bargaining obligations are the same whether the union is certified by the Board or voluntarily recognized by the employer. See 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5), 159(a); IUEW v. NLRB, 604 F.2d at 695; NLRB v. Movie Star, Inc., 361 F.2d 346, 351 (5th Cir. 1966).

As for the five former Martin Marietta drivers, assured of jobs with HRA but then allegedly discriminated against because of their membership in Teamsters Local 445, we uphold the Board's finding of violations of sections 8(a)(1) and (3), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3); see Howard Johnson, 417 U.S. at 262, n.8, 94 S.Ct. at 2243 n.8; Bausch & Lomb, 526 F.2d at 821–22, as supported by substantial evidence in the record. Had these five drivers been on the job on April 17, the date selected for determining HRA's bargaining obligations, Teamsters Local 445 would have represented a majority of the employees in its unit, since there was no evidence that HRA intended to utilize more than 6 hauling units, and therefore HRA also violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (5), by refusing to recognize and bargain with Teamsters Local 445.[5]

Though HRA's position seems to be that its bargaining obligations should not have been determined until November 1978, it rather inconsistently asserts that it was proper for it to recognize and bargain with Teamsters Local 854 in March 1978, with only four employees on the payroll and before production had even begun. We affirm the Board's determination that premature recognition of Teamsters Local 854—that is, before HRA had hired a representative complement of employees—violated sections 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1)–(3). See NLRB v. Forest City/Dillon-Tecon Pacific, 522 F.2d 1107, 1108 (9th Cir. 1975). We also agree with the Board that HRA's threats to enforce the union security clause, contained in an agreement executed by a union which was not a legitimate representative of the employees, violated sections 8(a)(1) and (2), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1)–(2).

Because the findings of the Board are supported by substantial evidence, we grant the Board's petition for enforcement of its order.

[4] Of these 14 employees, none of whom had worked for Martin Marietta, 5 were truck drivers, hired in place of the 5 Teamsters Local 445 drivers who had been promised jobs with HRA.

[5] Of the 92 employees on the job in November 1978, 58 had not worked for Martin Marietta, though there is no evidence in the record as to what jobs these employees perform and therefore it is unclear into which of the three bargaining units each of these employees fit. Since the operations at the quarries are essentially unchanged, however, and the three unions have represented their respective bargaining units at these quarries for more than 30 years, it should not be difficult for HRA and the unions to determine which employees are members of which bargaining units. If they cannot do so, either the employer or the unions may file a unit clarification petition with the Board. While this might seem at first glance to be putting the cart before the horse, the problem was brought about by the employer's own conduct.

NLRB v. Local 58, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO

638 F.2d 36 (6th Cir.), January 16, 1981—241 NLRB 1202

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before LIVELY and MARTIN, Circuit Judges, and CECIL, Senior Circuit Judge

PER CURIAM: This case is before the Court on application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order issued April 22, 1979 against Local 58, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, reported at 241 N.L.R.B. No. 197. The Board found the Union violated the prohibition against secondary boycotts imposed by Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On November 1, 1977, Goossens, Inc. agreed to act as general contractor for construction of the Ukranian Community Center in Warren, Michigan, assisted by several subcontractors. The project site superintendent for Goossens anticipated possible labor problems because both union and nonunion contractors were working on the site. Signs were posted at each of the two entrances to the job site specifying who was to use which entrance. The Union placed a picket line at the main or general gate entrance. The picketers carried placards stating that one of the nonunion subcontractors, R-B & Sons Electric, was paying less than the prevailing rate for area. R-B notified the Union by mailgram that they should confine picketing activities to the entrance assigned to them. The Union continued to picket the entrance designated for use by R-B and the other nonunion employees.

The controlling factor in determining the legality of picketing is not its effect, but its object. Local 761, Electrical Workers v. N.L.R.B., 366 U.S. 667, 672-674, 81 S.Ct. 1285, 1288-90, 6 L.Ed.2d 592 (1961). If an object of the picketing is to bring pressure upon a neutral employer, then the activity is secondary and unlawful. We think the Union could have communicated its dissatisfaction with R-B's wage rates to R-B employees and suppliers in a meaningful way by using the entrance assigned to them. In this way the neutral employers and their employees would not have been involved so directly. We also agree with the Board that there is no merit to the Union's contention that it was not properly notified to use the reserved entrance.

The order of the Board will be enforced.

NLRB v. Armour-Dial, Inc.

638 F.2d 51 (8th Cir.), January 19, 1981—245 NLRB 959

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before ROSS, Circuit Judge, GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judge, and NANGLE, District Judge*

52

FLOYD R. GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on application of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) for enforcement of its order issued on September 28, 1979, citing Armour-Dial, Inc. (company) for unfair labor practices in violation of sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.[1] The company manufactures meat products and has a collective bargaining agreement with Local 617 of the Amalgamated Meatcutters and Butcher Workmen, AFL-CIO[2] (union). The Board's order arises out of a suspension of the union's executive committee. The order requires the company to cease and desist from unfair labor practices, to provide members of the executive committee with back pay, to expunge from its records all written reprimands issued to these employees, and to post an appropriate notice.

53

---

*The Honorable John F. Nangle, United States District Judge, Eastern District of Missouri, sitting by designation.

[1] The pertinent parts of those sections of the Act provide:

§ 8. Unfair labor practices

(a) it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7;

* * * * *

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.

(Section 7 provides: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations * * * and to engage in other concerted activities for * * * other mutual aid or protection * * *.")

[2] The name of the union was changed to United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, on June 7, 1979.

We conclude that enforcement of that order should be denied.

The facts are not in dispute. Article 21.2 of the contract between the company and the union, in effect at all relevant times, provided that: "[S]hould trouble of any kind arise in a plant, there shall be no strike, stoppage, slowdown, suspension of work or boycott on the part of the Union or its members or the employees * * *."

The company, for several years, obtained meat products from Iowa Beef Processors (IBP). In March 1977, a sister local of the union was engaged in a strike against one of IBP's plants. On March 30, union president, Ernest Nelson, and another union official, Norman Reed, met with company officials and stated that they did not want the company to handle IBP products because of the strike at the IBP plant. The company refused the union's request.

In June, on two separate occasions Nelson told company officials that he was going to tell the employees not to handle Iowa Beef products. The plant manager then distributed a notice to all employees that the company planned to continue purchasing Iowa Beef products; that neither the company nor the union could legally refuse to do business with Iowa Beef; that the union could not legally refuse to work under the circumstances; and that if there was a work refusal, "appropriate disciplinary action" would be taken. Repeated requests from the union to stop handling Iowa Beef products and repeated refusals by the company followed.

On November 4, when an Iowa Beef truck arrived at the company's loading dock, union president Nelson informed company officials that the employees were "not going to handle [the products] any longer." Company officials attempted to show Nelson that it was economically necessary for the company to purchase Iowa Beef products. Throughout the morning, Nelson spoke with various union representatives, at both the local and international levels. He persisted in his refusal to have the Iowa Beef products unloaded.

Union vice-president Buechel arrived at the plant shortly after noon and went to work. At about 2:00 p.m., Nelson and Buechel met with company officials, who told Buechel what had happened during the morning and repeated their claims of the economic necessity of handling Iowa Beef products. No agreement was reached. Finally, a company official stated that he was going to take Nelson and Buechel to the dock and order the forklift operators to unload the Iowa Beef truck. The company official continued that if they refused he would order Buechel, a qualified forklift operator, to unload the truck. Buechel said that he would refuse if asked. After additional discussion, Nelson indicated that the truck probably could be unloaded if a meeting between the union and the company officials were scheduled. Such a meeting was scheduled and, shortly thereafter, the Iowa Beef truck was unloaded.

On the following Monday, company officials, met with Nelson, Buechel, Norman Reed, chief steward, and Janet Stokke, Kenneth Stokke and Gerald Stromberg, members of the union executive committee. The company officials expressed their belief that the union officials had an obligation to prevent any work stoppage. The union officials, through president Nelson, expressed their intention to continue refusing to handle Iowa Beef products. The meeting ended.

On Tuesday, November 8, the plant manager held up an Iowa Beef delivery while he circulated another notice to all employees stating the company's position on refusals to handle Iowa Beef products. Sometime during the morning of November 9, the Iowa Beef truck arrived at the loading dock. At about 10:30 a.m., there was a meeting between several company officials and the entire union executive committee. Nelson reported that the union's position had not changed. The plant manager read a lengthy statement which reiterated the company's position that the company had an obligation and an economic need to conduct business with Iowa Beef and that the union could not engage in strikes or slowdowns. The meeting was adjourned.

At the loading dock, the dock foreman instructed a forklift operator to unload the Iowa Beef truck but he refused. The foreman then brought the forklift operator to a conference room where several company officials and the union executive committee, with the exception of Buechel and Ken Stokke, were convened. Employee Morris was asked to unload the Iowa Beef truck. He refused. The union officials were asked to instruct Morris to unload the truck. The union officials complied but Morris persisted in his refusals. Morris was asked why he was refusing. He replied, "I believe the Union has told you why." Morris was asked what he meant by that, but union president Nelson interjected, "Don't badger the witness." Morris was then told that he was suspended.

The company officials proceeded to ask three members of the union executive committee to unload the Iowa Beef truck. They each refused, stating that they were not qualified forklift operators. The meeting ended, to be reconvened at about 12:30 p.m. At this time, the union representatives were told that they were suspended pending further investigation.

A notice was then distributed to the employees, notifying them of a telegram sent to the union demanding their intervention to stop the illegal work stoppages and contract violations, and notifying the employees of the union committee members' suspension. The notice also made reference to secondary boycott charges which the company had filed against the union.[3] Within a few minutes of the time company officials began to distribute the letter, the employees walked out on strike.

Union president Nelson received a ninety-day suspension. Vice-president Buechel received a thirty-day suspension. Union executive committee members Reed, Stromberg, Janet Stokke and Ken Stokke received nine-day suspensions. Forklift operator Morris was also suspended.

A complaint against the company was issued on January 4, 1978. The complaint charged that the action of the forklift operators in refusing to unload the IBP trucks was not instigated by Nelson or the committee and that the company's action discriminated against the union officials solely on the basis of their position with the union. The administrative law judge (ALJ) found that the company had violated the National Labor Relations Act in its suspensions of Reed, J. Stokke, K. Stokke, and Stromberg, but dismissed the complaint insofar as it alleged that the suspensions of Nelson and Buechel were discriminatorily motivated. The NLRB adopted the ALJ's decision except for that portion which found that Buechel's suspension was not in violation of the Act because of Buechel's direct refusal to unload the IBP truck, if asked to do so. Thus, the Board held that, with the exception of President Nelson's suspension, the suspensions of the union officials violated the Act. We disagree, and therefore deny enforcement of the Board's order.

It is axiomatic that an employer may not discipline an employee merely because he or she holds a union office. Pontiac Motors Division, General Motors Corp., 132 N.L.R.B. 413, 415 (1961). Union office embodies the essence of protected concerted activities. See General Motors Corp., 218 N.L.R.B. 472, 477 (1975), enforced, 535 F.2d 1246 (3d Cir. 1976). However, there is a crucial distinction between discipline which is imposed because of union affiliation or office and discipline which is imposed for acts, otherwise punishable, which were committed or omitted while exercising union affiliation or office. See Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 738, 733 (3d Cir. 1979). Here, the union executive committee members were suspended not because of their status as union officers but because of their acts and omissions to act while holding union office.

The executive committee members attended meetings wherein the union president made threats of work stoppages if the company did not stop handling IBP products. These threats were illegal under section 8(b)(4) of the N.L.R.A. If employees who were not union officials had come in to threaten a work stoppage under these circumstances, they too could have been, and, we assume, would have been disciplined. To decide other than we do today would shield union officers from disciplinary measures to which they would otherwise be subject. This would be "neither fair, logical nor just." Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728, 733 (3d Cir. 1979).

Furthermore, we agree with the Seventh Circuit's reasoning in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979). There the court refused to enforce an order of the Board which held that > disciplining union stewards and a union officer more severely than rank-and-file employees for participation in an unlawful strike was inherently destructive of important employeee rights and hence a violation of §§ 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158-

[3] The union later entered into a settlement agreement with respect to the charges by posting a declaration of its intention not to force, encourage, or condone Iowa Beef Product slowdowns or work stoppages in the future.

.(a)(3) and (1), regardless of business justification and absence of anti-union motivation.

The Indiana & Michigan Electric court analyzed relevant Board decisions and stated:

> Until recently the Board has recognized that the higher responsibilities of union officials justify disciplining them more severely than rank-and-file members for participating in unprotected activity. A divided Board shifted to the contrary view in Precision Castings Co., 233 N.L.R.B. No. 35 (1977), and Gould Corp., 237 N.L.R.B. No. 124 (1978).

599 F.2d at 230. (Footnote omitted.)

The court continued: "As the Board said in [its prior] cases, union officials are subject to 'an even greater duty than the rank-and-file employees to uphold [the contract] provisions.' " 599 F.2d at 231. And finally:

> Differentiating between union officers and rank-and-file in meeting out discipline for participating in a clearly illegal strike did not penalize or deter the exercise of any protected employee right. We believe the employer was entitled to take into account the union officials' greater responsibility and hence greater fault, and that the resulting different treatment of union officials could not be reasonably considered inherently destructive of important employee rights.

599 F.2d at 232 (footnote omitted.)

The only two circuits which have been faced with applying the Board's principles enunciated in Precision Castings Co. and Gould Corp., to the effect that union officials should not be held to a higher standard than rank-and-file union members in avoiding contract violations, have declined to do so. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. V. NLRB, supra; Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979). The Board distinguishes those two cases from the case at bar in the following manner:

> In those cases, the Board held that union officials who merely participate in work stoppages with other employees may not lawfully be disciplined if the criterion for the discipline is their union status and not their misconduct as employees. Here, none of the four officials participated in or induced the work stoppages.

Board's Decision and Order, dated September 28, 1979, cited in the Board's Brief, p.

17, n.4. We cannot agree with the Board's conclusion that the union executive committee members did not participate in or induce the work stoppage in this case. Their presence at the meetings between the union and the company, coupled with their acquiescence in the union's position as espoused in those meetings by President Nelson, does constitute participation in and inducement of the work stoppage which followed. The executive committee lent active support to Nelson's threats, and it would be naive to think that they were not furthering the union's intent to foster an illegal boycott under the direction of the union president, Nelson. The role the committee played in inducing the work stoppage will not be overlooked even though the committee members chose to communicate their support in a non-verbal manner. The message coveyed to the company, in the actions taken and not taken by the committee members, was as clear as President Nelson's position, which was articulated in their presence.

The executive committee members acted in concert with their spokesperson, Nelson. Together they fomented the illegal work stoppage and together they should bear the consequences.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

SEYMOUR, Circuit Judge: The American Flint Glass Workers of North America, AFL-CIO, filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Bartlett-Collins Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5),[1] by insisting upon the use of a court reporter to transcribe negotiations as a precondition to collective bargaining. The National Labor Relations Board found the Company's action a violation of those sections. The Board ordered the Company to cease insisting to impasse on the presence of a court reporter during negotiations and interfering in any like manner with the Union's effort to bargain on behalf of the Company's employees. Pursuant to section 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), the Board seeks to enforce its order. We grant enforcement.

I.

A.

Background

In June 1974, the Board certified the Union as collective bargaining agent for the Company's employees. After seven bargaining sessions, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges against the Company. The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) found the Company in violation of section 8(a)(5) of the Act for refusing to bargain in good faith in the Union.

Thereafter, the parties met on July 29, 1976 for further negotiations. At the outset of the meeting, Harold E. Mueller, the Company's attorney and chief negotiator, announced the presence of a court reporter to ensure an accurate transcript. Mueller stated this was necessary in view of the prior unfair labor practice proceeding "in which there was some question about the accuracy of testimony concerning what had transpired at bargaining meetings." Rec., vol. I, at 116. The Union attorney, John M. Keefer, objected to the procedure. He felt a court reporter was unnecessary and costly and that his presence woud create a courtroom atmosphere, induce unnecessary speech making, and frustrate negotiations. After considerable wrangling, the Union proposed that the sessions be tape-recorded and later transcribed. The Company continued to insist upon a court reporter. After forty minutes of argument, the Union agreed to the use of the court reporter for that day's meeting, but continued its objection to his presence at future meetings.

Events giving rise to the instant proceeding

No further negotiations were held until after the Board, on June 13, 1977, affirmed the ALJ's decision that the Company had refused to bargain in good faith. See Bartlett-Collins Co., 230 N.L.R.B. 144, 96 L.R.R.M. 1581 (1977). On June 27, 1977, the parties agreed to meet in July for further negotiations. In a June 30 letter, Mueller informed Keefer that the Company intended to have an impartial court reporter transcribe all bargaining sessions, with the record binding on all parties. The Company offered to bear the entire expense. The letter stated that the Board decision, which allegedly rested upon credibility determinations, coupled with the possibility of further review of the Company's bargaining conduct by the Board and the courts, made an accurate record of the negotiations imperative.

In a July 8 letter, Keefer renewed the Union's objections to the Company's insistence on the presence of a court reporter at negotiating sessions.[2] As an alternative, Keefer proposed that each party be free to record bargaining sessions with its own recording equipment and to transcribe the recordings. The company rejected this counterproposal and continued to insist on recording of negotiations by a certified court reporter as a prerequisite to further bargaining. The Union filed the instant unfair labor practice charges on July 15, 1977, alleging the Company had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by insisting to impasse on this matter. The Board agreed. See Bartlett-Collins Co., 237 N.L.R.B. 770, 99 L.R.R.M. 1034 (1978).

On appeal, the Company argues enforcement should be denied because (1) the Board improperly

"(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title."

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5).

[2] The objections were based on the belief that the presence of a court reporter "at the bargaining table tends to interfere with and unduly impede negotiations and frank discussions between the parties," and would cause several members of the negotiating committee "feelings of discomfort, tension and reluctance to state their views" because they are not accustomed to proceedings where stenographic transcripts are made. Rec., vol. I, at 169.

found use of a court reporter during negotiations to be a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, and (2) the Board misconstrued the dispute to be whether a record should be made instead of simply how the record should be made.

II.

A.

The duty to bargain under Borg-Warner

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act states that "[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5). Section 8(d) defines collective bargaining, in pertinent part, as

> "The performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *."

Id. § 158(d). In NLRB v. Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corp., 356 U.S. 342, 349, 78 S.Ct. 718, 722, 2 L.Ed.2d 823 (1958), the Supreme Court read these two provisions together as "establish[ing] the obligation of the employer and the representative of its employees to bargain with each other in good faith with respect to 'wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment * * *.'" The Court held that the "duty is limited to those subjects, and within that area neither party is legally obligated to yield * * *. As to other matters, however, each party is free to bargain or not to bargain, and to agree or not to agree." Id. (citation omitted); accord, Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB 379 U.S. 203, 210, 85 S.Ct. 898, 402—403, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964).

Thus, the Court has divided bargaining proposals into two mutually exclusive categories, mandatory and nonmandatory subjects of bargaining. It is "lawful to insist upon matters within the scope of mandatory bargaining and unlawful to insist upon matters without." Borg-Warner, 356 U.S. at 349, 78 S.Ct. at 723. The good faith intentions of the insisting party do not affect how the proposal is categorized. The Court specifically stated in Borg-Warner that good faith does not entitle a party to insist upon nonmandatory subjects as a pre-condition to agreement. See id.

Application of the Borg-Warner standard

The Board concluded that the demand for the presence of a court reporter to record negotiations is not a mandatory subject of bargaining and that insistence to impasse on this issue is a violation of the Act. Bartlett-Collins Co., 99 L.R.R.M. at 1035-36. The Company attacks this finding as improper. It contends that neither the language of the Act nor policy considerations warrants the Board's interpretation.

In reviewing a Board decision as to whether an issue constitutes a mandatory bargaining subject, we must give "considerable deference" to the Board's judgment. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 495, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1848, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979). Congress delegated to the Board "the primary responsibility of marking out the scope of * * * the statutory duty to bargain," id. at 496, 99 S.Ct. at 1848, and the classification of bargaining subjects " 'is a matter concerning which the Board has special expertise.' " Id. at 495, 99 S.Ct. at 1848 (quoting Meat Cutters v. Jewel Tea Co., 381 U.S. 676, 686, 85 S.Ct. 1596, 1600, 14 L.E.2d 640 (1965)).

Enforcement of Board orders is denied when they have "no reasonable basis in law," are "fundamentally inconsistent with the structure of the Act," or "attempt to usurp major policy decisions properly made by Congress." Ford Motor Co., 441 U.S. at 497, 99 S.Ct. at 1849. But if the Board's construction "is reasonably defensible, it should not be rejected merely because the courts might prefer another view of the statute." Id.; accord, Latrobe Steel Co. v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 171, 176 (3d Cir. 1980).

The Board's decision that the presence of a court reporter during collective bargaining is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining is not vulnerable on any of these grounds. We cannot say the decision was without reasonable basis in law. The Board grounded its conclusion on the reasoning that the issue of a court reporter during negotiations does not > "fall within 'wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.' Rather these subjects are properly grouped with those topics defined by the Supreme Court as 'other matters' about which the parties may lawfully bargain, if they so desire, but over which neither party is lawfully entitled to insist to impasse. The question of whether a court reporter should be present during negotiations is a threshold matter, preliminary and subordinate to substantive negotiations such as are encompassed within the phrase 'wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.'"

While the Company argues that recording of bargaining sessions is not a threshold matter because it is such a part of the fabric of bargaining that it constitutes a term and condition of employment, we disagree. There is "no significant relationship between the presence or absence of a stenographer at negotiating sessions, and the terms or conditions of employment of the employees." Latrobe Steel Co., 630 F.2d at 176. It does not "settle an aspect of the relationship between the employer and employees." Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers of America v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 178, 92 S.Ct. 383, 397, 30 L.Ed.2d 341 (1971). Nor does it have a "direct, significant, relationship to wages, hours or terms or conditions of employment. A mere remote or incidental relationship is insufficient." NLRB v. Massachusetts Nurses Association, 557 F.2d 894, 898 (1st Cir. 1977). Accord, NLRB v. Columbus Printing Pressmen & Assistants' Union, 543 F.2d 1161, 1165—66 (5th Cir. 1976); Seattle First National Bank v. NLRB, 444 F.2d 30, 33 (9th Cir. 1971). Although there may exist some preliminary matter that is so inextricably interwoven with the substance of a contract that it constitutes a term or condition of employment, we need not decide that issue. It is clear the presence of a court reporter is not such a matter.

Nor is the Board's ruling fundamentally inconsistent with the structure of the Act or a usurpation of Congressional authority. The purpose of the Act is to foster collective bargaining and the resolution of industrial disputes. See 29 U.S.C. § 151; Fibreboard Paper Products Corp., 379 U.S. at 211, 85 S.Ct. at 403. It would undermine the policy of the Act to allow negotiations to break down over a threshold procedural issue such as this one. See Latrobe Steel Corp., 630 F.2d at 177. It would create a tool of avoidance for those who wish to impede or vitiate the collective bargaining process. See St. Louis Typographical Union, 149 N.L.R.B. 750, 57 L.R.R.M. 1370, 1371 (1964) (Fanning and Brown, concurring). Too often negotiations would flounder before their true inception. Id.

The Company argues that no honest bargainer can be disadvantaged by the recording of bargaining sessions. However, the Board and numerous experts in the field of labor relations believe that the presence of a court reporter "has a tendency to inhibit the free and open discussion necessary for conducting successful collective bargaining." Bartlett-Collins Co., 99 L.R.R.M. 1034, 1036 n. 9. See also Reed & Prince Manufacturing Co., 96 N.L.R.B. 850, 28 L.R.R.M. 1608, 1610 (1951), enforced on other grounds, 205 F.2d 131 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 887, 74 S.Ct. 139, 98 L.Ed. 391 (1953). It may cause parties to talk for the record rather than to advance toward an agreement. See Bartlett-Collins Co., 99 L.R.R.M. at 1036 n. 9. The proceedings may become formalized, sapping the spontaneity and flexibility often necessary to successful negotiations. See. id. When a court reporter is demanded over objection, bargaining is likely to begin on a discordant note. See Reed & Prince Manufacturing Co., 28 L.R.R.M. at 1610. The request may give notice that one party lacks confidence in the collective-bargaining process, anticipating litigation rather than agreement. See St. Louis Typographical Union, 57 L.R.R.M. at 1372 (Fanning and Brown, concurring). In sum, the process of "informed persuasion," NLRB v. Insurance Agents' Internationa Union, 361 U.S. 477, 490, 80 S.Ct. 419, 427, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960) (quoting Cox, The Duty to Bargain in Good Faith, 71 Harv.L.Rev. 1401, 140 (1958)), may be supplanted by the concern fo being a careful litigant.

The Company argues that recording bargainin sessions provides important benefits. It speeds bar gaining by freeing parties of the burden of note taking. It helps the parties in later construing and applying the final agreement. It is a source for the Board and courts to refer to in the event of litigation. And it allegedly promotes responsibility in bargaining by minimizing idle chatter, filibustering and intemperate behavior. In support of these contentions the Company notes that all of the Board's formal proceedings are transcribed.

Recording of bargaining sessions does have some positive aspects, but their value is not as great as the Company asserts when the recording is done over the objection of a part.[3] Making a verbatim transcript does not necessarily facilitate party interpretation of a labor contract and Board resolution of refusal-to-bargain charges. The parties remain "free to discuss points outside of the bargaining room and even while in bargaining sessions they are free to make 'off the record' statements." NLRB v. Southern Transport, Inc., 355 F.2d 978, 984 (8th Cir. 1966). Thus, the parties could continue to haggle over the meaning of the contract. In unfair labor practice proceedings, the Board would still be required to take testimony and make findings of fact as to what occurred when the parties were not speaking on the record. Moreover, the temperate and responsible bargaining the Company asserts would follow from the use of a court reporter may simply reflect a stultified process of negotiations and posturing for the record instead of the spontaneous, frank, no-holds-barred interchange of ideas and persuasive forces that successful bargaining often requires.

The Company's analogy to recording of formal Board proceedings is misplaced. The purposes of collective bargaining and those of the judicial process are not the same. Court reporters are an integral part of an adjudicatory hearing because they facilitate the main goal of adjudication, ascertaining the truth. Collective bargaining, on the other hand, "cannot be equated with an academic collective search for truth—or even with what might be thought to be the ideal of one." NLRB v. Insurance Agents' International Union, 361 U.S. at 488, 80 S.Ct. at 426. Agreement is the result of, among other things, the relative economic power of the opposing parties, reason, public opinion, accommodation, and persuasion. Id. at 489–90, 80 S.Ct. at 427. The pursuit of truth and justice is not always the guiding beacon in collective bargaining. The goal of ascertaining with 100 percent accuracy what was said in negotiations may be subordinate to other concerns, such as ensuring peaceful resolution of industrial disputes.

The number of cases in which bargaining parties resort to adjudication and in which resolution depends upon an accurate record of the bargaining process is small in comparison to the number of labor contracts negotiated. This fact supports the reasonableness of the Board's conclusion that any advantages from stenographic recording of negotiations are outweighed by the negative effects on the bargaining process of allowing one side to insist upon the presence of a court reporter.

There is not universal acceptance of this position. See Southern Transport, Inc., 355 F.2d at 982–83; Modjeska, Guess Who's Coming to the Bargaining Table?, 39 Ohio St.L.J. 415 (1978). But the critical inquiry is whether the Board's conclusion is a reasonable one. Under the deferential review accorded the Board in its " 'special function of applying the general provisions of the Act to the complexities of industrial life,' " NLRB v. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 266, 95 S.Ct. 959, 968, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975) (quoting NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 236, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1149–1150, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963), all that is necessary is that its construction of what is mandatory bargaining subject "is not an unreasonable or unprincipled" one. Ford Motor Co., 441 U.S. at 497, 99 S.Ct. at 1849. The Board has more than met that standard.

The reasonableness of the Board's construction is not altered because it reverses its previous rulings. The Board candidly admits that in prior cases it has, in effect, treated the issue of the presence of a court reporter as a mandatory subject of bargaining. See Bartlett-Collins Co., 99 L.R.R.M. at 1035. The Board formerly applied a good faith standard in deciding if a negotiating party's insistence to impasse on the presence of a court reporter at bargaining sessions constitutes an unfair labor practice.

[3] Also exaggerated in the Company's argument are the negative implications of the Board's holding. The Company contends that the ultimate effect of the Board's order is that no record of bargaining can be made, not even notes, memoranda, or minutes. The argument is frivolous. The Board limited its ruling to situations in which a party insists to impasse on the presence of a court reporter during negotiations or the use of a device to record those negotiations. See Bartlett-Collins Co., 99 L.R.R.M. at 1036.

See, e. g., Reed & Prince Manufacturing Co., 28 L.R.R.M. 1608 (1951).

It is not improper for the Board to change its position. Rather, it is appropriate for the Board to do so when its accumulated experience demonstrates that change is warranted:

> "The use by an administrative agency of the evolutional approach is particularly fitting. To hold that the Board's earlier decisions froze the development of this important aspect of the national labor law would misconceive the nature of administrative decisionmaking. 'Cumulative experience begets understanding and insight by which judgments * * * are validated or qualified or invalidated. The constant process of trial and error, on a wider and fuller scale than a single adversary litigation permits, differentiates perhaps more than anything else the administrative from the judicial process.' "

NLRB v. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. at 265-66, 95 S.Ct. at 967-968 (quoting NLRB v. Seven-Up Co., 344 U.S. 344, 349, 73 S.Ct. 287, 290, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953)). As long as the new position is fully explained and is a fair and reasoned one within the scope of the Board's authority, the Board may substitute it for a prior ruling. See id. 420 U.S. at 267, 95 S.Ct. at 968; Latrobe Steel Co., 630 F.2d at 177.

Nor can we agree with the Company that this new ruling violates judicial precedent. The case relied upon by the Company, NLRB v. Southern Transport, Inc., 355 F.2d 978 (8th Cir. 1966), did speak favorably of stenographic recording of bargaining sessions, but this was in relation to the court's decision that the insisting party's demand had been made in good faith. The Eighth Circuit did not consider whether the matter constituted a mandatory subject of bargaining. The only other circuit court addressing this issue found the use of a stenographer at bargaining sessions to be a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. See Latrobe Steel Co. v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 171 (3d Cir. 1980). In fact, the Third Circuit relied upon the Board's decision in this case in so ruling.

III.

The Company asserts that the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice was improper because the issue between the parties was how the record of bargaining was to be made, not whether one should be made at all. Apparently, the Company is alleging that both parties were insisting on some means of recording and that the Board unfairly blamed the breakdown in negotiations on the Company.

This argument is without merit. The record makes clear that only the Company insisted on recording the bargaining sessions. In the July 29, 1976 meeting, counsel for the union repeatedly objected to the presence of a court reporter. Finally, after forty minutes of wrangling, he agreed to the use of one for that meeting but he continued his objection regarding future meetings. In setting up the guidelines for the July 1977 meetings, the Company again introduced a demand for stenographic recording of the bargaining sessions. The Union continued its objection to the procedure. It was only "in the spirit of compromise" that the Union suggested electrical recording of the proceeding.

Even if the issue thereby became simply how to record, it was the Company that went to impasse. The Union made a counterproposal to the Company's demand for stenographic recording, but the Company was unwilling to budge, declaring that a court reporter's transcription was a precondition to further bargaining. Under these circumstances, the Board was justified in finding the Company failed to bargain in good faith.

Enforcement of the Board's order is granted.

Brown & Root, Inc. v. NLRB

634 F.2d 816 (5th Cir.), January 19, 1981—246 NLRB 12

On petition to review and cross-application for enforcement of Board Order

Before Wisdom, Rubin and Sam D. Johnson, Circuit Judges

Per Curiam: The National Labor Relations Board found that two Brown & Root employees were unlawfully discharged for engaging in concerted activity and ordered the employer to offer them immediate reinstatement and to compensate them for any lost earnings. We conclude that the NLRB's findings were supported by substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole and its legal conclusions were correct. Therefore, we enforce the Board's order.

Wayne Landry and Karl Ockmond worked for Brown & Root as journeymen pipefitters. On the morning of January 23, 1979, a crew of approximately twenty pipefitters, including Landry and Ockmond, were working on a dock that extended into the Mississippi River. Although some of the testimony was contradictory in other regards, all agreed that the wind was blowing a fine mist of rain from the direction of the river. Ockmond, who was operating an electric drill, and several other employees complained to a foreman about the hazards of working with electrical equipment in wet weather. Responding to the workers' complaint, the foreman requested that a safety supervisor inspect the dock area and evaluate the workers' safety. The supervisor inspected the equipment and concluded that it was safe to continue working.

Later that morning, the mist became a heavier rain shower. Ockmond, Landry and most, if not all, of the crew ceased work and sought shelter. Subsequently, the foreman came into the shelter to which the employees had retreated and ordered them to resume working. Amid some grumbling, most of the workers obeyed the instruction. Landry and Ockmond, however, refused to return to work. The foreman promptly fired both of them. The Board affirmed the finding of the Administrative Law Judge that Landry and Ockmond would have returned to work had the rain abated to the light drizzle or mist in which they had worked earlier that morning.

Brown & Root does not dispute any of the findings of fact made by the Administrative Law Judge and adopted by the Board. It contends, however, that the Board was incorrect, as a matter of law, in concluding that the actions of Landry and Ockmond were concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 157, and that their discharges violated Section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

Employees' activities are protected by Section 7 if they might reasonably be expected to affect terms or conditions of employment. The Supreme Court long ago established that employees' activities are protected when, as a concerted protest, they refuse to work in what they preceive to be unsafe or uncomfortable conditions. N.L.R.B. v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962). The twenty members of the crew, by seeking shelter from what they thought were unsafe working conditions, were engaged in protected Section 7 concerted activity. The quality of the work stoppage as concerted activity was not altered when, in the face of their foreman's demand, all the employees except Ockmond and Landry returned to work in the rain.

It is, of course, possible to construe the evidence in a different light. The employer contends that Ockmond alone refused to work, that this was an individual refusal to obey orders and that Landry joined only because he feared that he would become ill. There was, however, substantial evidence to support the view that the two were acting in concert. For concerted action to exist, Section 7 does not require a minimum sized congregation. Two individuals acting together to improve working conditions are acting in concert and are protected by Section 7. Because Ockmond and Landry were engaged in concerted activity, their discharges violated Section 8(a)(1) which makes it unlawful to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees engaged in protected activities.

In addition to the usual cease and desist order, the Board ordered Brown & Root to offer Ockmond and Landry immediate reinstatement and to make each of them whole for any earnings lost from their date of discharge. Brown & Root contends that the back-pay award was inappropriate because the employees had not sought reinstatement.

It is not our function to fashion remedial measures. That duty rests upon the Board, and we defer to its determination of the proper remedy for unfair labor practices. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271, 1283 (1941). The Board found that the work stoppage engaged in by Ockmond and Landry did not amount to a strike but a protected concerted activity that did not amount to a general work refusal. If found that they stood ready to return to work after the adverse weather conditions abated. It concluded that, in the face of the unlawful discharges, requests for reinstatement would have been wholly ritualistic and that Brown & Root was obligated to offer reinstatement to the employees without awaiting a demand for reinstatement by Ockmond and

Accordingly, the Board's order is ENFORCED in all respects.

[1] Because these employees were not strikers, we do not consider the propriety of the new remedial principle announced by the Board in Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 N.L.R.B. NLRB v. Half-Century, Inc. d/b/a Holiday Inn of Niles, Michigan

652 F.2d 612 (6th Cir.), January 21, 1981—241 NLRB 555

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before KEITH, BROWN and JONES, Circuit Judges

Petitioner, National Labor Relations Board, seeks enforcement of its bargaining order, the Board having found that respondent, Half-Century, Inc. d/b/a Holiday Inn of Niles, Michigan, was guilty of an unfair labor practice in that it improperly refused to bargain with a union with respect to the employees of the respondent. The Board's decision and order are reported at 241 N.L.R.B. No. 101.

The respondent, Half-Century, purchased this Holiday Inn on December 19, 1977, and at that time there was an existing contract with Local 103 of the involved union. Respondent concedes that, under the Act, it had the duty as a successor to bargain with the union as a representative of its employees although it was not bound by the existing contract which would not have expired for eighteen months. Respondent at the outset advised the employees that they would have all rights provided for in the past contract with some additional advantages with respect to taking their meals at their place of work.

During the period from the purchase of this property by respondent and down to the issuance of the complaint by the Board for alleged failure to bargain on April 4, 1978, there was considerable contact between the president of respondent and a representative of the union. There was not, however, any actual bargaining between them with the result that on February 9, 1978, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging refusal to bargain. The complaint issued, as stated, on April 4, 1978.

On April 7, 1978 a representative of respondent and a representative of the union met for bargaining purposes, and respondent indicated a willingness to sign a contract with the union that had been negotiated with the prior employer. The representative of the union, however, indicated that the union was unwilling to go along with the old contract and certain changes would have to be made. These negotiations continued on April 19, 20 and 21, 1978, with respondent continuing to offer to sign a contract containing the terms of the existing contract, but the union refused, both sides making some concessions as the negotiations went on.

On April 28, 1978, employees of respondent presented to it a petition, signed by two-thirds of the employees, asking that the union cease to be their representative. Upon receiving this petition, the employer, the respondent, broke off negotiations with the union.

The Administrative Law Judge and the Board found that respondent had committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain by the time the union filed such charge with the Board.

After consideration of the arguments, the briefs, and the entire record in this cause, we have reached the conclusion that the bargaining order should not be enforced. In the first place, in order to support a bargaining order, there must be a clear request by the union to bargain and a refusal to bargain by the employer. Under the circumstances presented here, we do not believe that there is substantial evidence to support the Board's contention that there was a refusal to bargain by the respondent.

We are also of the opinion that a bargaining order would be particularly inappropriate under all the circumstances presented here because it is without dispute that after respondent had begun its bargaining with the union, offering to sign a contract with the terms of the past one with some improvement from the point of view of the employees, and while such bargaining negotiations were going on from day to day, the employees of respondent presented a petition, signed by two-thirds of the employees, indicating that they no longer wanted the union to represent them. There is no finding by the Board and no contention made that such indication by the employees was in any way induced by the respondent. There is also no finding by the Board that the bargaining that occurred in April was not conducted in good faith. We do not believe it would be appropriate to enforce a bargaining order as between this respondent and the union when, during the period that bargaining was taking place between them, the employees on their own volition made the decision to terminate the union's representation of them.

It is therefore Ordered and Adjudged that the enforcement order of the Board be and the same is hereby denied.

Seligman and Associates, Inc. v. NLRB

On petition to review Board Order

Before Weick and Boyce F. Martin, Jr., Circuit Judges and Nixon, District Judge*

307

Boyce F. Martin, Jr., Circuit Judge: This case is before the Court on the petition of Seligman and Associates, Inc. for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board and on the Board's cross-application for enforcement of the order.

The unfair labor practices at issue here arose out of organizing activities by Local 79, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO and by various employees at apartment complexes managed by Scott Management Company, an unincorporated division of Seligman. On December 8, 1976, the union filed a petition for an election in a unit of all maintenance men, custodians, caretakers, and groundsmen employed at the 21 apartment projects managed by Scott. In a separate proceeding, Scott contended that this was not an appropriate unit and also that assistant managers at larger complexes were supervisors and not within the unit. After an extensive hearing, the Regional Director filed a decision on May 3, 1977 sustaining the unit. Scott's request for review of that decision is still pending before the Board because the Regional Director suspended proceedings when the union demanded a bargaining order without an election in the unfair labor practices case which is the subject of this appeal.

The consolidated unfair labor practice charges concern the company's actions during the period in which the organization activities occurred. Adopting the finding and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge, the Board found, inter alia: that Scott was an employer, within the meaning of the Act, of the employees at the 21 apartment projects; that Scott violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging David and Susan Younce for engaging in protected concerted activities, and by threatening employees with replacement by independent contractors because of the employees' union activities; and that Scott violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging Clarence Goold because of his union activities. Finally, the Board affirmed the finding that the employees comprised an appropriate unit but that a bargaining order was not justified because the union did not show that it represented a majority of the employees in the unit.

The Board's order requires Scott to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found, to reinstate and make whole the discharged employees, and to post notices at each of the 21 apartment projects it manages.

Scott contends on appeal that the Board erred in finding that an employer-employee relationship exists between Scott and these employees and that the employees comprised an appropriate unit. It argues that these findings were unnecessary and prejudicial to the company's pending appeal in the representation case, that they were improperly based on the record and decision in the representation case, and that they are not supported by substantial evidence. We think each of these arguments is without merit.

*Honorable John T. Nixon, United States District Judge for the Middle District of Tennessee, sitting by designation.

Scott argues that in light of the Board's denial of the requested bargaining order, it should have abstained from determining whether there was an appropriate unit. It is clear that Scott sought to remove the unit determination issue, which is the subject of its pending appeal in the representation case, from consideration in this unfair labor practices case. The Administrative Law Judge addressed the question, however, and our function is to decide whether his unit determination is supported by substantial evidence. The issue was relevant to the Board's request for a bargaining order and was fully litigated below. That the decision on the request for a bargaining order did not require a unit determination is of no concern to this Court.

The admission of the transcript and exhibits of the hearing in the representation case was not error. The Board need not permit complete relitigation of the unit determination issue. See Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL-CIO v. N.L.R.B., 365 F.2d 898, 905 (D.C. Cir. 1966). The Administrative Law Judge stated that she was not bound by the Regional Director's decision, and Scott was expressly permitted to call witnesses to testify with respect to the appropriateness of the unit.

The Board's findings of an employer-employee relationship and an appropriate unit are supported by substantial evidence in the record. There is ample evidence of Scott's full and centralized control over the employees and that the employees have the common interests necessary to comprise an appropriate unit. Moreover, we agree with the Board that the multicomplex unit would not be rendered inappropriate even if the complex owners are separate joint employers. See Archdiocese of Philadelphia, et al., 227 N.L.R.B. 1178. In addition, we find that the inclusion of the assistant mangers in the unit is supported by substantial evidence.

Scott further contends that three of the unfair labor practices found by the Board are not supported by substantial evidence. We disagree. As for the threats made by Marjorie Wrobel, we find it irrelevant that she was friendly with the employees she spoke to and that she eventually married one of them. Section 8(a)(1) prohibits any conduct, friendly or not, which interferes with the free exercise by employees of their rights under the Act. The other two contested findings are firmly supported by the consistent pattern of hostility toward the protected activities by manager Saunders.

Scott also contends that the claims of the Younces that they were illegally discharged are barred by the statute of limitations, by express waiver, and by the doctrine of estoppel. We disagree. Personal service of the charge upon Manager La-France at Eureka Townhouses within the six month limit constituted sufficient and timely service upon Scott. See N.L.R.B. v. Clark, 468 F.2d 495 (5th Cir. 1972). We also agree that the prior withdrawal of the same charge does not constitute a waiver thereof, and we find no waiver of the claim in the record. Finally, we find no reason to invoke the equitable doctrine of estoppel to preclude the Younces from filing the charge a second time.

Finally, the Board's reinstatement order has not been mooted by Scott's partial compliance with it. In addition, we find no reason to conclude that the order to post notices at all of Scott's apartment projects is improper.

Accordingly, the order of the Board should be enforced.

Six Flags Over Mid-America, Inc. v. NLRB

638 F.2d 59 (8th Cir.), January 21, 1981—246 NLRB 682

On petition to review Board Order

Before HEANEY, Circuit Judge, GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judge, and ARNOLD, Circuit Judge

PER CURIAM. This case is before the Court upon the petition of Six Flags Over Mid-America, Inc., to review and set aside a bargaining order of the National Labor Relations Board. The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement and the International Union, United Plant Guard Workers of America, has intervened on behalf of the Board. We enforce the order of the Board.

On November 20, 1978, the Union filed with the Board a Petition for Certification as collective bargaining representative for a small group of security guards at Six Flags' amusement park in Eureka, Missouri. On January 18, 1979, an election was held among the employees; six ballots were cast for the Union and seven against. The Union filed objections, which were resisted by Six Flags on several grounds. In a report issued on February 14, 1979, the Board's Regional Director overruled some of the Union's objections and directed that a hearing be held on others. Before the hearing could be held, however, Six Flags and the Union entered into a stipulation setting the first election aside, and a rerun election was scheduled.

About three weeks prior to the rerun election, Six Flags sent its employees a letter notifying them of the stipulation and the impending second election. The letter explained that the stipulation was entered in order to expedite matters and was not an admission of wrongdoing on the part of Six Flags. Shortly after they received the letter, several guards gathered in their lounge at work. At that time, two Union adherents, Gerald Walters and John Rodden, referred to the letter as, in essence, an admission of guilt by Six Flags.

The rerun election was held on March 15, 1979; the Union won by a vote of six to five. Six Flags objected to the election, primarily on the basis of the statements of Walters and Rodden. The objections were overruled by the Board and the Union was certified. Nevertheless, Six Flags refused to bargain with the Union and, pursuant to a charge filed by the Union, the Board's General Counsel issued a complaint alleging that Six Flags had violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) & (5). Six Flags asserted that its refusal to bargain was justified because the Board had improperly overruled its objections to the rerun election. The Board rejected Six Flags' contentions, however, ruling that the conduct of Walters and Rodden was unobjectionable because it was not attributable to the Union and because it was not the type of conduct that would warrant setting aside the election. The Board then issued the bargaining order that is the subject of the dispute in this case.

Six Flags bases its case for reversing the Board on a series of National Labor Relations Board rulings involving union or employer attempts to mischaracterize Board action or otherwise abuse the Board process in order to influence the outcome of an election. See, e.g., Kinney Shoe Corp., 105 L.R.R.M. 1093 (1980); Gulton Industries—Femco Division, 240 N.L.R.B. 546, 100 L.R.R.M. 1321 (1979); Formco, Inc., 233 N.L.R.B. 61, 96 L.R.R.M. 1392 (1977); Dubie-Clark Co., Inc., 209 N.L.R.B. 217, 85 L.R.R.M. 1322 (1974).

We agree, however, with the administrative law judge's conclusion that the cases relied upon by Six Flags are clearly distinguishable from this case. Here, the statements were made at an informal gathering of employees and were a natural response to the employer's letter. They were in no real sense characterizations of Board action, but were, as the administrative law judge found, "clearly expressions of personal opinion easily recognizable by the electorate as such, and were readily susceptible of evaluation by the employees, all [of] whom had a copy of [Six Flags'] letter to assist that evaluation." Moreover, Walters and Rodden, though they supported the Union, cannot be considered Union agents for purposes of evaluating the conduct in question here. Their personal opinion on Six Flags' motivations must not be viewed as Union efforts to improperly influence the election. It would simply not be possible to monitor the personal, informal expressions of every employee who happens to have pro or anti-union inclinations.

Accordingly, the application to enforce the bargaining order of the National Labor Relations Board is hereby granted.

Randall, Burkart/Randall Division of Textron, Inc. v. NLRB

638 F.2d 957 (6th Cir.), January 22, 1981—240 NLRB 263

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before KEITH and MERRITT, Circuit Judges, and CELEBREZZE, Senior Circuit Judge

MERRITT, Circuit Judge: This case concerns objections of petitioner Randall, Burkart/Randall Division of Textron, Inc. (Randall) to various aspects of a decertification election held in its Blytheville, Arkansas plant. In September and early October 1977 the union representing the employees at the plant engaged in a strike because of its inability to negotiate a new collective bargaining agreement.

Randall hired replacement workers, and outbursts of violence occurred during the strike. On October 21, 1977, five days after the strike was settled, an employee petitioned for decertification of the union as the bargaining representative at the plant. At that time the union represented the two units of employees at the plant—the tool and die unit with eighteen employees, and the production and maintenance unit with approximately 700 employees. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent of Election approved by the Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board, the election was held on November 16, 1977. The union lost representation of the tool and die unit but won the production and maintenance unit by a vote of 333 to 285, with 69 eligible voters not casting ballots. Randall filed six objections several days later, and after investigation in December 1977 the Regional Director overruled the objections in their entirety. In March 1978, after Randall filed exceptions to the Regional Director's decision, the Board ordered hearings concerning two of Randall's original objections and adopted the Regional Director's decision overruling the other four. In June 1978 after a hearing, the Hearing Officer recommended that the two objections be overruled and the union be certified. In August the Board adopted the Hearing Officer's findings and certified the union.

Randall refused to bargain upon request from the union and was then charged with engaging in unfair labor practices in violation of the National Labor Relations Act. In January 1979 the NLRB granted summary judgment against Randall, stating that it would not relitigate issues raised in a prior representation proceeding absent special circumstances or newly discovered evidence. The Board issued an order requiring Randall to bargain with the union. Randall seeks judicial review of the order, pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f), and the Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order under 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). This court has jurisdiction because Randall's main place of business is in Cincinnati. 29 U.S.C. § 160(f).

We begin by recognizing that the NLRB has been entrusted with a broad range of discretion in supervising representation elections and establishing their procedures. Thus, generally the role of a reviewing court is limited to determining whether that discretion has been abused and whether the Board's findings are reasonable. Harlan #4 Coal Co. v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 117, 120 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 986, 94 S.Ct. 2390, 40 L.Ed.2d 763 (1974); NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172, 180 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 338, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967). The party—here Randall—that seeks to overturn an election bears the heavy burden of demonstrating that it was not fairly conducted. Harlan #4 Coal Co., supra, at 120; NLRB v. Bostik Div., USM Corp., 517 F.2d 971, 975 (6th Cir. 1975).

Randall's appeal rests upon three of its original objections—numbers one, two, and six. We have no trouble in upholding the Board's decision concerning objection two, in which Randall contends that union agents engaged in campaign activities on the day of the election in the "no-electioneering" zone at Randall's plant. Such activities have been considered violations of NLRB rules of a magnitude requiring the vacating of election results. Michem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968); Vitronic, Inc., 183 NLRB 1067 (1970). The Hearing Officer, however, found that the union agents engaged in no improper conduct. In doing so, she weighed conflicting testimony of various witnesses brought by both parties and explicitly made a credibility resolution in favor of the union's witnesses. Such a resolution is entitled to great weight by a reviewing court. This court has stated that "[t]he Board's choice between two conflicting views may not be set aside even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo," NLRB v. Bendix Corp., 299 F.2d 308, 310 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 827, 83 S.Ct. 47, 9 L.Ed.2d 65 (1962), and that "[i]f [the Hearing Officer's] finding was supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, the reviewing court is not free to substitute their judgment." Westchester Plastics of Ohio, Inc. v. NLRB, 401 F.2d 903, 907 (6th Cir. 1968). Randall has not satisfied the burden necessary to overturn the finding of the Hearing Officer on this issue.

Objection six is that the misconduct throughout the "critical period" prior to and during the election resulted in the election's being held in "an atmosphere of coercion, confusion and fear" and "totally destroyed the effective exercise by the employees of the right to vote." The Hearing Officer and the Board considered evidence concerning events in the "critical period," restricted to the time from the filing of the decertification petition through the completion of the election. The Board found that Randall's evidence described only innocuous and isolated events insufficient to support the charge that the election was held in an atmosphere of coercion and confusion, and insufficient to require vacating of the election. On review, when looking at events in the defined critical period, we find that the Board's determination is supported by substantial evidence.

Randall argues, however, that the Board improperly restricted the critical period in refusing to consider pre-petition events. Acknowledging that the NLRB has established a rule, for the purpose of administrative convenience, against considering pre-petition activities, Ideal Electric & Mfg. Co., 134 NLRB 1275 (1961), Randall argues that the rule is not absolute and that it should not have been followed in this case, in which the effects of the violent strike that preceded the petition influenced the election. Despite the Ideal Electric rule, the Board does consider pre-petition conduct on occasion, but only when there is significant post-petition conduct related to or continuing from pre-petition events. Parke Coal Co., 219 NLRB 546 (1975). To consider whether evidence of pre-petition events is to be admitted, the Board must consider the nature of post-petition conduct. If that conduct was insignificant or consisted of isolated incidents, it would be pointless for the Board to burden the hearing with additional evidence concerning pre-petition matters. The Board did not act in a capricious or arbitrary manner in declining to admit and consider pre-petition conduct in this case, because the later conduct was of a minor nature. The casual relationship urged by Randall is weak.

Randall's position is weak also because it consented in early November, shortly after the strike terminated, to hold the election only two weeks thereafter. Aware of the recent violence, it had ample opportunity to consider whether the ill effects of those events would dissipate in so short a time. A later election date could have been requested. To accept Randall's subsequent complaints would be to permit it to gamble in agreeing to an election, knowing that it need not accept results it later found unsatisfactory. This would encourage careless decisionmaking at the time elections are planned, would undermine the significance or representation elections as determinative events, and would encourage reliance upon protracted post-election remedies.

The most difficult issue concerns objection one, in which Randall claims that the procedures established by the NLRB agents to conduct the elections were not followed, resulting in an atmosphere of confusion and fear at the polls. Randall now objects both to the Board's refusal to grant an evidentiary hearing on this objection and to the Board's decision on the merits overruling the objection. One of Randall's main arguments is that the NLRB abused its discretion, violated its own regulations, and ignored several prior holdings of this court because it failed to have the full record transmitted to it from the Regional Director and thus failed to have the full record before it when deciding this issue. The Board reviewed the objection solely on the basis of the Regional Director's report and Randall's exceptions thereto, failing to have transmitted to it the various affidavits accumulated by the investigating Board agent upon which the Regional Director's report was based.

The regulations that the Board has allegedly violated are found at 29 C.F.R. §§ 102.68 and 102.69(g). Together they state that stipulations, documentary evidence, transcripts of oral arguments before the Regional Director, exhibits, affidavits, etc., are all considered part of the record to be transmitted to the Board. This court has on several recent occasions condemned the NLRB's practice of refusing to have the full record transmitted, for, even if it does not expressly violate the regulations, the practice allows the Board greater opportunity to abuse its discretion and complicates the problems faced by the reviewing court. Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302 (6th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. RJR Archer Inc., 617 F.2d 161 (6th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir. 1980).

The present case, however, is distinguishable from the Prestolite line of cases. Hearings in this case were held concerning objections two and six, at which Randall submitted evidence concerning matters relevant to objection one. The evidence for objection six, in fact, the Hearing Officer concluded, was "coextensive" with that for objection one, for they both concerned conditions and alleged misconduct during the election. In deciding that the evidence failed to support Randall's other objections, the Hearing Officer in effect came to the same conclusion for objection one. Unlike Prestolite, whose circumstances provided no alternate method for the aggrieved party to supply evidence and construct the record necessary for review, the present case allowed Randall overlapping opportunities to do so. Therefore, granting Randall yet another opportunity to present the same evidence would serve no purpose but delay.

Randall argues that the Board nonetheless improperly decided that a hearing on objection one was unneccessary. Review of this question is governed by NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 338, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967). In that case this court held that according to the applicable regulations in a consent election (such as the one challenged by Randall), the Board need order a hearing only when "substantial and material factual issues" are raised. Id. at 177, quoting 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(f). The court continued:

> In order to raise "substantial and material factual issues," it is necessary for a party to do more than question the interpretation and inferences placed upon the facts by the Regional Director. [Citations omitted.] It is incumbent upon the party seeking a hearing to clearly demonstrate that factual issues exist which can only be resolved by an evidentiary hearing. The exceptions must state the specific findings that are controverted and must show what evidence will be presented to support a contrary finding or conclusion.

This test is not met in the present case. Review of the Regional Director's report on objection one reveals that he accepted as true much of the testimony favorable to Randall or held that it was unnecessary to choose between conflicting testimony. Regardless of how the evidence was viewed, it failed to support Randall's assertions, which were held therefore to be without merit. In addition, Randall's exceptions to the Regional Director's decision on objection one fail to raise "substantial and material factual issues." Many of the exceptions challenge the conclusions or interpretations of fact made by the Regional Director, and according to the Tennessee Packers such exceptions do not support a request for a hearing. Randall did present some exceptions challenging specific factual findings. These, however, were either insignificant to the point that reconsideration of those claims could not affect the outcome, or unsupported by specific evidence that would urge "a contrary finding or conclusion," as required by Tennessee Packers. In NLRB v. Bata Shoe Co., 377 F.2d 821 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 917, 88 S.Ct. 238, 19 L.Ed.2d 265 (1967), upon which Randall relies, the employer presented specific evidence of more severe procedural irregularities that demonstrably affected the election results. Randall, in contrast, in this as in the other issues, fails to support its claims with anything more than general assertions that the election must have been adversely affected.

Finally, we hold that on the merits of objection one Randall has failed to satisfy the burden necessary to overturn the Board's conclusion. Randal described various events at the election—pushing threats, and foul language among the voters, disruption of the voting schedule, an initial failure t provide for two lines of voters, and an instance o a Board agent's becoming flustered—to support it assertion that the election was held in an atmosphere of confusion and fear. The Regional Director, however, found that the evidence failed t demonstrate that these occurrences interfered wit the voters' exercise of free choice or inpugned th integrity of the election. The Board upheld the Regional Director. This decision does not constitute an abuse of discretion, and we, therefore, will n disturb it.

Having found no merit to the arguments presen ed by Randall, we deny its petition to set aside t NLRB's order. The Board's cross-petition for forcement of the order is granted.

Haddon House Food Products, Inc. and Flavor Delight, Inc. v. NLRB

rehearing denied February 28, 1981; certiorari

On petitions to review Board Order

Before LUMBARD, Senior Circuit Judge for the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, and MIKVA and GINSBURG, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge MIKVA

MIKVA, Circuit Judge: Haddon House Food Products, Inc., is a small wholesale distributor, owned and managed by one Harold Anderson. Flavor Delight, Inc., is an even smaller spice company, owned and managed by his son, David Anderson. Together, the two companies are the Employer in this proceeding seeking review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (Board).

On November 13, 1975, Local Union 115 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union) commenced an organization drive among the employees of the Employer. On the following morning, two employees who had been active in the Union drive were summarily fired, as were two other employees who had signed Union authorization cards. Later that same day, three other card-signers were laid off.

The conflict triggered by these events formed the basis of a complaint issued by the Board's general counsel, charging a number of violations of the National Labor Relations Act (Act). After a hearing, an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) found that the Employer was guilty of an "outrageous and pervasive" system of unfair labor practices. Although the ALJ found that the Union had never obtained authorization cards from a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit, he nevertheless recommended that the Board issue a bargaining order because the Employer's conduct had been so pervasive and coercive that a fair election could not be held in the foreseeable future. The Board accepted and extended the ALJ's findings of unfair labor practices, but was sharply divided on the bargaining order remedy recommended by the ALJ, and ordered instead a variety of alternative remedies.[1] The Union and the Employer each petitioned for review, and the Board cross-petitioned for enforcement. For reasons set forth in this opinion, we are prepared to enforce the Board's order only if one of the remedies proposed therein is modified.

I. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE FINDINGS

There is little dispute that the conduct engaged in by the Employer to abort the Union's organizing effort was egregious and effective. The Employer promised benefits to induce the employees to avoid the Union, and both threatened and carried out discharges and layoffs as a penalty for union activity. After the fired workers began picketing, the Employer initially offered them reinstatement.[2] When they sought to accept the offer, after a few days' delay, the strikers were met by security guards and dogs who denied them entrance to the plant. While the ALJ did not consider the denial of reinstatement an unfair labor practice, the Board did. This is the only unfair labor practice finding challenged on appeal,[3] and we conclude that there was ample evidence in the record to sustain the Board's determination.

[1] Haddon House Food Products, Inc., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 180, 101 L.R.R.M. 1294 (1979). Members Murphy, Truesdale, and Penello formed a majority in refusing to issue a bargaining order. Members Truesdale and Jenkins and Chairman Fanning formed a majority in favor of the order for which enforcement is sought here. Member Murphy opposed some of the union access remedies imposed, while Member Penello criticized the breadth of the remedial order in general terms.

[2] The Board found that the Employer had "sent literally a barrage of letters and telegrams to individual discriminatees and to the employees striking in support." Joint Appendix [hereinafter cited as J.A.] 47. The Employer later informed strikers "that their 'suspensions' were rescinded and directed them to report to work by November 28," or, in some cases, December 1. Id. Some of these letters were received after the deadline had passed, and others were never received.

[3] The Employer does not appeal from the findings that it unlawfully discharged or laid off seven employees, as mentioned above; that an eighth was fired for merely chatting with the picketers; that two employees were subjected to slightly veiled threats of discharge; and that the company president promised a pay increase in order to quell unionism shortly after the first seven firings.

Unfair labor practice strikers—those whose absence from the workplace is prompted by employer conduct that is found to constitute an unfair labor practice—are entitled to reinstatement if they make an unconditional offer to return to work. N.L.R.B. v. International Van Lines, 409 U.S. 48, 93, S.Ct. 74, 34 L.Ed.2d 201 (1972). The ALJ found that the strikers' offer was conditional because they had resolved not to return unless they were all taken back. The Board, however, found that the Employer's reason for denying reinstatement had nothing to do with that condition; indeed, the Employer was unaware of any condition when the employees sought to return. The Employer denied them reinstatement, the Board found, because they had not met the deadline set in the Employer's offer of reinstatement. Reinstatement conditioned on such a deadline is not the reinstatement to which these employees were entitled under the Act.

The testimony in the record amply supports the Board's finding that the Employer denied reinstatement because its deadline had not been met. And the law amply supports the Board's conclusion that, having denied reinstatement for invalid reasons of its own, the Employer cannot now claim that a subjective resolve of the strikers, never communicated to the Employer, robbed the employees' return of its unconditional nature. The actual basis of the Employer's conduct is determinative. See, e.g., Lodges 743 & 1756, International Association of Machinists v. United Aircraft Corp., 534 F.2d 422, 458 n.61 (2d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 825, 97 S.Ct. 79, 50 L.Ed.2d 87 (1976); Snow v. N.L.R.B., 308 F.2d 687 (9th Cir. 1962).

The Board's unfair labor practice rulings were well-founded. Indeed, the record convinces us that the Employer's conduct constituted "a well-orchestrated antiunion campaign that featured repeated and egregious violations * * * of the Act," J.A. 59 (concurring opinion of Chairman Fanning and Member Jenkins). The hard question is how to remedy such conduct in the case at bar.

II. THE MINORITY STATUS OF THE UNION

Where a union has enjoyed the support of a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit, the Board's remedies for serious employer misconduct frequently include an order directing the Employer to bargain with the union. In the instant case, however, the record does not support the Union's contention that it has achieved majority status. The parties agree that the Union had obtained twenty-seven authorization cards signed by employees. The Board found that there were more than fifty-three workers in the bargaining unit, so that twenty-seven cards cannot demonstrate majority support.

The ALJ had found at least fifty-nine employees in the unit. The Board concluded that the ALJ had counted three employees twice, and so found that there were at least fifty-six employees in the unit. Our own inspection of the record suggests that a fourth employee may have been counted twice.[4] Even so, the Union was at least one card short of majority status.

The Union claims that these figures include three other employees who should have been excluded from the unit because they were supervisors within the meaning of the Act. We turn to that contention.

Section 2(3) of the Act excludes from the statutory definition of employee "any individual employed as a supervisor." 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) 1976). Section 2(11) in turn defines supervisor as > any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

29 U.S.C. § 152(11) (1976). This court has reminded litigants that application of this definition requires an attentive eye to the realities of the workplace and not a "wooden reading," since [a]lmost any employee 'directs' other employees in some fashion at some time." Food Store Employees Local 347 v. N.L.R.B., 422 F.2d 685, 690 (D.C.Cir. 1969). Moreover, accurate estimation of supervisory status is a factual judgment facilitated by the expertise of the Board, and "[t]he substantial evidence standard for review of agency fact determinations * * * takes on special significance where the issue lies so squarely within the Board's ambit of expertise." Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers v. N.L.R.B. 455 F.2d 237, 241 (D.C.Cir. 1971), cert. denied. 404 U.S. 1039, 92 S.Ct. 713, 30 L.Ed.2d 730 (1972) (citation omitted).

[4] The fourth employee is Albert Romano, compare J.A. 31 with J.A. 805. The ALJ and the Board were willing to exclude arguendo a number of possible unit members, including alleged supervisor Paul Papp and his daughter Paula. This left the ALJ with 59 employees, J.A. 32, corrected by the Board to 56, J.A. 50 n.7.

We begin with the Union's challenge to the Board's finding that Angelo Patelo is not a Flavor Delight supervisor. The record shows that, although he is paid more than some fellow employees, other rank-and-file workers earn more than he does. While he occasionally communicates orders from management, he does not have other supervisory, disciplinary, or hiring powers. He performs manual work side by side with other employees. These are hardly the facts on which the Board's determination can be overturned. The same is true regarding John Morrow, the Employer's oldest employee and one who may have had some authority at some time in the past. Partly because of his age, Morrow has trained another employee, Paul Masi, to take over his major responsibilities. The ALJ concluded that whatever authority Morrow had once exercised was now exercised by Masi, and that such authority did not suffice to make either of these men a supervisor.[5] Finally the Union challenges Michael Diamond as a supervisor; the Board found that, although he may have routed some trucks on occasion, he was essentially serving as a truck driver. In each of these instances, the Board's conclusions on a record of conflicting claims are well within the measure of the substantial evidence test.

In addition, the Union has challenged that inclusion in the unit of Paul Berman, son of the general supervisor Jack Berman. As the Union pointed out at oral argument, it is difficult to identify the qualities that distinguish Paul Berman from an executive's daughter who was ruled ineligible for inclusion in a bargaining unit in a recent Board case. See Pandick Press Midwest, Inc., 251 N.L.R.B. No. 58, 105 L.R.R.M. 1161 (1980). Certainly neither the ALJ nor the Board relied on any factor that would assist us in reconciling these decisions. While every case turns on its own facts, the Board cannot apply distinctions whimsically. It is not necessary, however, to decide whether this employee should be a unit member, since there are fifty-four workers in the unit even if he is excluded. The Union had cards from only twenty-seven, and half a unit is not a majority. See N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 581 n.2, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1923 n.2, 23 L. Ed.2d 547 (1969). We agree with the Board that the Union never demonstrated the majority status under the Act that would make a bargaining order appropriate under Board precedents. We must therefore go on to consider the entire gamut of remedy issues presented by this case.

III. THE BOARD'S REFUSAL TO ISSUE A BARGAINING ORDER

The ALJ recommended that the Board order the Employer to recognize and bargain with the Union, despite the fact that the Union had never demonstrated majority status. The ALJ found this remedy necessary because he saw no "rational expectation that a fair election among the employees can possibly take place in the foreseeable future." J.A. 36. He may be right, and the Employer's conduct may have so poisoned the well that traditional democratic processes of election and designation by authorization cards are no longer viable options. But the Board has never issued a bargaining order in favor of the union without a showing that, at least at one time, the union had the support of a majority of the employees in the unit, and the Board was unwilling to order such relief in this case. We uphold the Board's refusal.

There is language in one Supreme Court opinion suggesting that the Board's power of fashion remedies might extend to such an order, this dictum appears in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), where the Court approved the Board's practice of issuing bargaining orders when the majority support of a union, as demonstrated by a showing of authorization cards, had been dissipated by serious unfair labor practices. The Court's discussion of remedial options made reference to three categories: category three included violations not serious enough to warrant a bargaining order because an election could still be held; category two included conduct tending "to undermine majority strength and impede the election process;" and category one included conduct so "outrageous" and pervasive" that a fair and reliable election would be impossible. The Court held that the Board could impose a bargining order in category two cases if a card majority had been shown, and mentioned without [5] Masi, it may be noted, was a union adherent, and was considered a unit member by the Union, and challenged by the Employer. It all depends on whose supervisor is being gored.

apparent disapproval a Fourth Circuit dictum suggesting that bargaining orders in category one cases would not require a majority showing. 395 U.S. at 613–14, 89 S.Ct. at 1939–40. Since that time, commentators have hotly debated the extent of the Board's power in category one cases.[6]

As indicated above, the Board has never granted such a bargaining order. The Board Members announced different rationales for their restraint in this case, and the Union focuses on their disagreement as necessitating a remand. Two Members of the Board agreed with the ALJ that a bargaining order was necessary. Two other Members were of the opinion that, while such an order might be appropriate in some circumstances, this was not such a case. Finally, Member Penello did not believe that the Board was ever authorized to issue a bargaining order in favor of a union that had never obtained the adherence of a majority. Since his was the determinative vote, the Union argues that the Board did not fully exercise its judgment, and asks us to remand the case to the Board after holding that Member Penello has been misled by an error of law. This request is, of course, premised on our agreeing that a bargaining order is proper for a minority union in some cases. We are not so sure we agree, and, in any event, are not prepared to fill in the interstices of Gissel on the facts of this case.

It is true that Member Penello, in providing the vote necessary to the majority decision on this point, opined that the Board should never order an employer to bargain with a minority union. In stating his views, he referred to his opinion in United Diary Farmers Cooperative Association, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 179, 101 L.R.R.M. 1278(1979), remanded, 633 F.2d 1054(3d Cir. 1980).[7] In that exposition, he explored the subject at length, emphasizing his belief that the majority rule principle of section 9(a) of the Act was too fundamental to be sacrificed. He insisted that his fellow Members' resolution of the conflict between majority rights and remedial needs was fraught with danger for employee freedom of choice. He claimed that the congressional intent expressed in the statute precluded bargaining orders for minority unions and, as his arguments demonstrate, this perceived legislative policy judgment coincided with his own.

In an appropriate case this court may have to confront squarely the dilemma raised by Member Penello. This is not, however, a confrontation to be precipitated hastily, involving as it does the danger of unjustifiably imposing a bargaining representative against the will of the employees. The free choice of the employees is best determined through the inexorable logic of a secret ballot election. The Supreme Court has recognized that "the election process ha[s] acknowledged superiority in ascertaining whether a union has majority support," Linden Lumber Division v. N.L.R.B., 419 U.S. 301, 304, 95 S.Ct. 429, 431, 42 L.Ed.2d 4659 (1974). Where employer misconduct has destroyed the possibility of a free election, the Court has approved the Board's reliance on authorization cards as "the most effective—perhaps the only—way o assuring employee choice," Gissel, 395 U.S. at 602 89 S.Ct. at 1934. But for a government body t bypass the employees altogether, and impose a bargaining representative merely on the basis of it own assessment of the employees' needs, woul pose a serious threat to employee freedom c choice.

We do not believe that such a conundrum shou be resolved, even preliminarily, in the abstract. W are being urged to decide this important questic merely in order to remand this case to the Boa so that Member Penello can restate in slightly d ferent terms the concerns that he has already e pressed. We decline to do so. The Board has suf ciently articulated its conclusion that, whether not this remedy may be justified in some hypothetical situation, a majority of the Board agrees that it is not appropriate in this case.

[7] On review, the Third Circuit, without lengthy discussion of the necessity for a remand, held that the Board did have the power to issue bargaining orders to minority unions "if the employer has committed such 'outrageous' and 'pervasive' unfair labor practices that there is no reasonable possibility that a free and uncoerced election could be held." At 1069. The court reserved judgment on whether the power existed even "when there is no reasonable possibility that the union would have attained an election majority but for the action of the employer," obs ing that in the present case, "a reasonable possibility exists." Id. n.16. do not share that court's confidence that the Board's authority broad, and we are not persuaded that the Board's decision was predic wholly on the nonexistence of this legal authority.

IV. THE BOARD'S REMEDIAL ORDER

We turn at last to the actual remedies imposed by the Board. The Employer challenges most of these as improper or unneccessary. Before reaching the merits of the Employer's arguments, we must consider whether a procedural obstacle bars the Employer from raising them.

A. The Procedural Hurdle

When the Board rejected the ALJ's recommendation of a bargaining order, it substituted an extensive list of alternative remedies. Neither the general counsel nor the Union as charging party had taken exception to the ALJ's failure to impose these remedies. When they finally appeared in the Board decision, the Employer did not petition for reconsideration.

The Board argues that this court is precluded from hearing the Employer's objections, even though these remedies were imposed sua sponte by the Board, because section 10(e) of the Act provides that "[n]o objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976). It has been observed that this requirement "affords the Board the opportunity to bring its labor relations expertise to bear on the problem, so that [the court] may have the benefit of its opinion when we review its determinations." N.L.R.B. v. Allied Products Corp., 548 F.2d 644, 654 (6th Cir. 1977). And it has been held that mere sua sponte adoption of a remedy does not in itself amount to the "extraordinary circumstances" required by the statute, because reconsideration is available at the Board level. Id. at 655.

We think that the plight of this Employer is different, however, because the Employer's objections to Board-designed remedies became entangled with the Union's petition for review of the Board decision and the Board's cross-petition for enforcement. The Board issued its decision on June 12, 1979, and the Union filed its petition for review with this court on June 14. Once the Union's petition was filed, the Board became obligated to file the record with the reviewing court, and that court acquired jurisdiction to enforce the Board's order. Act § 10(f), 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976). Once the record was filed, our jurisdiction became exclusive, and the Board no longer had any authority to reconsider its decision without a specific remand from this court.

If an employer is barred from presenting his objections to the reviewing court in such circumstances, then the court faces a Hobson's choice between enforcing the Board order without contest, and remanding the case in its entirety to give the employer an opportunity to make the ritual application for reconsideration. The unfairness of the former course is evident, and the inefficiency of the latter course would prevent the Union from seeking review until the Employer has exhausted his administrative remedies. We do not believe that such a jurisdictional conflict between the court and the Board was intended by Congress, and we find it inconsistent with orderly judicial review. We consider it preferable to hold that, after sua sponte adoption of new remedies by the Board, the filing of a petition for judicial review by another aggrieved party can constitute the extraordinary circumstances that "preven[t] a matter which should have been presented to the Board from having been presented at the proper time." N.L.R.B. v. Allied Products Corp., 548 F.2d at 654. We point out that the Union filed its petition first in this case; our holding is limited to this sequence, and might be different if the Employer had successfully engaged in the all-too-frequent race to the courthouse.

B. The Board's Remedial Powers

The Board's choice of remedies is entitled to a high degree of deference. Congress was aware at the time of the Board's creation that the tangled employer-employee disputes arising from the substantive commands of the Act would demand a body with broad remedial powers. Section 10(c) of the Act directs the Board to issue an order requiring guilty parties "to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action including reinstatement * * * as will effectuate the policies of the Act." 29 U.S.C.

§ 160(c)(1976). With that kind of mandate, it is not surprising that the Supreme Court has consistently stressed that the Board's remedial power "is a broad, discretionary one, subject to limited judicial review." Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964). In fashioning its remedies, "the Board draws on a fund of knowledge and expertise all its own, and its choice of remedy must therefore be given special respect by reviewing courts." N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939 n.32, L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

In the present case, the ALJ concluded that "the unfair labor practices to which this Respondent resorted to kill off the union campaign with finality—violent and outright discharge of seven persons within hours of the birth of the union campaign—were 'so outrageous and pervasive'" that extraordinary measures were needed. J.A. 36. The Board agreed that the violations were "numerous and egregious," J.A. 47, but balked at the bargaining remedy the ALJ had proposed. It then undertook the difficult task of formulating a set of remedies tht would restore the employee confidence necessary to permit a free and untrammeled representation decision.

The Board imposed a series of remedial actions, designed to reassure interested parties of their rights and to assist the employees in hearing the Union's side of the story despite the "lingering atmosphere of fear" the Employer had created. J.A. 51. None of these actions are unprecedented; some are quite traditional. Yet, in the circumstances of this case, the efficacy of any one of the remedies standing alone is doubtful. We should not be quick to conclude that the presence of some remedies renders others superfluous. The Supreme Court has directed that the Board's order "not be disturbed 'unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act.'" Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964) (quoting Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N.L.R.B., 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943)).

Nevertheless, the Employer attacks the entire remedial scheme, arguing that it is not J.P. Stevens & Co., and that only a record of hardened recidivism could justify so much affirmative action. But an employer who strikes the first blow hard enough may not need to strike another. The measure of the Board's remedial power cannot depend solely on the length or frequency of the Employer's conduct; the crucial factor is the effect of that conduct on the employees.[8]

Turning to the individual remedial steps ordered, we find that they can be loosely grouped into two classes: access remedies and notice remedies. The access remedies are designed to assist the Union in communicating with the employees, and to assist the employees in hearing the Union's side of the story without fear of retaliation. The notice remedies are intended to inform the employees of their statutory rights and the legal limits on the Employer's conduct, and to reassure them that further violations will not occur. We address each class of remedies in turn.

C. Access Remedies

The Board ordered the Employer to grant the Union access to company bulletin boards and other posting places for a two-year period, to make available to the Union a list of the names and addresses of its current employees, to give Union spokesmen reasonable access to nonwork areas during nonwork periods, to grant the Union equal time if the Employer convenes its employees for a "captive audience" speech on union representation, and to allow the Union to make one 30-minute preelection speech if there is a Board election involving the Union. The Employer makes two general arguments against this set of remedies. The first is that access remedies of any kind are unwarranted, because the record demonstrates that the Union successfully engaged indirect employee solicitation without interference by the Employer. This argument flies in the face of the Board's findings that the Employer had fired employees for their union activities, warned workers not to associate with union adherents, and fired one employee for chatting with members of the picket line.

[8] When this court, in Textile Workers v. N.L.R.B., 475 F.2d 973 (D.C. Cir. 1973), directed the Board to take into account the recidivist history of J.P. Stevens & Co., it was not to punish the employer but to assess the effect on employees of milder remedies in view of a history of obstinate resistance. The case does not support a policy of indulgence toward first offenders.

The Employer next cites N.L.R.B. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956), and its progeny,[9] as authority for the proposition that the Employer's property rights preclude union access to the property unless there are no other reasonable means of reaching the employees. But none of these cases deal with the remedial power of the Board; they only seek to determine when an employer's denial of access to his property can itself be deemed an unfair labor practice, see Decaturville Sportswear Co. v. N.L.R.B., 406 F.2d 886, 889 (6th Cir. 1969).

Some of these remedies are severe, but they are not new departures. See, e.g., Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers v. N.L.R.B., 547 F.2d 575 (D.C. Cir 1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 966, 97 S.Ct. 2923, 53 L.Ed.2d 1062 (1977) (bulletin boards); Food Store Employees Local 347 v. N.L.R.B., 476 F.2d 546 (D.C. Cir. 1973) rev'd on other grounds, 417 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974) (names and addresses); Montgomery Ward & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 339 F.2d 889 (6th Cir. 1965) (right to reply to captive audience speech); N.L.R.B. v. Crown Laundry & Dry Cleaners, Inc., 437 F.2d 290 (5th Cir. 1971) (pre-election speech).[10] We cannot say that they constitute "a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be used to effectuate the policies of the Act."

D. Notice Remedies

The Employer concedes the propriety of requiring posting of copies of the Board's notice at the Employer's premises. But the Employer challenges every other remedial step designed to communicate the contents of that notice to interested parties, and to reassure them that their rights will be respected. The Employer objects to mailing copies of the notice to employees and former employees at their homes, finding it duplicative and punitive. This objection need not detain us long. "An employee who must scan the Board's notice hurriedly while at work, under the scrutiny of others, will not be as able to absorb its meaning and hence to understand his legal rights as one who reads it at home in a more leisurely fashion." J.P. Stevens & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 380 F.2d 292, 304 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 389

U.S. 1005, 88 S.Ct. 564, 19 L.Ed.2d 600 (1967). Even more demanding than the needs of current employees are the needs of the former employees who were the direct victims of the Employer's violations; posting the notice at the plant hardly serves to communicate its contents to them.

The Employer also objects to the requirement that the notice be reprinted in appropriate company publications. Such an order is not an innovation. See, e. g., N.L.R.B. v. Weirton Steel Co., 183 F.2d 584 (3d Cir. 1950). The Board deems it necessary to convince the employees that the Employer has adopted an official policy of complying with its legal obligations, and it is certainly within the permissible range of Board options.

The same response must be made to the Employer's objection to the requirement that the Board notice be reprinted in newspapers of general circulation in the vicinity. Neither the concern about unfavorable publicity nor the expense would justify the court in overturning this aspect of the Board order. As the First Circuit has observed,

> The further requirement that the notices be published in all newspapers of general circulation helps insure that all interested persons will receive notice * * *. Moreover, where the violations are flagrant and repeated, the publication order has the salutary effect of neutralizing the frustrating effects of persistent illegal activity by letting in "a warming wind of information and, more important, reassurance."

N.L.R.B. v. Union Nacional de Trabajadores, 540 F.2d 1, 12 (1st Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1039, 97 S.Ct. 736, 50 L.Ed.2d 750 (1977) (citations omitted).

A more serious objection raised by the Employer concerns the Board requirement that the Haddon House president, Harold Anderson, personally read a copy of the notice to an assembly of the employees. The Employer urges that such a requirement is degrading and "demonstrates that the Board is intent on its design to humiliate and embarrass the Petitioner." It is true that the Board's powers are limited to remedial, and not punitive, orders. But we do not think that the record justifies any suspicion that the Board has displayed a vindictive animus toward the Employer, and we must view the order as remedial, not punitive, if it can reasonably be said to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

[10] As the Board in this opinion found it "unnecessary to consider at this time * * * what might happen if another union intervenes in an election proceeding involving Respondent and Charging Party," J.A. 52 n.11 (emphasis added), we need not analyze the access portions of the order from the point of view of a hypothetical second union.

Unlike other circuits, this court has never enforced a Board public reading order. We find it necessary, therefore, to examine in some detail the history of the oral notice requirement. This inquiry leads us to conclude that public reading by management is a permissible remedy, but that the Board has gone too far by singling out Harold Anderson as the individual who must perform the reading.

The Board's original rationale for oral reading by management was to ensure effective communication of the substance of the notice, and these provisions were often justified by employee illiteracy. In the earliest cases, oral notice provisions were enforced without comment. Jackson Tile Manufacturing Co., 122 N.L.R.B. 764 (1958), enforced, 272 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1959); Taylor-Colquitt Co., 47 N.L.R.B. 225 (1943), enforced, 140 F.2d 92 (4th Cir. 1943). But in N.L.R.B. v. Laney & Duke Storage Warehouse Co., 369 F.2d 859 (5th Cir. 1966), a court refused to enforce such a provision. In Laney & Duke, the ALJ had ordered the employer to read the notice to any employee who requested it, but the Board had expanded this to require a reading to all employees, singly or collectively, whether or not requested. The Fifth Circuit denied enforcement because it considered this remedy "unnecessarily embarrassing and humiliating to management rather than effectuating the policies of the Act." Id. at 869. This decision did not, however, preclude other panels of the Fifth Circuit from enforcing public reading orders where the illiteracy of the employees appeared to require it. N.L.R.B. v. Bush Hog, Inc., 405 F.2d 755 (5th Cir. 1968); N.L.R.B. v. Texas Electric Cooperatives, Inc., 398 F.2d 722 (5th Cir. 1968).

Meanwhile, the Second Circuit developed a compromise device: the Board order was modified to permit reading of the notice by either the employer or a Board representative, at the option of the employer. The court was satisfied that such a reading "still guarantees effective communication of the Board's order to the Company's employees." J.P. Stevens & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 380 F.2d 292, 305 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1005, 88 S.Ct. 564, 19 L.Ed.2d 600 (1967). The Board acquiesced in such a modification in a subsequent case, acknowledging that a public reading by a Board representative sufficed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Textile Workers v. N.L.R.B., 388 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 836, 89 S.Ct. 112, 21 L.Ed.2d 107 (1968). Finally, the Board itself adopted the Second Circuit's strategy, including this option in its own orders. See J.P. Stevens & Co., 167 N.L.R.B. 258 & n.2 (1967), enforced in relevant part, 406 F.2d 1017 (4th Cir. 1968).

This court, however, has viewed public reading requirements with far more suspicion. In International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers v. N.L.R.B., 383 F.2d 230, 232–33 (D.C.Cir.1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 904, 88 S.Ct. 818, 19 L.Ed.2d 871 (1968), we rejected a public reading by the employer as "inappropriate to achieve the sought-after goal of dissemination of information concerning employees' rights." The court did acknowledge that a public reading order might be appropriate in some circumstances, but found its disadvantages outweighed the usefulness of "yet a fourth promulgation of the order" in that case. Id. at 232. It also rejected the alternative of a reading by a Board representative because that could diminish the Board's apparent neutrality, and "creat[e] a problem more severe than the one it supposedly solves," Id. at 233 n.5.

Notwithstanding this court's reluctance, other circuits generally approved the public reading order once the Board representative option became routine. See J.P. Stevens & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 441 F.2d 514 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 830, 92 S.Ct. 69, 30 L.Ed.2d 59 (1971); Marine Welding and Repair Works, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 439 F.2d 395 (8th Cir. 1971); J.P. Stevens & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 406 F.2d 1017 (4th Cir. 1968). The dormant issue of readings by the employer himself was revived, however, when the Board began to advocate public reading of the notice for other purposes. The Fifth Circuit has praised the public reading order as "an effective but moderate way to let in a warming wind of information and, more important, reassurance," J.P. Stevens & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 417 F.2d 533 (5th Cir. 1969), and it is this reassurance function that the Board has recently emphasized to justify the requirement of a reading by management itself.

In United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 179, 11 n.14, 101 L.R.R.M. 1278 n.14 (1979), remanded on other grounds, 633 F.2d 1054, (3d Cir. 1980), the Board acknowledged judicial doubts about the propriety of such an order, but concluded that the company itself must give its employees "reassurances that this campaign will end." In the present case, the Board also invoked this rationale to justify its order of a public reading without the Board representative option. Given this different function, it is obvious that a reading by a delegate of the Board rather than by management would not be sufficient.[11]

The Board's remedy is admittedly strong medicine. But in the context of the severely chilling environment created by this Employer's unfair labor practices, we cannot say that it was superfluous to the cure. This is not a mere "additional" promulgation of the notice's contents, but rather a deliberate attempt to alleviate the workers' fears about the Employer's intentions. The reading can do little to disrupt the already strained relationship between the Employer and the Union, and it may be of substantial benefit to the employees. Whether or not this hope is realized, we cannot say that the Board was wrong to make an effort in that direction. This court acknowledged in International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers that there were conceivably cases where the need for the remedy would outweigh its oppressiveness and justify the public reading order. We believe that this is such a case.

One feature of the public reading order is highly unusual, however, and presents a special problem for enforcement by this court. That is the requirement that the notice be read by a specified individual—Harold Anderson, the president and owner of Haddon House. We are aware of only one other case in which the Board singled out a particular individual to perform the reading, and we observe that in the ensuing enforcement action a procedural obstacle preventing the court from reaching the merits of the employer's challenge.[12] United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 179, 101 L.R.R.M. 1278 (1979), remanded, 633 F.2d 1054 (3d Cir. 1980). In United Dairy Farmers, the Board emphasized the personal participation of the respondent's president in numerous unfair labor practices. He had > personally announced that employees would have to become "independent contractors" in order to continue driving for Respondent; threatened to close the plant rather than deal with a union; and interrogated employees concerning their organizational activities. As it is clear that Respondent's unlawful campaign emanated from the top, so, too, must reassurances that this campaign will end come from the top.

242 N.L.R.B. No. 179 at 11 n.14, 101 L.R.R.M. at 1281 n.14. The Board had also found that it was the president who had warned an employee that violence would ensue if the union were voted in, and had previously threatened to fire union supporters.

It is unnecessary for us to decide whether the circumstances of the United Dairy Farmers case, or any circumstances whatsoever, could justify the startling innovation of a Board reading order directed at a specified individual. For even the justification the Board attempted in United Dairy Farmers is absent in this case. The Board did not make a careful analysis of the necessity for Harold Anderson to undertake the reading, and the record suggests no such necessity. Of all the unfair labor practices found by the Board, the only one personally performed by Anderson was his promise of benefits as an inducement to avoid the Union. Although this may accurately be categorized as a "fist inside the velvet glove" violation, it was other members of management who carried out firings, made veiled threats to employees, and warned of the consequences of talking with union adherents. Indeed, the Board's opinion does not indicate any unusual need for Harold Anderson to participate personally in the public reading—the ALJ had not recommended it, and the Board only stated that the employees "will personally be assured by Respondent's highest ranking representative that those rights will be respected." J.A. 53.

[11] We also continue to doubt the propriety of having a Board representative perform the reading. See International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers v. N.L.R.B., 383 F.2d at 233 n.5.

[12] As in the present case, the remedy was added by the Board sua sponte after it rejected the ALJ's recommendation of a bargaining order. The remedies were not challenged before the Board, and the court would not permit the employer to attack them on review. The "exceptional circumstances" issue was not discussed, and the court did not specify the order of filing. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Ass'n v. N.L.R.B., 633 F.2d 1054 at 1064 (3d Cir. 1980).

It is quite likely that a personal assurance from the chief executive officer of a company will have a marginally greater impact than one coming from some other official of lesser rank. But the negative aspects of the order overwhelm the marginal benefit. Such specificity is uniquely oppressive on the individual singled out, and the lack of particularized need may create the misimpression that the Board is seeking to punish an uncooperative respondent. When the remedial value is as slight as it is in this case, we think that the hardship outweighs the benefit to an extent similar to that condemned in this court's prior decision in International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Giving due regard to personal dignity and the limitations on the Board's discretion, we think such a specific reading order is unjustified. We will enforce this provision of the Board order only if it is modified to require the Employer to "have a responsible officer of Respondent read" the Board notice.[13]

V. CONCLUSION

The Board has long struggled to accommodate the interests of employers and employees while assuring free choice of bargaining representatives. When one side or the other destroys the balance and creates a climate inimical to an untrammeled selection process, Congress intended the Board to exercise broad discretion in fashioning a remedy. The remedies chosen may or may not be sufficient to the task, but the Board is entitled to try all reasonable measures. The boundaries within which the Board may reasonably exercise its discretion will vary with the severity of the conduct and the needs that conduct creates.

We uphold the Board's findings and its decision to withhold a bargaining remedy. We hold that, in the peculiar procedural posture of this case, the Employer is entitled to challenge the Board's remedial choices, but with one exception we uphold those choices as within the bounds of the Board's discretion. On the present record, for the reasons we have explained, we are willing to enforce the public reading requirement, but we conclude that the Board has shown no need for singling out the Employer's president to perform it.

It is so ordered.

NLRB v. Leavitt J. Cofer, Eunice Cofer, and Travelodge International, Inc. a partnership d/b/a Marysville Travelodge

637 F.2d 1309 (9th Cir.), January 26, 1981—233 NLRB 527

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WRIGHT, WALLACE and FERGUSON, Circuit Judges

WALLACE Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of its order directing Leavitt J. Cofer, Eunice Cofer and Travelodge International, Inc. (Travelodge), a partnership, to reinstate four dismissed employees, with back pay, and to bargain with Hotel Restaurant Employees & Bartenders Union, Local No. 49 (the Union). The issues are: (1) whether the Board properly exercised its discretionary jurisdiction, (2) whether there is substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole that the employees were dismissed for engaging in protected activity, and (3) whether the bargaining order was appropriate. We answer all three questions in the affirmative, and enforce the order.

I

In September 1974, the Cofers and Travelodge executed a standard form joint venture agreement, the purpose of which was "the joint operation of a motel known as the Marysville Travelodge," located in Marysville, California. The Cofers and Travelodge each have a 50% interest in the motel.

The Cofers employed William and Dorothy Loy as managers of the motel. On February 25, 1976, the motel employed six maids, one maintenance man, and a temporary painter. That morning Mr. Loy assigned maid Nora K. Chavez to train new maid Valerie Ketcham. Training of new maids was a task normally performed [13] The Board order also requires Harold Anderson to sign the notice personally. That provision raises entirely different issues, and has not been challenged by the Employer. It will be enforced without modification.

by head maid Norma Keffer. Shortly before noon, Keffer asked Mrs. Loy why Chavez had been assigned to train Ketcham. Mrs. Loy replied that she did not know because Mr. Loy had made out the work assignment sheet that morning. Keffer asked Mrs. Loy why the motel was not paying the other maids $2.20 per hour, as that amount was posted on a minimum wage notice on the motel bulletin board. Mrs. Loy responded that she felt that the maids were receiving the correct rate of pay. Keffer then asked Mrs. Loy for the telephone number of the Travelodge "headquarters." According to Keffer's testimony she also told Mrs. Loy that "we were going to go to the Labor Board because we were tired of what was going on." Mrs. Loy told Keffer that she could pick up the Travelodge telephone number later. Keffer then returned to work.

Keffer, Chavez, and maid Sharon Watts decided at noon to go to the "Labor Board." However, they were unable to find a listing for "Labor Board" in the telephone book. They did find a listing for the Union and decided to go to the Union office after work. At the end of the day, Keffer, Chavez, and Watts left together in one car. Mrs. Loy testified that she thought that the three maids were going to the "employment office" to check on the minimum wage. At the Union office all three maids signed applications for membership which designated and authorized the Union to represent them for collective bargaining purposes. That evening, maid Ellen Reynolds, who had not worked that day, signed an identical application for membership.

The administrative law judge (ALJ) found that Mr. Loy called Keffer the next day to tell her to stay home for a few days to cool off. Also on the morning of February 26, Chavez and Watts called in, as was customary, to find out if they were scheduled to work that day. They were told that there was no work. Keffer, Chavez and Watts continued to call in on a daily basis for several days and each day were told that they were not needed.

On February 29, Keffer confronted Mr. Loy. They discussed the conversation between Keffer and Mrs. Loy of February 25, and, according to Keffer, whom the ALJ credited, Mr. Loy said "we don't need the Labor Board brought into here. I have enough problems of my own." At 9:00 a.m. on March 1, Mr. Loy told Keffer that she was "fired" for "personal reasons * * * for upsetting one of my maids."

Later in the morning of March 1, Keffer, Chavez, Watts, and Reynolds went to the California State Unemployment Development Department and filed claims for unemployment. The forms were mailed to the motel on March 1. Mr. Loy's written response to the unemployment claim was that each employee had been fired because "work unsatisfactory." Reynolds, who had not worked on February 25, worked on February 26, 27, 28 and March 2. On March 3, when she called in to inquire whether there was work that day, Mr. Loy told her "that he had got an unfavorable card from the employment office on me, and for me not to return to work."

On the morning of March 1, Webb talked to Mr. Cofer by telephone. It is undisputed that Webb identified himself as a representative of the Union and indicated that he was calling on the behalf of four maids at the motel. Cofer responded that Loy was in charge of the maid situation and that Cofer would stand by Loy's decisions.

The ALJ found violations of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), 158(a)(5). The Board adopted the findings and conclusions of the ALJ. It ordered reinstatement of the maids with back pay. It also ordered the employer to bargain with the Union.

II

It is undisputed that the Board has statutory jurisdiction over the motel under 29 U.S.C. § 160(a). See NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed. 2d 279 (1963). The Board may, however, decline to exercise jurisdiction at its discretion, under certain circumstances. 29 U.S.C. § 164(c). Pursuant to this grant of discretion, the Board has established a jurisdictional yardstick for the hotel industry of $500,000 annual gross income. Floridian Hotel of Tampa, 124 N.L.R.B. 261 (1959). This amount would not be met by the motel itself or by the motel together with the other ventures of the Cofers. The Cofers and Travelodge stipulate, however, that it is met if Travelodge and the motel are counted as a single employer. The issue is, therefore, whether the Board properly considered the annual gross income of Travelodge and the Cofers together in order to meet the Board's self-imposed jurisdictional restraint.

In similar fact situations, the Board has applied four factors in deciding whether to treat closely related concerns as a single employer: (1) interrelation of operations, (2) centralized control of labor relations, (3) common management, and (4) common ownership or financial control. 21st Annual Report of the NLRB, 14–15. See NLRB v. Transcontinental Theaters, Inc., 568 F.2d 125, 129 (9th Cir. 1978); Sakrete of Northern California, Inc. v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 902, 905 & n.4 (9th Cir. 1964), ceret. denied, 379 U.S. 961, 85 S. Ct. 649, 13 L.Ed2d 556 (1965). The Cofers and Travelodge argue that because these factors were not specifically found, the Board has no jurisdiction. The question is not so easily decided. "It is settled law that the extent to which the Board chooses to exercise its statutory jurisdiction is a matter of administrative policy within the Board's discretion, * * * and is not a question for the courts, * * * in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, such as unjust discrimination * * *." NLRB v. Carroll—Naslund Disposal, Inc., 359 F.2d 779, 780 (9th Cir. 1966) (per curiam) (citations omitted). Therefore, the proper review standard is abuse of discretion. To determine whether there has been an abuse of discretion, however, we must be able to follow the agency's reasoning. To this end we have held that "[a]gencies * * * are required to explain departures from agency policies or rules so that a reviewing court is able to determine if the agency was acting in a reasoned, deliberate manner." Bob's Big Boy Family Restaurants v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 850, 852 (9th Cir. 1980). In the present case, the Board failed to mention its four single employer factors. It is not clear, however, that the Board ever intended these factors to constitute a rule for partnership cases such as the present one. The ALJ and the Board apparently did not believe the rule applied and did not find it useful to refer to the four factors in this case. There was no impediment in doing so as the evidence relied upon by the ALJ and the Board is sufficient to satisfy each of the four factors. We conclude that the question of departure from an accepted rule, as in Bob's Big Boy, does not arise.

The Board's decision certainly provides a sufficient basis for us to find that the Board acted in a reasoned, deliberate way. The Board relied heavily upon the joint venture agreement between the Cofers and Travelodge. The agreement provides that the "parties hereto jointly own the management rights of said motel * * *." If the Cofers breach any provision of the agreement, Travelodge "shall have the immediate right to assume sole management of said motel * * *." Moreover, "[n]o leases or contracts whatsoever shall be entered into by any party on behalf of the joint venture without the prior written consent of [Travelodge]." The joint venture agreement also required the Cofers "to follow the procedures set forth in the Operations Manual published by [Travelodge] * * *. No variation from these standards and procedures is permitted without the prior written consent of [Travelodge]." The Operations Manual contains the following section entitled "UNION NEGOTIATIONS" which is of particular significance for the single employer issue:

> Do not enter into any negotiation with any union agent or representative until you have conferred with the Legal Department and the Personnel Manager [of Travelodge]. Obtain only the name, address and phone number of the representative for the union, and do not allow any > union agent to show you too much in the way of documentation, since there are notice requirements which could later work against the corporation in an arbitration proceeding. Advise the union agent or representative that it is necessary for you to contact the Corporate Headquarters and that someone will be contacting him in the near future.

It is hard to imagine any one fact more supportive of a single employer determination for purposes of Board jurisdiction than a contractual requirement that the corporate partner be consulted prior to any union dealings by the local partner. Together with the numerous other indications of the close connection between the Cofers and Travelodge that were spelled out by the Board, this union negotiation provision provides a sufficient justification of the finding of single employer status to enable us to determine that the Board was acting in a reasoned, deliberate manner. Therefore, we find no abuse of discretion in the Board's jurisdictional determination.

The Board found that the decision to fire Keffer, Chavez, and Watts was made because they went together after work to lodge a complaint about pay, presumably to a government agency. The Board found that Reynolds was fired because it became clear to the Loys that Reynolds had joined the concerted action aimed at a pay increase. The review standard for these findings is substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); see Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 477–91, 71 S.Ct. 456, 459–66, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

We conclude that this test is met. The evidence includes: (1) the timing of the firings, see NLRB v. Tri-State Stores, Inc., 477 F.2d 204, 206 (9th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1130, 94 S.Ct. 868, 38 L.Ed.2d 754 (1974); (2) failure to advise the employees of the reason for their discharge, see A. J. Karjewski Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 413 F.2d 673, 676 n.2 (1st Cir. 1969); and (3) evidence tending to contradict the employer's explanation of the firing. The contention of the Cofers and Travelodge that Keffer was fired at noon on February 25, before any mention of going to the "Labor Board" is not credible in light of the fact that Keffer worked that afternoon. The claim that bad work was the motivation for the firings is not supported by the evidence.

Under section 8(a)(1) of the Act, it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section 7." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). Section 7 provides in part that "[e]mployees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157.

We conclude that when employees join together to seek higher wages from a government agency administering the minimum wage laws, they are engaged in concerted activity for the purpose of mutual aid within the terms of section 7. See Gibbs Die Casting Aluminum Corp., 174 N.L.R.B. 75 (1969). Keffer's statement that they were going to the "Labor Board" suggests that the firing was punishment for intended communication with the Board. Because of the overriding public interest in ensuring unimpeded access to the Board, this possibility increases the seriousness of the violation. See NLRB v. Industrial Union of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, 391 U.S. 418, 424 88 S.Ct. 1717, 1721, 20 L.Ed.2d 706 (1968).

The concerted activity of Keffer, Chavez, Watts, and Reynolds does not fall within any of the judicially recognized exceptions to section 7. See NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 17, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 1104, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962). We therefore conclude that the section 7 rights of Keffer, Chavez, Watts, and Reynolds were infringed by their terminations, in violation of section 8(a)(1).

The Cofers and Travelodge argue that no bargaining order should issue because the Board erred in finding that a bargaining demand was made by Union agent Webb. We disagree.

We need not decide whether a bargaining demand or a section 8(a)(5) [1] violation is a condition precedent for a bargaining order in this case, see NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 614, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1940, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969) (Gissel), because we conclude that the Board's findings of a bargaining demand and section 8(a)(5) violation are supported by substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole.

Webb's account of his conversation with Cofer on March 1 seems to describe an attempt to bring Cofer to bargain on the strength of the four union cards, a majority, on the issues of reinstatement, wages, hours, and conditions. This interpretation of Webb's account was developed by the attorney for the Cofers and Travelodge. On cross-examination the following exchange occurred:

Q: You indicated that on March 1, you called Mr. Cofer, or somebody who identified himself as Mr. Cofer.

A: Yes, I did.

[1] Under section 8(a)(5) it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 9(a)." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5). Section 9(a) provides for exclusive representation "for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment." 29 U.S.C. § 159(a).

Q: And in essence requested to bargain on behalf of the employees of Marysville Travelodge.

A: (Witness nods affirmatively.)

Webb and the ALJ both seem to have understood Webb's conversation with Cofer as constituting a request to bargain. The ALJ indicated that he found Webb's account believable.

We must, however, also examine evidence running counter to the Board's conclusion on a factual matter. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 340 U.S. at 487–88, 71 S.Ct. at 463–64. Cofer's account of the telephone conversation with Webb includes a statement that there was no bargaining request made. The ALJ found that Cofer's specific account of the conversation, however, was compatible with an inference that a bargaining request was intended. We conclude that the finding of the ALJ and the Board that a bargaining demand was made on March 1 is supported by substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole.

We also conclude that the record supports the Board's finding that the Cofers and Travelodge violated section 8(a)(5) by refusal to bargain. This finding is supported despite the fact that Webb did not press the Cofers or the Loys to bargain after March 1. The firing of all four Union members, as the ALJ found, made it futile to seek voluntary recognition.

Travelodge and the Cofers argue that no bargaining order could issue in this case because the conduct alleged to undermine the possibility of a fair election occurred prior to the time that the Cofers or Loys knew that the Union was involved. Gissel indicates that "the union must be able to show the employer's awareness of the drive in order to prove that his contemporaneous conduct constituted unfair labor practices on which a bargaining order can be based if the drive is ultimately successful." Gissel, supra, 395 U.S. at 603, 89 S.Ct. at 1934.

The argument of the Cofers and Travelodge is weakened by the ALJ's finding that Reynolds was not terminated until March 3—two days after Cofer was made aware that four maids had signed Union authorization cards. The record supports this finding. We need not, however, rely upon the fact that this part of the unfair labor practice was done with awareness of the Union's organizing activities, because we conclude that the three firings carried out without awareness of the role of the Union would support the issuance of a bargaining order.

The concerted activity in this case was a single process of employee self-organization. The fact that after its initial phase it acquired the sponsorship of an already existing union is incidental. A bargaining order could have been issued to protect the organizing activity of the maids had they taken all actions themselves. They do not lose protection under the Act because they affiliated their own organization with an existing union. The Loys knew of the concerted activity that constitued the early phase of the organizing "drive" before deciding on any of the dismissals. Therefore, the bargaining order does not conflict with the Supreme Court's language in Gissel.

The Cofers and Travelodge also argue that there is no evidence to suggest that the preferable alternative of a free representation election would not be possible here. Whether a free election would be possible is determined by the circumstances that existed when an election was held or could have been held, not by the circumstances that exist when enforcement is under consideration before this court. Otherwise, "employers would gain a great incentive to refuse to recognize a bona fide bargaining demand in hopes that a delay would terminate the difficulty." NLRB v. Tri-State Stores, 477 F.2d 204, 207 (9th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1130, 94 S.Ct. 868, 38 L.Ed.2d 754 (1974) (citing NLRB v. L. B. Foster Co., 418 F.2d 1, 4 (9th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 990, 90 S.Ct. 1124, 25 L.Ed.2d 398 (1970)). Therefore, we must review the Board's bargaining order with respect to a unit over half of whose employees had recently suffered illegal dismissals, and whose reinstatement was then ordered. We know of no cases in which a bargining order has not been enforced following an unfair labor practice so severe in terms of its impact on the employees and in terms of the percentage of employees affected. Moreover, we must give great deference to the Board in reviewing a bargaining order:

> The employers argue that the Fourth Circuit correctly observed that, "in the great majority of cases, a cease and desist order with the posting > of appropriate notices will eliminate any undue influences upon employees voting in the security of anonymity." NLRB v. Logan Packing Co., 386 F.2d at 570. It is for the Board and not the courts, however, to make that determination, based on its expert estimate as to the effects on the election process of unfair labor practices of varying intensity. In fashioning its remedies under the broad provisions of § 10(c) of the Act (29 U.S.C. § 160(c)), the Board draws on a fund of knowledge and expertise all its own, and its choice of remedy must therefore be given special respect by reviewing courts.

Gissel, supra, 395, U.S. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32. We cannot accord the Board's judgment this special respect and deny enforcement to the bargaining order on the facts of this case.

ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Proler International Corporation

635 F.2d 351 (5th Cir.), January 26, 1981—242 NLRB 676

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WISDOM, AINSWORTH and GEE, Circuit Judges

352

WISDOM, Circuit Judge: Proler International Corporation is a scrap iron salvage company. Its Houston plant employs between 200 and 250 persons. During the first six months of 1978 Proler workers filed a number of complaints with the National Labor Relations Board against the company arising out of a strike and a union organizational campaign. After a two-day trial, an administrative law judge determined that the company had committed a variety of unfair labor practices—including threats, interrogations, and discriminatory discharges—in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3). The Board adopted the ALJ's findings with some minor exceptions and ordered the company to cease and desist from interfering "in any other manner" with the rights of its employees, to reinstate with back pay all discriminatorily discharged employees, and to post appropriate notices at its plant. The Board now seeks enforcement of these orders. We enforce in part, vacate in part, and remand to the Board for further factual findings.

I.

Around eight in the morning of January 18, 1978, about 20 Proler truckdrivers met in the company conference room to discuss their complaints about workings conditions with a company vice-president, Sam Oliver. Oliver stated that he was only a vice-president, not the owner, and that he could not negotiate with the employees at that time. He advised them to return to work or go home, and left the room. The employees went across the street to a roadside diner where they constructed picket signs and discussed the future strategy to be pursued. Within an hour, Oliver went to the diner and talked with the leader of the group, Leroy Stubbs, in an effort to convince the men to return to work. As Oliver left he told Stubbs that unless the men returned to work by 10:30 they would lose their jobs. Oliver and the striking employees continued to communicate with each other for the remainder of the day, and even met once again in Oliver's office. The drivers did not return to work that day and did not unconditionally offer to return to work until January 31, 1978.

The ALJ concluded the Oliver's statement was a discriminatory discharge of the striking truckdrivers that converted what was an economic strike into an unfair labor practice strike. He recommended immediate reinstatement for all the truckdrivers as well as back pay to be computed as of January 31, the date of their unconditional offer to return to work. The Board adopted the findings, but modified the recommended order in one respect. Reversing a thirty-year practice, it ordered that the back pay remedy be computed from the date of the discharge, rather than the date of the offer to return to work.[1] Because we conclude that the Board's finding of a discharge is not supported by substantial evidence and that the strike was not converted into an unfair labor practice strike, we must vacate this part of the Board's order and remand for further findings.

The Board and the company hotly dispute whether or not Oliver used the word "fired" in his statement telling the drivers to return to work by 10:30 on the morning of the strike. This dispute focuses on the wrong question. The question is not what specific language was used but whether the language was such that it led the workers reasonably to conclude that they had been fired. NLRB. Ridgeway Trucking Co., 5 Cir. 1980, 622 F.2d 1222, 1224. There is no evidence in the record that the men considered themselves discharged after the 10:30 deadline passed. The little evidence that exists concerning the driver's later actions points the other way. Several of them met with Oliver again later in the afternoon. Furthermore, the men sent two mailgrams that afternoon in which they referred to themselves as "employees engaged in concerted activity" and asked for further meetings with management the next day. Similarly, there is no indication that the company considered the men discharged. No final checks were delivered to the men, nor were letters of termination sent. The one statement of Oliver is the sole piece of evidence relied on by the Board. The statement was undoubtedly a threat, which is in itself an 8(a)(1) violation, but it is not enough evidence, when viewed in light of the whole record, to support the Board's conclusion that the threat was actually carried out.

The conclusion that the strike was not converted to an unfair labor practice strike follows from the conclusion that no discharge occurred on January 18. It is undisputed that the walkout began in protest of working conditions and was an economic strike. For an economic strike to be converted to an unfair labor practice strike, the employer's unfair labor practice must be a contributing factor in causing or prolonging the strike. NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 5 Cir. 1978, 574 F.2d 835, 840; NLRB v. Birmingham Publishing Co., 5 Cir. 1959, 262 F.2d 2, 9–10. The employees did not consider themselves discharged. Their continued strike therefore could not have been in protest of their discharge. Similarly, although it is conceivable that they may have been protesting the threat of discharge conveyed by Oliver, there is no evidence to support that notion. No one testified to that effect and apparently none of the picket signs carried by the striking employees listed either the threat of discharge or the supposed discharge as a grievance. There must be evidence of a casual link between the unfair labor practice and the strike. Cagle's, Inc. v. NLRB, 5 Cir. 1979, 588 F.2d 943, 950. Since none exists here, the strike remained an economic one.

Discharges may nevertheless have occurred when the strikers unconditionally offered to return to work on January 31. Economic strikers are entitled to immediate reinstatement upon their unconditional offer to return to work, unless the employer can show substantial and legitimate business justifications for refusing to rehire them; employees not rehired at that time are considered discriminatorily discharged. NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 1967, 389 U.S. 375, 378, 88 S.Ct. 543, 545, 19 L.Ed.2d 614. Because this case was tried solely on the theory that the strike had been converted to an unfair labor practice strike by the supposed discharge on January 18, neither party offered proof concerning who was not reinstated and whether there were substantial business justfications for the company's failure to reinstate. We therefore remand this case to the Board for further findings on these issues. Those employees found by the Board to have been refused reinstatement without just cause will of course be entitled to the usual reinstatement and back pay remedy.

II.

In response to a successful union representation election and the union activity that ensued, the company undertook a variety of actions found by the Board to be violations of sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. With one exception, we affirm the Board's findings.

A.

On two successive days in February 1978, shortly after the successful union representation election, Earl Ramey, an employee of the company, and his girl friend, Felippa Torres, a former employee, invited several other employees to restaurants away from the plant site. Ramey voiced strong antiunion sentiments and urged the employees to sign a petition asking for another election. Torres served as his translator for the Spanish-speaking employees. The Board found that Ramey and Torres were agents of the company and that their promotion of a decertification petition thus violated the Act.

This Court has held that "[s]ection 8(a)(1) of the Act makes it unlawful for an employer to instigate and promote a decertification proceeding or induce employees to sign any other form of union-repudiating document, particularly where the solicitation is strengthened by the express or implied threats of reprisal or promises of benefit." NLRB v. Birmingham Publishing Co., 5 Cir. 1959, 262 F.2d 2, 7. If the actions of Ramey and Torres can be attributed to the company, they violated the Act. A company can be held accountable for unfair labor practices even if they are committed by persons other than management personnel if the company has taken steps that lead its employees reasonably to conclude that those persons were acting on behalf of manageament. Helena Laboratory Corp. v. NLRB, 5 Cir. 1977 557 F.2d 1183, 1187. There is substantial evidence to indicate that the company took such steps and that Ramey and Torres were acting on behalf of the company: the company paid for the lunches; the company paid the employees for the time spent; the company provided at least one automobile to transport employees to the restaurants where the luncheons were held; Ramey wore a supervisor's white hard hat and was thought to be a supervisor by at least one employee; and, after one luncheon, Ramey gathered several of the employees in the personnel office of the company, in the presence of the company's attorney, to obtain their signatures for a revote petition. We arrirm the Board's conclusion that the actions of Ramey and Torres violated the Act.

B.

In May and June of 1978, Cesar Navarro, one of the company's personnel officers, was involved in four incidents cited by the Board as unlawful threats and interrogations. The first incident occurred at a plant safety meeting held at a time when strike rumors were in the air. Several employees present at the meeting testified that Navarro told the employees that those who participated in a strike would be fired. Other employees testified that he used the word "replaced". The ALJ credited the testimony of those who said that Navarro used the word "fired" and held that the statement was a threat in violation of § 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). The company's sole objection to this finding is that the ALJ's credibility choices were unsound. Credibility resolutions are peculiarly within the province of the trial examiner and the National Labor Relations Board and are entitled to affirmance unless inherently unreasonable or self-contradictory. NLRB v. Standard Forge and Axle Co., 5 Cir. 1969, 420 F.2d 508, 510, reh'g denied, 427 F.2d 344, cert. denied, 400 U.S. 903, 91 S.Ct. 140, 27 L.Ed.2d 140. See NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, 5 Cir. 1978, 576 F.2d 666, 671. We can find no such contradictions.

The second incident involving Navarro was a conversation he had with a crane operator named Melchor Ortega. Ortega's unrebutted testimony was that Navarro questioned him generally about the Union's organizational activities and warned him that if any employee induced other employees to join the Union it might endanger their jobs. Such threats of reprisals for union support are prohibited by § 8(a)(1) of the Act. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 1969, 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547; NLRB v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 5 Cir. 1980, 613 F.2d 1338.

Again, after hearing that employee Howard Predom had filed charges against him with the NLRB, Navarro advised Predom that whether or not the charges were sustained, Predom would lose his job. The Act forbids such coercive actions by employers against employees who file unfair labor practice charges with the Board. See Nash v. Florida Industrial Commission, 1967, 389 U.S. 235, 238–39, 88 S.Ct. 362, 366, 19 L.Ed.2d 438, 442; cf. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(4).

Finally, the Board concluded that a conversation between Navarro and employee Ofelia Ortiz was an unlawful interrogation. Navarro approached Ortiz and two other women in their work area in the plant and introduced himself as the new personnel director. As he was leaving he asked the women whether they were going to attend a union meeting scheduled for later in the day. When Ortiz answered that she was unsure, Navarro stated that if she did attend she should not sign any papers because the union would be lying to them.

We are unable to agree with the Board that this conversation amounted to an unlawful interrogation. An employer has a constitutional right to express his opinions about a union, and this right is explicitly recognized in § 8(c) of the Act. 29 U.S.C. § 158(c). That section states that an expression of opinion cannot constitute evidence of an unfair labor practice if it contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit. The statements made by Navarro to Ortiz expressed his opposition to the union, but conveyed no threats. See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 1969, 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547; Delco-Remy Division, General Motors Corp. v. NLRB, 5 Cir. 1979, 596 F.2d 1295, 1311. The question concerning whether the women were going to attend the union meeting merely prefaced the later remarks. The question occurred at the end of an otherwise routine conversation, it took place in the employees' work area, it was apparently not aimed at determining whether the 356 women actually supported the union, and it was not part of a larger campaign of interrogation waged by Navarro to determine which employees were union sympathizers. These factors serve to distinguish this situation from the cases cited by the Board.

Except for the Ortiz incident, the Board's conclusions concerning Navarro's unfair labor practices are affirmed.

C.

Roy Perkins was one of the drivers who participated in the January strike. He was not reinstated until March 22. A week later he was discharged, allegedly for destruction of company property, after he was seen by Herman Proler, executive vice-president of the company, driving a truck with a flat tire. The Board concluded that the company's stated reason for discharging Perkins was a pretext and that Perkins's union activities were the sole reason for his discharge. The usual remedy of reinstatement with back pay was ordered. The company contends that the Board's finding of unlawful motivation is not supported by substantial evidence. More specifically the company argues that there was no evidence that the person who made the discharge decision was aware of Perkins's union activities.

Proof of unlawful motivation can rarely be adduced other than by circumstantial evidence. It is not surprising, then, that the Supreme Court, in a decision handed down shortly after the passage of the National Labor Relations Act, concluded that knowledge and unlawful motivation can be proven solely on the basis of circumstantial evidence. See NLRB v. Link-Belt Co., 1941, 311 U.S. 584, 597, 61 S.Ct. 358, 365, 85 L.Ed. 368. There is enough circumstantial evidence here to support the Board's conclusion. Perkins had participated in the strike and had been returned to work only a week before he was discharged. At the time of the incident, Herman Proler saw Perkins holding a union handbill, so he undoubtedly knew of Perkins's union affiliation. When he was discharged, Perkins was told by the company's chief dispatcher that he had been seen by the "wrong man". Finally, and most importantly, the tire itself was not damaged; the flat was fixed and the tire was put back into service within several days. Perkins's reinstatement with back pay is affirmed.

III.

The company objects to the language of the Board's cease and desist order which bars the company from "in any other manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed under § 7 of the Act". The company did not raise this objection to the order before the Board, however, and the Supreme Court has held that this failure bars the company from raising the issue now absent extraordinary circumstances. NLRB v. Ochoa Fertilizer Corp., 1961, 368 U.S. 318, 322, 82 S.Ct. 344, 347, 7 L.Ed.2d 312; see 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). The company has not attempted to show, nor can we find, any extraordinary circumstances.

For the foregoing reasons, we ENFORCE the Board's cease and desist order, the order reinstating Roy Perkins with back pay, and the order to post an appropriate notice as modified to reflect our decision. We VACATE its order of reinstatement with back pay for the workers involved in the January strike and REMAND for further determinations concerning whether discharges occurred on January 31, 1978.

NLRB v. W. Carter Maxwell, d/b/a Pioneer Concrete Co.

637 F.2d 698 (9th Cir.), January 26, 1981; rehearing denied March 9, 1981—241 NLRB 264

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Duniway, Tang and Canby, Circuit Judges

Canby, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of its order against an employer, W. Carter Maxwell. The order is based upon findings by the Administrative Law Judge and the Board that Maxwell violated §§ 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging an employee, Cantrell, and violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by requesting another employee, Bower, to deliver Maxwell a copy of the written statement that Bower had submitted to the Board during its investigation of Cantrell's discharge. Finding the decision of the Administrative Law Judge and the Board supported by substantial evidence, we enforce the order. Because we base our decision entirely on the § 8(a)(1) violations, which are sufficient to support enforcement, we need not reach the § 8(a)(3) issue.

1. Factual Background:

Employer Maxwell has been engaged since 1950 as a sole proprietor in the business of producing and selling ready mixed concrete. At the time this case arose he employed five drivers, one of whom was Cantrell. The company was run on an informal basis. The drivers were not required to punch time cards and were paid for 40 hours per week, 52 weeks per year, whether they were working or sick or rained out. All of the drivers averaged less than 40 hours work per week.

Since 1960 Maxwell has had a collective bargaining agreement with Local 980 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (the Union). The standard agreement in force at the time in question provided that employees were to be paid time-and-a-half for work in excess of eight hours per day. At Maxwell's plant, however, this provision of the agreement had been wholly ignored ever since it came into force. Instead of paying overtime rates on those few occasions each year when drivers were required to work in excess of eight hours per day, Maxwell gave them compensatory time off on following days. No complaint concerning this practice had ever been made to the Union, even though Union representatives regularly visited Maxwell's plant. It seems clear that all of the drivers except Cantrell were quite content with a compensation system that benefited them more on balance than strict adherence to the collective bargaining agreement would have.

2. Cantrell's Discharge:

Cantrell was the only employee who had complained about Maxwell's failure to pay overtime rates and he had done so several times since 1970. On each occasion Maxwell had simply told him to take compensatory time off. On May 4th, 1977, Cantrell worked about an hour overtime and after work went to Maxwell and said he wanted to be paid for the hour at the overtime rate. According to the findings below the meeting was "acrimonious and probably involved some shouting." At the conclusion of the interchange, Cantrell asked Maxwell if he (Cantrell) was fired, and Maxwell answered in the negative and then stated, "I guess we can work out something perhaps under the table." In context, this statement referred to an arrangement regarding overtime.

On the following day, May 5th, Maxwell called Cantrell into the office after work and told him, "There just is no point in trying to continue here, it is not going to work. Why don't you quietly go on and look for another job. I will not do anything to hurt your unemployment pay." Another heated argument followed again probably with some shouting, after which Maxwell handed Cantrell a check representing either accrued pay or severance pay.

Cantrell subsequently filed a charge with the Board based upon his discharge. A complaint issued and the Administrative Law Judge found that Maxwell had violated §§ 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Cantrell "at least in substantial part" because of his attempt to enforce the overtime provisions of the collective bargaining agreement. The Board relied solely on that determination in upholding the decision of the Administrative Law Judge regarding Cantrell's discharge.

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to "interfere with, restrain or coerce employees" in the exercise of their rights to engage in collective bargaining and other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining. Maxwell does not argue that Cantrell's request for overtime pay was not a protected activity. See NLRB v. Adams Delivery Service, Inc., 623 F.2d 96, 100 (9th Cir. 1980). The central question in this case, therefore, is whether Cantrell was fired because of his attempts to be paid overtime as provided in the agreement or for some other reason not protected by the Act. If substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole supports the decision of the Board, we must enforce it. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487–88, 71 S.Ct. 456, 463–464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Maxwell contends that he fired Cantrell because Cantrell shouted at him and not because of his attempts to enforce the agreement. He points to the fact that Cantrell had complained about overtime previously without retaliation by Maxwell. We find substantial evidence in the record to support a contrary determination. The Administrative Law Judge was justified in concluding from Maxwell's own testimony that he had decided to discharge Cantrell when he called him into the office on May 5 and that the reason for the discharge was Cantrell's insistence upon the overtime arrangement guaranteed by the collective bargaining agreement. Because Cantrell was fired for trying to enforce the collective bargaining agreement, his discharge violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act.[1]

3. Maxwell's Request for a Copy of Employee Bower's Statement to the Board:

After Cantrell filed the unfair labor practice charge with the Board, Maxwell asked Bower, another employee, for a copy of the statement Bower had made to the Board. Maxwell did not advise Bower that no reprisals would be taken against him if he refused to deliver the affidavit. Maxwell made no showing that he needed the statement or any part of it for purposes of trial preparation. Bower agreed to obtain the statement for Maxwell, and Maxwell produced a typed letter of request which Bower signed. A copy of the statement was mailed by the Board to Bower, and he delivered it to Maxwell. The Administrative Law Judge found that Bower could not have refused the request, and concluded that the request therefore violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Board concurred in that finding.

Because there is no suggestion in the record that Bower was unwilling to cooperate with Maxwell, we understand the ruling of the Administrative Law Judge and the Board to be that a request for an employee's statement to the Board is a per se violation of § 8(a)(1) in the absence of assurances to the employee that there will be no retaliation for refusal and of a showing by the employer that the statement is needed for the employer's trial preparation. Some courts appear to have adopted such a rule. NLRB v. Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 341 F.2d 750 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 830, 86 S.Ct. 69, 15 L.Ed.2d 74 (1965); Retail Clerks International Association v. NLRB, 373 F.2d 655 (D.C.Cir. 1967); NLRB v. General Stencils, Inc., 438 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1971); see Texas Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 336 F.2d 128, 133 (5th Cir. 1964). Other courts have not endorsed a per se rule, but have held that the lawfulness of an employer's request for an employee's statement to the Board depends upon the balancing of circumstances that may suggest coercion against the employer's need for the information. NLRB v. Martin A. Gleason, Inc., 534 F.2d 466 (2d Cir. 1976); Robertshaw Controls Co., Lux Time Division v. NLRB, 483 F.2d 762 (4th Cir. 1973). The latter position is analogous to the rule of this circuit that the permissibility of interrogation of employees about union activities depends upon whether the totality of the circumstances indicates restraint or coercion of employees in the exercise of their § 7 rights. Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571, 584–85 (9th Cir. 1980); but see NLRB v. Port Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596, 599 n.1 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 915, 100 S.Ct. 1275, 63 L.Ed.2d 599 (1980). This circuit has not however, ruled on the issue now presented.

[1] We do not consider whether the Board applied the proper standard to decide whether the discharge violated the Act. Maxwell did not raise this issue before the Board or on appeal to this court. Therefore, under § 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), and 29 C.F.R. § 102.46, we may not consider the question. Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 311 & n.10, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1129 & n.10, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979); NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 350, 73 S.Ct. 287, 290, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953); NLRB v. Don Burgess Construction Corp., 596 F.2d 378, 389 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 940, 100 S.Ct. 293, 62 L.Ed.2d 306 (1979).

Faced with an open question we adopt the rule that an employer violates § 8(a)(1) per se by requesting an employee's statement to the Board without assuring the employee that no reprisals will follow from refusal, and without showing that the requested statement is needed for trial preparation and that the request does not go beyond those needs. We believe that any less stringent rule presents too great a risk of interference with the Board's enforcement of the Act. We find strong support for this conclusion in NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S., 214, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 57 L.Ed.2d 159 (1978), where the Supreme Court held that prehearing statements made by empolyees to the Board were exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. The Court dealt at some length with the damage that disclosure of employee statements would cause to the administration of the Act:

> The most obvious risk of "interference" with enforcement proceedings in this context is that enployers or, in some cases, unions will coerce or intimidate employees and others who have given statements, in an effort to make them change their testimony or not to testify at all.
> The danger of witness intimidation is particularly acute with respect to current employees-whether rank and file, supervisory, or managerial over whom the employer, by virtue of the employment relationship, may exercise intense leverage. Not only can the employer fire the employee, but job assignments can be switched, hours can be adjusted, wage and salary increases held up, and other more subtle forms of influence exerted.
> Furthermore, both employees and nonemployees may be reluctant to give statements to NLRB investigators at all, absent assurances that unless called to testify in a hearing, their statements will be exempt from disclosure until the unfair labor practice charge has been adjudicated.

Id. at 239-4040, S.Ct. at 2325.

We believe that an employer's direct request to an employee for the employee's statement to the Board presents the same dangers of influencing testimony or chilling prehearing statements that the Supreme Court described in Robbins. The possibility that an employer's request will have a coercive effect on testimony is even present when the employee's statement is favorable to the employer for "those known to have already given favorable statements are then subject to pressure to give even more favorable testimony." Id. at 240, 98 S.Ct. at 2325. Even more damaging to the administration of the Act is the general chilling effect that is caused by permitting employer requests not directed at trial preparation. If an employee knows that his statements may become available to his employer, he is certainly less likely to make a candid statement to the Board. Wellman Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 427, 431 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 834, 95 S.Ct. 61, 42 L.Ed.2d 61 (1974); NLRB v. National Survey Services, Inc., 361 F.2d 199, 206 (7th Cir. 1966); Texas Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 336 F.2d 128, 133 (5th Cir. 1964). The employee may even refuse to make a statement at all. Robbins, supra, 437 U.S. at 240, 98 S.Ct. 2325. Any such chilling effect is bound to interfere with the Board's enforcement of the Act. The Board may not initiate proceedings against an employer on its own motion. It must rely upon complaints made by individual employees and labor unions to uncover unfair labor practices. Moreover, a rule preventing employers from requesting statements except for purposes of trial will provide protection for employees in the vast majority of Board proceedings which are concluded without the necessity for trial. Id. at 241, 98 S.Ct. 2326.

For these reasons, we conclude that it violates § 8(a)(1) of the Act for an employer to request from an employee a copy of that employee's statement to the Board without assuring the employee that no reprisals will follow from refusal, and without showing that the requested statement is needed for trial preparation and that the request does not go beyond those needs. NLRB v. Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 341 F.2d 750, 752-53 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 830, 86 S.Ct. 69, 15 L.Ed.2d 74 (1965); Retail Clerks International Association v. NLRB, 373 F.2d 655, 658 (D.C.Cir.1967). We believe that this rule provides sufficiently for the employer's legitimate interest in defending himself against those charges that do come to trial. We note also the Board's own rules accommodate this interest of the employer by giving him access to statements of employees who become witnesses against the employer. 29 CFR § 102.18(b). In the present case, however, there was no showing that the requested information was needed for trial preparation nor was there any assurance against reprisal. We therefore uphold the decision of the Administrative Law Judge and the Board that the request violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Jurisdiction of the Board:

Employer Maxwell contends that his business is essentially local and that its effect on interstate commerce is de minimis. The record indicates that in the year preceding trial Maxwell's business purchased goods, materials and supplies valued in excess of $6,000 which originated outside of the state of California. Maxwell relies on Groneman v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 354, 177 F.2d 995 (10th Cir. 1949), which held that the use of $6,000 worth of material shipped in interstate commerce was insufficient to support the jurisdiction of the Board. This decision, however, seems to stand alone and is contrary to the others in this circuit and elsewhere. For example, in NLRB v. Inglewood Park Cemetery Association, 355 F.2d 448 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, sub nom. First Congregational Church v. NLRB, 384 U.S. 951, 86 S.Ct. 1572, 16 L.Ed.2d 548 (1966), this court held that $3,000 worth of interstate purchases was not de minimis and did support jurisdiction. Accord: NLRB v. Aurora City Lines, Inc., 299 F.2d 229 (7th Cir. 1962) ($2,000 sufficient); Von Solbrig Hospital, Inc. v. NLRB, 465 F.2d 173 (7th Cir. 1972) ($1925 sufficient).

It is true that this court refused to uphold jurisdiction in Hiatt v. Schlecht, 400 F.2d 875 (9th Cir. 1968), where the record showed only that the employer during the years in question had used $5600–$8000 of plumbing fixtures assumed to have been originally produced in other states. In view of Congress's intent to exercise the full extent of its commerce power in the National Labor Relations Act, NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed.2d 279 (1963); NLRB v. Children's Baptist Home, 576 F.2d 256, 258 n.1 (9th Cir. 1978), the ruling in Hiatt may be substantially eroded by the later decision of Daniel v. Paul, 395 U.S. 298, 89 S.Ct. 1697, 23 L.Ed.2d 318 (1969). In any event, we find Hiatt distinguishable from the present case. While neither case disclosed any direct purchases by the employer from out-of-state sellers, the evidence now before us shows far more effect on intermediate commerce than that presented by the meagre record in Hiatt. Maxwell was shown not only to have purchased $6000 worth of goods originating in other states, but the particular goods were identified and shown to have been handled only by the importer before being delivered to Maxwell. A $1920 order of cement was procured by a local dealer from an out-of-state supplier and was delivered to Maxwell without the importer's having operated on or modified the goods in any way. Large insurance policies written by out-of-state companies were taken out on the business by Maxwell through local agents. In view of this record, we cannot say that a labor dispute in Maxwell's enterprise does not "affect commerce" within the expansive meaning of § 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(a).

5. Deferral to Arbitration:

Employer Maxwell suggests that the Board should have deferred its decision in favor of an arbitration proceeding to which the parties had agreed, but which they had not pursued to a conclusion. While the Board does have discretion to defer to an arbitration award, Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), this court has held that it may not defer the decision of the statutory charge unless the arbitral tribunal has clearly decided the unfair labor practice issue. Stephenson v. NLRB, 550 F.2d 535 (9th Cir. 1977). The Board was therefore justified in going forward with the present proceeding. See NLRB v. Thor Power Tool Co., 351 F.2d 584 (7th Cir. 1965).

6. Conclusion:

The decision of the Administrative Law Judge and the Board regarding both violations of § 8(a)(1) is supported by substantial evidence. Enforcement is ordered.

Westvaco Corporation d/b/a Westvaco Gauley Woodyard v. NLRB

639 F.2d 189 (4th Cir.), January 27, 1981—249 NLRB 20

On petition to review Board Order

Before BRYAN, Senior Circuit Judge, and WIDENER and MURNAGHAN, Circuit Judges

MURNAGHAN, Circuit Judge: Collective bargaining sessions took place between Westvaco Corp., as employer at the Company's Gauley Woodyard situated in the vicinity of Rupert, West Virginia, and the certified exclusive bargaining representative, the United Paperworkers International Union. Heavy equipment operators, woodsmen and truck operators constituted the bargaining unit.

Bargaining took place over an extended period beginning on August 29, 1977 and concluding in February or March, 1979. The certification election date was September 10, 1975, and certification occurred on March 2, 1976. The election had been close, having been decided by the resolution of one contested ballot. The employer had unsuccessfully asserted that the certification was improper and that it, consequently, was relieved from the obligation to bargain. We enforced the NLRB order directing that bargaining take place. Westvaco Corp. v. NLRB, 562 F.2d 50 (4th Cir. 1977) (decision without published opinion).

On April 4, 1978, the NLRB closed the file on the enforcement proceeding on the grounds that Westvaco had satisfactorily complied with the order. The closing was conditional, however, and subject to reopening if the present status of compliance should not continue. On April 5, 1978, the Union signified that it had no objection to the closing "as long as the present state of compliance continues," and stated that bargaining was in progress.

Negotiations terminated on receipt in or about March 1979 by the employer of a petition signed by a majority of the bargaining unit employees stating that they did not want the Union to represent them.

The Administrative Law Judge concluded that Westvaco had engaged in sham or surface bargaining rather than comply with its obligation to bargain in good faith. The NLRB agreed and affirmed an order requiring Westvaco to bargain collectively in good faith.

A search of the record and of the ALJ and NLRB opinions has led us to conclude that the evidence establishes that good faith, albeit hard-nosed bargaining was conducted by Westvaco. It took and stood firm on several positions as to which the ALJ would have preferred to have seen some relaxation. Good faith negotiation does not, however, compel a party to agree to a proposal or to make a concession. "Where two opposing negotiators steadfastly refuse to budge from their respective positions, it can hardly be inferred from this alone that either acted in bad faith." NLRB v. Stevenson Brick and Block Co., 393 F.2d 234, 238 (4th Cir. 1968).

The ALJ, in short, indulged in suspicions and suppositions, yet had no substantial basis other than the fact of failure by the parties to reach agreement. Legitimate reasons existed for the positions of the employer, who was able to conclude negotiations with the same exclusive bargaining representative for other nearby units. The efforts of the ALJ to explain away the facts which compellingly supported Westvaco's case are simply contrived and unconvincing. The NLRB Order is not supported by substantial evidence.

Accordingly, we deny enforcement.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

Zeiglers Refuse Collectors, Inc. v. NLRB

639 F.2d 1000 (3d Cir.), January 27, 1981—248 NLRB 1166

On petition to review Board Order

Before ADAMS, GARTH and SLOVITER, Circuit Judges

GARTH, Circuit Judge: In this case, certain employees who favored and backed a union, threatened their co-employees with physical violence if they did not vote for that union in the representation election. The Hearing Officer found this conduct created an atmosphere of fear and reprisal which warranted setting aside the election. The National Labor Relations Board summarily rejected the Hearing Officer's findings and concluded that the threats constituted no more than "mere campaign bravado." The Board refused to set aside the election and certified the union as the exclusive representative of the employees. Because we find the Board's decision unsupported by substantial evidence, we grant Zeigler's petition for review and we deny the Board's cross-petition for enforcement.

I.

Zeiglers Refuse Collectors, Inc. ("Zeiglers") operates a refuse collecting business, including a Rear Load Division located in York, Pennsylvania. As of September 15, 1978, the date of the representation election, the Rear Load Division employed thirty eligible employee-voters.

The drive to unionize Zeigler's was initiated by employee Russell Knight. Sometime in the summer of 1978, he spoke with officials of Chauffeurs, Teamsters, and Helpers Local 430, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters; and subsequently began soliciting support for the union among his co-workers. On July 26, 1978, Local 430 filed a petition with the Board seeking a representation election among the rear load drivers of Zeiglers' York facility. The election was held September 15, 1978, and the union won by a vote of 16 to 14.

Zeiglers raised four objections to the election: employees with close ties to Local 430 had coerced fellow employees to vote for the union, and Local 430 had acquiesced in this activity; the atmosphere of coercion had prevented the holding of a free election; the union illegally had required certain employees to pay twenty dollars as a pre-condition to signing a union authorization card; and union officials illegally had interrogated and polled employees. The Regional Director recommended that a hearing be held only on the first two claims: union sponsorship of coercion and the claim that a coercive atmosphere prevented a free election. He found that the allegations concerning the illegal interrogation were insufficient as a matter of law. The Board adopted the Regional Director's recommendations.

A hearing was held on February 21, 1979 before a Hearing Officer. Five employees of Zeiglers, two members of Zeiglers' management, and two officials of Local 430 testified. On April 9, 1979, the Hearing Officer issued his report recommending that, because of the coercive atmosphere which pervaded the September 15 election, a new election be held. This conclusion was based upon his finding that five incidents of coercive conduct took place. In approximate chronological order, these incidents are:

1. Employee Glenn Null testified that a few months prior to the election, Russ Knight, another employee, when handing out union authorization cards told a group of employees which included Glenn Null, Rick Chappell and Martin Morth-land, that if they did not sign the cards, they would not work for the employer any longer.[1] Knight then requested a twenty dollar contribution from each of these workers. (App. at 289).

2. Russ Knight, Barry Leisenring and Larry Leisenring approached employee Martin Morthland about a week before the election, and informed him that employees who didn't give $20.00 and sign union authorization cards were going to "get their asses kicked." (App. 108, 289).

3. About a week or two before the election, employee Charles "Pee Wee" Preston, a 6′7″, 250 pound ex-Marine, approached Rick Chappel (5′8″, 145 pounds) at the employee lunch wagen. Preston said to Chappell: "I heard you are voting no for the union" to which Chappell responded: "Whoever told you that is a liar." The Hearing Officer found that Chappell's response was motivated by his desire to avoid any trouble with Preston. Preston then warned: "Well you had better be voting for the Union if you know what is good for you." The Hearing Officer found that Chappell understood this statement to be a threat upon his physical well-being, and not a prediction of the benefits of unionization. (App. at 290).

4. A day before the election Preston walked over to employees Glenn Null (5′7″, 140 pounds) and James Oleweiler and asked them if they were "going to vote no or yes for the Union." When neither responded, Preston threatened Null and Oleweiler that if they knew what was best for them, they would vote for the Union. (App. at 82, 290).

[1] Chappell testified to the same effect as Null. In addition, Chappell claimed that another employee, Mo Leisenring, was also present when the statement was made. The Hearing Officer credited Null's and Chappell's testimony. (App. at 289)

5. On election day, during the time the polls were open, Preston approached Null and Chappell at a spot forty feet from the polling place about five minutes before these two employees voted. According to Null, Preston stated: "What are you voting, yes or no. If you vote no for the Union; me, Russ Knight and Barry Leisenring gets fired; we are going to kick your ass." Chappell remembered Preston saying: "When you go in there to vote, you had better vote for the Union or else you know what is going to happen." (App. at 290). The Hearing Officer found that Null and Chappell provided an accurate account of the incident.

The Hearing Officer held that these five threats created an atmosphere of fear which rendered the holding of a fair election impossible. He found this coercive atmosphere to be pervasive, because accounts of these threats were also circulated among the rank and file, and because reports had spread that Preston had threatened other employees as well.[2] He thus recommended that a new election be held, despite finding that none of the threats could be attributed to Local 430.

On appeal, the Board refused to accept the Hearing Officer's recommendation. Instead, in its decision of September 27, 1979, it certified Local 430 as the representative of the employees in the Zeiglers unit. The Board's analysis, in its entirety, is as follows:

> We do not accept the Hearing Officer's recommendation and find that, even assuming the correctness of the Hearing Officer's factual findings and credibility resolutions,[2] the Employer has not demonstrated a sufficient factual foundation for the setting aside of the election.
> [2] We do not accept the Hearing Officer's finding that Martin Morthland's recantation on cross-examination should not be credited. Morthland expressly denied that employees Knight and Barry and Larry Leisenring intimidated him with physical threats 1 week before the election. Furthermore, Morthland impeached his credibility by substantially wavering on the approximate date of the threatening encounter. The Hearing Officer speculates that Morthland recanted only in order to end his "ordeal" on the stand, but that is only > speculation and no basis for rehabilitaing [sic] Morthland.
> The Hearing Officer finds "only minimal evidence concerning Petitioner's knowledge or participation in threats against employees concerning how they were going to vote." Furthermore, the most severe threats he attributes to pro-union employees are: If employees did not sign authorization cards, "they would not work for the Employer anymore"; "Whoever didn't give $20.00 and sign union authorization cards was going to 'get their asses kicked' "; "You had better be voting for the Union if you know what is good for you"; "If you vote no for the Union; me, Russ Knight and Barry Leisenring gets fired; we are going to kick your ass."
> We do not agree with the Hearing Officer that the above gives rise "to a pervasive sense of apprehension among prospective voters." [3] Inasmuch as the Hearing Officer has found "minimal" evidence connecting these campaign incidents with the Petitioner in any way, and such incidents did not relate directly to the election vote or create a general atmosphere of fear and confusion, we find that there is no basis for setting aside the election.[4] We shall, therefore, overrule the Employer's Objections 1 and 2, and shall order that the Petitioner be certified.
> [4] The Hearing Officer incorrectly relies on Sonoco of Puerto Rico, Inc., 210 NLRB 493 (1974), and Diamond State Poultry Co., Inc., 107 NLRB 3 (1953), in support of his conclusion that the election ought to be set aside. In both those cases the election environment was pervaded by immediate and serious physical coercion. In the instant case, there was no violence—only generalized verbal threats which, unlike the Hearing Officer, we do not consider "numerous"—of the character familiar to the playgrounds as well as the shop. The alleged intimidators in this case engaged in mere campaign bravado and "heated statements" reflecting an "overzealous partisanship rather than meaningful threats." American Wholesalers, Inc., 218 NLRB 292 (1975).

In order to obtain judicial review of the Board's decision, Zeiglers refused to bargain with Local 430.[3] Local 430 filed an unfair labor charge, alleging Zeiglers had violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with a certified representative. In an order dated April 16, 1980, the Board entered summary judgment for Local 430. Zeiglers petitions for review of that order and the Board cross petitions for enforcement. Our review of this order also brings before us the underlying order of January 22, 1979 which affirmed the dismissal of the charge of an illegal collection of a $20 fee [4] and the Board's order of September 27, 1979, which reversed the Hearing Officer's recommendation to hold a new election.[5] [2] Only inadmissible hearsay evidence was introduced to prove that these threats were actually uttered.

[4] The claim of illegal polling is not raised on appeal.

II.

The purpose of holding representation elections is to provide a means whereby workers may fairly and freely choose their bargaining representative if indeed they want one. See NLRB v. A.J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327–328, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946). A representation election should be "a laboratory in which an experiment may be conducted, under conditions as nearly ideal as possible, to determine the uninhibited desires of the employees." General Shoe Corp., 77 NLRB 124, 127 (1948) quoted in Monmouth Medical Center v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 820, 824 (3d Cir. 1979). The Board has an obligation to insure that an election is held "under such conditions as will be conducive to the sort of free and untrammeled choice of representatives contemplated by the Act." Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173, 1183 (4th Cir. 1979). Cf. Marshall v. Local Union 12447, United Steelworkers of America, 591 F.2d 199 (3d Cir. 1978) (In election of local union officials, Section 401(b) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, 29 U.S.C. § 481(b) (1976) requires union to take every reasonable precaution to ensure voting secrecy).

We concede that the goal of "laboratory conditions" cannot always be satisfied. Not every election that fails to achieve perfection should be set aside, otherwise the employees' choice of a representative might never be accomplished, because a never-ending series of challenges to elections could be foreseen. Though we are reluctant to accept less-than-perfect conditions in the election process, we will do so, but only where no coercive conduct has poisoned the fair and free choice which employees are entitled to make. Hence, extreme care must be taken that the laboratory conditions have not become so tainted that employees may have based their vote not upon conviction, but upon fear or upon any other improperly induced consideration. The Board and the courts have emphasized that the existence of a coercive atmosphere, regardless of how such an atmosphere came about, is the critical fact upon which the Board should focus in determining whether a fair and free election was impossible. Diamond State Poultry Co., 107 NLRB 3, 6 (1953); Cross Baking Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 1346, 1348 (1st Cir. 1971). Thus, if it is determined that a substantial possibility existed that the threats affected the outcome of the election, a new election must be held.

In determining whether a fair and free choice by the employees was impossible the Board must consider many factors. These include: the number of the threats, the severity of the threats and whether those threatened were put in fear, the number of workers threatened, whether the threats were made close to the election and whether they persisted in the minds of the employees at the time of the election, whether the reports of the threats were widely circulated, whether the effect of pro-union threats were cancelled out by pro-management threats, the closeness of the vote, Monmouth Medical Center v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 820, 823 n.4 (3d Cir. 1979), and whether the threats can be attributed to the union or the management, see e. g., Price Bros. Co., 211 NLRB 822, 823 (1974). See also Campbell Prods. Dept., 623 F.2d 876 (3d Cir. 1980). The Board must examine the record, determine the weight to be accorded each factor, and applying its experience, arrive at a final, articulated decision supported by substantial evidence.

Zeiglers and the Board are in strenuous disagreement over whether the coercive threats that were made here can be attributed to the union. Both the Hearing Officer and the Board concluded that they could not. We agree.

None of the workers who uttered the threats, including Pee Wee Preston and Russ Knight, held any position in or conferred by the Union. See NLRB v. Georgetown Dress Corp., 537 F.2d 1239 (4th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Urban Telephone Corp., 499 F.2d 239 (7th Cir. 1974). Nor does the record reveal any express impropriety committed by a union official. The only evidence that appears is that the president of Local 430, responded to Pee Wee's remark that he (Pee Wee) would physically intimidate those who were not in favor of unionization, by stating that such behavior was unacceptable.[6] There was no showing that the union knew of any improper acts or that it failed to repudiate them. Certain-Teed Prods. Corp. v. NLRB, 562 F.2d 500, 510 (7th Cir. 1977). Thus, even though Preston and Knight became by their own acts, self-appointed emissaries of the union, and even though we recognize a broad principal-agent standard under 29 U.S.C. § 152(13),[7] we conclude, as did the Hearing Officer and the Board, that the threats cannot be attributed to the union.

However, we do not find the factor of union responsibility to be pivotal. It is merely one of many factors the Board must appraise in determining whether a fair and free election was impossible. Nor have other decisions accorded controlling weight to this factor. Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173, 1183 (4th Cir. 1979); Sonoco of Puerto Rico, Inc., 410 NLRB 493, 494 (1974); Steak House Meat Co., 206 NLRB 28, 29 (1973); Diamond State Poultry Co., 107 NLRB 3, 6 (1953).[8] In Methodist Home, 596 F.2d at 1183, the Fourth Circuit wrote:

> If the conduct, though that of a mere Union adherent and not that of a Union agent or employee, is sufficiently substantial in nature to create a general environment of fear and reprisal such as to render a free choice of representation impossible, then it will require the voiding of the election. This was forcefully stated in Home Town Foods v. N.L.R.B. (5th Cir. 1967) 379 F.2d 241, 244, reh. denied and reh. en banc denied 416 F.2d 392 (1969):
> "We are not impressed with the argument that all coercive acts must be shown to be attributable to the union itself, rather than to the rank and file of its supporters. As of the Board has once said, 'The important fact is that such conditions existed and that a free election is hereby rendered impossible.' "

Similarly the Board explained in Diamond State Poultry, 107 NLRB at 6:

> The issue before the Board is whether the election was conducted under such circumstances and under such conditions as were conducive to the sort of free and untrammeled choice of representatives contemplated by the Act. We hold that it was not. The election was held in such a general atmosphere of confusion and fear of reprisal as to render impossible the rational, uncoerced selection of a bargaining representative. It is not material that the fear and disorder may have been created by individual employees and non-employees and that their conduct cannot be attributed either to the Employer or to the unions. The important fact is that such conditions existed and that a free election was thereby rendered impossible.

The Board asserts that its determination that the union did not participate in the threats must be given great weight because workers are less likely to be intimidated by threats that do not bear the imprimatur of the union, and that ordering a new election will not deter the improper conduct of third parties. See NLRB v. Staub Cleaners, Inc., 418 F.2d 1086 (2d Cir. 1969); Orleans Mfg. Co., 120 NLRB 630 (1958). Thus, in Staub Cleaners, supra, the Second Circuit found the union-third party distinction soundly based when applied to an anonymous rumor that had circulated among the employees. The court stated that prejudicial remarks

[6] The relevant portion of the Hearing Officer's opinion dealing with this subject reads:

> Based on the testimony of Rick Chappell, I find that Charles Preston in the presence of Petitioner's President, Kenneth Stocker, and Organizer, Bruce Keener, told the employees at the meeting that if the Petitioner needed more support to win the election, he would resort to physical intimidation to find out who was voting against the Petitioner. He then threatened to use force to change the votes of those employees who did not currently support the Petitioner. It is noteworthy that Chappell also credibly testified that Kenneth Stocker immediately told Preston "no, we don't want any of that stuff around here". Thus, the Petitioner made it clear that it did not approve of Preston's "organizing" techniques. There was no evidence to demonstrate that the Petitioner had reason to believe that Preston or any other employee would fail to abide by Stocker's admonishment of Preston.

Chappell during the hearing testified, however, that President Stocker laughed after having told Preston "No we don't want any of that stuff around here." (App. at 151-52, 290-91).

[7] "In determining whether any person is acting as an 'agent' of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts, the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling." 29 U.S.C. § 152(13) (1976).

[8] In Methodist Home, the Fourth Circuit remanded for an evidentiary hearing as to whether a purported joke involving the threatened use of a knife required that the election to be set aside. The Board in Sonoco of Puerto Rico and Diamond State Poultry set aside an election because of four threats of physical violence similar to those uttered during the election in question here. In Steak House, on several occasions one employee threatened a 16-year-old employee with bodily harm, and on one occasion threatened to kill him, if this employee voted against the union.

emanating from non-authoritative, anonymous sources are more lightly regarded than those backed by the union, and that setting aside the initial election would not deter these third parties from again acting improperly in a future election campaign.

We are more persuaded by former Chief Judge Aldrich's observations which appear in Cross Baking Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 1346 (1st Cir. 1971). In that case two employees of the company assaulted two other employees of the company because the latter workers refused to support the union. Word of this incident was heard about the plant. Ultimately, it was held that the Board was justified in refusing to set aside the election on this evidence because the "principal actor" who committed the assault was thereafter almost immediately discharged. The incident was remote in time from the election, and no further incidents occurred in the months before the election. In discussing the fear engendered among employees by coercion of this kind, Chief Judge Aldrich wrote:

> We agree with the Board, but we do not agree with certain arguments it advanced in this court. Von Dreden [the employee chiefly responsible for the assault] was the principal in-plant union advocate. The Board regards it important that she was not shown to be a paid union agent. The question, however, is not the culpability of the union, but whether an atmosphere of fear and coercion was created in fact. See Home Town Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 5 Cir., 1967, 379 F.2d 241, 244; Shoreline Enterprises of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 5 Cir., 1959, 262 F.2d 933, 942. It does not follow that fear would be less effective if it had an unofficial origin. Indeed, we can visualize situations where it might be more effective. If union officials instigated violence, anti-union employees might gain adherents to get rid, once and for all, of a belligerent union by voting against it, whereas if the atmosphere was the product of co-employees, the rest of the employees might feel they were going to be left with a disagreeable situation whatever should happen in the election, and hence had best learn to live with it. In any event, we agree with the earlier position of the Board that, regardless of whether coercive acts are shown to be attributable to the union itself, "[t]he important fact is that such conditions existed and that a free election was hereby rendered impossible." Diamond State Poultry Co., 1953, 107 N.L.R.B. 3, 6.

Id. at 1348.

Here, the fact that Pee Wee Preston was not a union agent does not make his threats of physical violence any less intimidating. The sources of the threats and rumors at Zeiglers during this time were also well known. Yet, the union apparently did not keep a close watch on the election campaign; it sent no official into the workplace; and indeed the record does not disclose that the various union officials were aware that threats had been made, even though in at least one instance a union official was present when the use of threats was suggested. Although we cannot hold the union legally responsible for the coercive conduct, we question whether the union should not have taken a more active role in preventing the excesses of its supporters once it became aware that employee adherents were contemplating physical threats as a means of assuring a union victory.

B.

Having found the union not responsible for the threats made by Preston and his colleagues, does not complete our task. The Board and the courts have acknowledged that even though the threats made were not attributable to the union, an election will nevertheless be set aside where the conduct created a general atmosphere inimical to the employees' exercise of a free and fair choice. The only distinction recognized in the statement of this standard is that less weight is accorded to conduct of third parties (such as Preston and Knight in the instant case) than to the conduct of the employer and the union. This standard has been expressed as follows:

1008

> It has long been established that, while conduct not attributable to either party to an election may be grounds for setting aside the election, less weight is accorded to such conduct than to the conduct of the parties. In such circumstances, however, the Board has set aside elections where the conduct created a general atmosphere among voting employees of confusion and fear of reprisal for failing to vote for or to support the Union.

Steak House Meat Co., 206 NLRB 3, 4 (1973) (footnotes omitted)

Thus, we still must determine under the stated standard whether substantial evidence supports the Board's findings and conclusions. The Board as we have noted rejected the Hearing Officer's findings of coercion and ruled that the election should be upheld.

In our substantial evidence review, we must address the Board's unexplained perfunctory rejection of the Hearing Officer's findings. In Eastern Engineering & Elevator Co. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 191 at 197 (3d Cir. 1980) this court wrote:

> In our review of the Board's order, the statute furnishes our basic direction: the reviewing court treats as conclusive the factual determinations in a Board decision if they are "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(f). That the responsibility of fact finding is placed on the Board and not on the hearing judge, however, does not end our inquiry. The Supreme Court has directed us to recognize that an ALJ's findings of fact constitute a vital part of the whole record that the court must review. These findings "are to be considered along with the consistency and inherent probability of testimony. The significance of his report * * * depends largely on the importance of credibility in the particular case." Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 496 [71 S.Ct. 456, 468–469, 95 L.Ed. 456] (1951). We must "recognize that evidence supporting a conclusion may be less substantial when an impartial experienced examiner who has observed the witnesses and lived with the case has drawn conclusions different from the Board's than when he has reached the same conclusion." Id.

Our review is particularly demanding when the Board has rejected the credibility determinations of the examiner that were based in large part on demeanor evidence. See Eastern Engineering, supra, at 197–198. Judge Wallace of the Ninth Circuit wrote in Penasquitos Village Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074 (9th Cir. 1977) (Wallace, J. opinion announcing the judgment of the court), an opinion discussed with approval in Eastern Engineering, at 197–198 that evidence in the record that alone might amount to substantial evidence and therefore support the Board's decision, may be insufficient when the trial examiner, on the basis of the witnesses' demeanor, made credibility determinations contrary to the Board's position.

The Hearing Officer here was in the best position to determine the atmosphere of the workplace during the election campaign. He could observe whether the workers who were threatened appeared to have been scared, and whether, in light of their mental state and physical stature, they were likely to have been influenced by the threats. The Hearing Officer could also make the "front line" determination as to whether the threats were in fact intimidating, and even more so, whether the persons making the threats were themselves frightening. The Board in reviewing a cold record was in a less knowledgeable position to decide these issues, particularly where the inquiry focused on subjective fears and subjective reactions.[9]

The Hearing Officer in this case found that there had been at least five separate incidents of coercion. In recommending a new election he expressly considered the following facts: numerous employees had been threatened, the threats were serious, involving physical violence and loss of jobs; that these threats, particularly those made by Pee Wee Preston, created fear in the minds of those threatened; that reports of the threats were widely circulated, and that rumors of other incidents of physical coercion had swept Zeiglers. Implicit in his discussion of these facts is that he deemed it significant that four of the five incidents occurred within a week or two of the election, and that the two most egregious threats took place respectively on the day before the election, and on the day of the election. He concluded after analyzing all these circumstances that a fair and free election had been made impossible.

These findings made by the Hearing Officer are amply supported in the record. Even the Board concedes that four out of the five incidents of coercion occurred. A reading of the transcript reveals that Null and Chappell were scared by the threats; and that they sincerely believed that they would be beaten up by Pee Wee if the union lost the election.

[9] Placing a greater burden on the Board when it rejects the findings of the trial examiner also serves institutional values. A Hearing Officer who has his well-reasoned factual findings overridden by the Board in a brief conclusory manner, as the Board did in this case, may in the future, be inclined to write less thorough and detailed opinions.

Chappell testified that he considered Pee Wee's statement that he, Chappell, had better vote for the union if he knew what was good for him, to be a threat that Pee Wee would beat him up. (App. at 124, 136). This threat scared him and caused him to fear Preston. (App. at 139). When asked to explain, he appropriately remarked, "Well if you have a guy standing over you that is a couple feet taller than you and bigger than you, I think you would be a little scared, too." (App. at 139–40).

Chappell also described Preston's statement on election day, as being a threat (App. at 124). He testified that he was only half-scared by this threat because Mo Leisenring, who had two baseball bats in the back of the truck, would help protect him, as would Null.

Null also interpreted this election day threat literally: if the union lost, and Knight and Preston were fired, Knight and Preston would "kick his ass." (App. at 86, 88). Null claimed that he was "not really" afraid, because Mo Leisenring was present, but qualified this statement by adding "unless I was by my own self see, I didn't know if he was going to get other friends or not. See, like people does like that [sic]. They try to get their other friends and stuff * * *." (App. at 87).

Null also considered Preston's statement made to Oleweiler and to him the day before the election, to be a threat. Again he claimed that he was "not really afraid", though he quickly added, "[y]ou know, he might beat me up, but—" (App. at 84). In general, Null testified that he really thought he would be physically harmed by Preston if he voted against the union. (App. at 105). He indicated on re-cross examination that his testimony that he had not been really afraid when threatened could not be taken too literally:

Q. You did testify that you were not afraid of Mr. Preston. Isn't that true?

A. Kind of, I'm kind of afraid of him, you know, like I said, he could beat me. I don't know.

Q. But, you were not afraid of him. You would fight him.

A. I wouldn't fight him. I would get all my brothers. He is a little too big for me.

(App. at 106).[10]

The record also reveals that Null and Chappell were small in stature, unsophisticated,[11] and thus likely to be influenced by Pee Wee and his coercive warnings. Finally, the election was close—a switch of one vote would have altered the outcome. This record gives us good cause to believe that the coercive conduct which the Hearing Officer found gave rise to a substantial likelihood that the outcome of the election was affected. See NLRB v. Staub Cleaners, Inc., supra, 418 F.2d at 1088.

In its decision, the Board claimed that it assumed "the correctness of the Hearing Officer's factual findings and credibility resolutions."[12] The Board did not accept however, the examiner's factual findings that a general atmosphere of fear and confusion existed. It overruled this conclusion of the Hearing Officer because it concluded that the threats were not attributable to the union and because there were "only generalized verbal threats * * * of the character familiar to the playground as well as the shop * * * [the threats were] mere campaign bravado and 'heated statements' reflecting an 'overzealous partisanship rather than meaningful threats.'" The Board also remarked that it did not consider the threats numerous and that they did not relate directly to the election vote.

It is true that the Board is said to be possessed of expertise in many aspects of the labor field. But that expertise cannot suffice as a substitute of evidence. In the complete absence of any evidence that threats made by a 6'7", 250 pound union adherent to co-workers of substantially slighter dimensions were "mere campaign bravado", we are not inclined to accept the Board's speculative characterizations. Indeed, under our standard of review, we are precluded from so doing.

[10] Thus the Board engages in sophistry when it states in its brief that the threat "Well, you had better be voting for the union if you know what is good for you" is "susceptible of the interpretation that union representation would be good for the employees because it would better their wages and working condition." (NLRB brief at 20). This interpretation not only fails to recognize the significance of demeanor evidence, but more importantly, it is belied by the reactions of those threatened.

[11] Null was only 17 years old at the time of the election (App. at 72); Chappell's age is not revealed by the record, though he also appears to have been young.

[12] In its footnote 3 the Board refused to accept the Hearing Officer's finding that Morthland had been threatened because he had recanted, and because he wavered substantially as to the date of the encounter. It appears to us that the Hearing Officer was better able than the Board to judge whether Morthland's recantation was sincere. Looking at the cold record it is difficult to determine why Morthland changed his testimony. We have more confidence in the Hearing Officer who observed Morthland on the stand and in the Hearing Officer's evaluation, than we have in the Board's assessment which suffers from its failure to be present during the hearing. Although Morthland was inconsistent, there is little indication that he was fabricating the account of his threats. Morthland's testimony is not key to our resolution; even if we accept his discrediting by the Board, our decision would remain the same.

This record is completely devoid of any evidence which could lead to a conclusion that Pee Wee Preston did not intend to carry out his threats as he had expressed them. "When fear and threats of violence are present, the employees' state of mind is precisely the question at issue." Cross Baking, supra, at 1348. In this case the Hearing Officer, who saw both the threatened employees and those accused of threatening, found that Chappell and Null understood Preston's warnings to be threats upon their physical well-being. In finding that the statements made by Knight and Preston created an atmosphere of fear and that accounts of these threats circulated freely among Zeiglers' employees, the Hearing Officer also found that these threats did not have an isolated impact but gave rise to a pervasive sense of apprehension among prospective voters. Yet, at no time has the Board addressed these findings.

Nowhere in the testimony or in the Hearing Officer's opinion is there even a suggestion that Preston's statements "We are going to kick your ass" and "You had better be voting for the union if you know what is good for you" were deemed to be jokes, mere bravado, or an outpouring of overzealous partisanship. See Methodist Home v. NLRB, supra; NLRB v. Bostik Div. USM Corp., 517 F.2d 971 (6th Cir. 1975).[13] To the contrary, the evidence and the findings are unequivocal: these were meaningful threats, having the obvious aim of coercing employees to vote for the union or otherwise suffer physical harm. Sonoco of Puerto Rico, Inc, 210 NLRB 493, 494 (1974).

For reasons that we have previously discussed, we also do not attach the same significance as the Board to the fact that these threats are not attributable to the union. Nor do we accept the Board's conclusion that five documented incidents are not numerous when there are only thirty employees. Finally, we are at a loss to understand the Board's statement that the threats, such as "If you vote no for the union; * * * we are going to kick your ass," did not directly relate to the election vote. At least three of the five threats could not have been more specifically aimed at influencing the election.[14]

Our independent review of the record has fully satisfied us that there is no evidence whatsoever which supports the Board's decision. On the other hand, we find more than ample evidence to support the findings of the Hearing Officer. In this respect we have accorded the Hearing Officer's determination which was based on a first-hand impression of the witnesses' demeanor, the weight to which it is entitled. See Eastern Engineering, supra. We find it difficult to understand how, in the context of this record, the Board could find that this election should be sustained. We are of the opinion that "the character of the conduct was so aggravated as to create and atmosphere of fear and reprisal which rendered a free expression of choice of representation impossible, and thus destroyed the laboratory conditions of the election." Sonoco of Puerto Rico, Inc., supra at 494.[15]

III.

Having conclude that no evidence supports the Board's order we will grant Zeiglers' petition for review, order the September 15, 1978 election to be set aside, and deny the Board's cross petition for enforcement.

[13] In Bostik, there was evidence in the record "that the 'threats' were not considered or intended seriously and had no inhibiting effect on the voters." Id. at 973. There was evidence that two of the employees involved in several of the incidents always kidded and joked with each other "and that the employee to whom the abusive language was directed 'kind of laughed.' " Id. The Hearing Officer there concluded that this interplay had not created an atmosphere of fear of coercion. In contradistinction to Bostik, here there is no evidence that the threats were made in jest (Neither Null nor Chappell was a friend of Preston) and the Hearing Officer here found that these threats had created an atmosphere of fear and coercion.

[14] The Board also failed to take into account the closeness of the vote, that four of the threats were made within a week or two of the election, and that reports of these and other threats, circulated among the workforce.

[15] The company, relying on NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973), has also claimed that the union's requirement that the employees pay a non-refundable $20 fee before being allowed to sign union authorization card interfered with employee free choice. Both the Regional Director and the Board found such a requirement would not justify setting an election aside. We have grave doubts that Savair would prohibit the practice in question here. However, in light of out disposition, which sets aside the election because an atmosphere of fear and reprisal made a fair and free election impossible, we do not reach or decide this issue.

NLRB v. Michigan State Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO

660 F.2d 1095 (6th Cir.), January 29, 1981

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before LIVELY, Circuit Judge, and PHILLIPS and PECK, Senior Circuit Judges

Michigan State Building and Construction Trades Council, AFL-CIO (the "Union"), having filed its Statement to the Court and having filed its consent to the entry of this Order, as expressed in the "Union's Consent to the Entry of Order", it is hereby ORDERED that the judgment of May 13, 1975, be and hereby is implemented as follows:

The Union, its officers, agents, representatives, successors and assigns shall:

1. Cease and desist from restraining or coercing in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, the employees of John F. Lawhon, Inc., R-B and Sons, Inc., George Lynn Construction Company, Inc., or any other employer or person engaged in interstate commerce or an industry affecting interstate commerce, either through its own officers, agents, or demonstrators, or any labor organization as may be acting in common cuase with it, by participating in, directing, authorizing, ratifying, condoning or causing any of the following:

a. Verbally threatening employees or their families with physical harm.

b. Intimidating persons by the use or display of firearms, knives or other weapons.

c. Damaging or threatening to damage any person's property.

d. Threatening to engage or engaging in mass picketing.

e. In any other manner, or by any other means, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following action:

a. Comply in all respects with the judgment filed on May 13, 1975, the contempt adjudication filed on April 22, 1977, and this order, which is in addition to and not in limitation of the earlier judgment and adjudication, and not in any way, by action or inaction, engage in, induce, encourage, permit, or condone any violation of said judgment, adjudication or order.

b. Immediately post in conspicuous places in the Union's business offices and all places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted for a perior of sixty consecutives days, copies of the attached notice signed by an appropriate officer on behalf of the Union, and alongside, a copy of this order; and maintain such notices and orders in clearly legible condition throughout the posting period and insure that they are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

c. Provide sufficient copies of said signed notice to the Regional Director for the Seventh Region, Patrick V. McNamara, Federal Building, 477 Michigan Avenue (Room 300), Detroit, MI 48226, for posting at the offices of the employers named above, if such employers be willing.

d. Have said notice read by the presiding officer at the next regularly scheduled convention of the Union following entry of this order. The Union shall give the Regional Director at least two weeks' notice to permit a Board Agent to attend the reading, at the option of the Regional Director.

e. Forthwith require each Officer and Business Agent of the Union to read this order and to signify in writing that he or she has read this order. Duplicate copies of the aforesaid acknowledgements shall promptly be furnished to the Regional Director.

f. File separate sworn statements with the Clerk of this Court and a copy thereof with the Regional Director of the Seventh Region of the Board in writing upon termination of the posting period, and again upon compliance with paragraph 2d above, showing what steps have been taken by the Union to comply with the Courts directives.

In order to insure that there is compliance with the terms of the Court's orders

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that upon a violation of this Order by the Union, its officers, agents and representatives, including Eugene D. Tolot, this Court hereby increases the compliance fine against the Union to the amount of $6000 for each and every future violation of any of the provisions of the judgment adjudication or this order.

Upon failure of the Union to comply with any of the aforesaid judgment, contempt adjudication and this order, this Court reserves jurisdiction to issue attachment against the Union and any officer or agent responsible for the non-compliance and take such further action against them and grant the National Labor Relations Board such further relief as is adjudged reasonable, just, and necessary to assure compliance with the judgment, contempt adjudication and this order.

NLRB v. Bancroft Manufacturing Company, Inc., Croft Aluminum Company, Inc.

635 F.2d 492 (5th Cir.), January 30, 1981

On action to find in civil contempt

Before AINSWORTH, Circuit Judge, KUNZIG, Judge,* and RANDALL, Circuit Judge

AINSWORTH, Circuit Judge: This case arises out of the long and troubled attempts of Croft Metals, Inc.,[1] and the Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, to negotiate a collective bargaining agreement covering the employees at the Company's McComb, Magnolia and Osyka, Mississippi, plants. The Union won a represenation election held on July 1, 1971. Three years later, the National Labor Relations Board in two separate proceedings found that the Company had refused to bargin with the Union and ordered it to cease and desist from that refusal. 210 NLRB 1007 and 210 NLRB 1019 (1974). This court enforced the Board's orders in 1975, noting that it was "a close case," with misconduct on the part of the Union as well as the Company. N.L.R.B. v. Bancroft Manufacturing Co., 516 F.2d 436, 439 (5th Cir. 1975), cert, denied 424 U.S. 914, 96 S.Ct. 1112, 47 L.Ed.2d 318 (1976).[2] In May 1977, the Board once again brought the matter to this court, charging that the Company had defied the 1975 orders and should be held in civil contempt. That dispute was settled by a consent order stipulated to by the Board and the Company and dated January 13, 1978. In June 1978, the Board charged that the Company had failed to abide by the 1978 consent order, and this court referred the matter to a Special Master for consideration.[3] We now have the Master's report and proposed order before us for decision.

The Master's report comprehensively discusses eleven major issues, most of them factual. First, he found that the Company had violated the 1978 consent order by failing to reinstate the practice of paying Christmas bonuses. The consent order required that the Company, "if requested by the Union, [reinstate] its former practice of paying Christmas bonuses to leadmen and leadwomen, subject to further negotiations about its discontinuance." The Master found that the Union had requested reinstatement of the bonuses for 1978 and that the Company did not reinstate the practice for that year. The Master also found that the Company unilaterally changed the morning break time of certain employees in violation of the consent order's prohibition against "making unilateral changes in wages, hours and working conditions, and other terms and conditions of employment." In so finding, the Master accepted the testimony of employees that the change came in April 1978, after the consent order was issued, rather than earlier. The Master additionally concluded that the Company violated the requirement of the consent order that it rescind the merit evaluation system unilaterally instituted in November 1978. He found that the Company had initially agreed to rescind the new system but that it did not reinstate the old system and took several months to institute the system the parties later agreed upon. Finally, the Master found that the Company violated the consent order by refusing to grant merit increases to unfair labor practice strikers upon their reinstatement. The Company had argued that the merit increases need not be given to the employees because they were not present to be evaluated at the time the merit increases were

[1] In addition to Croft Metals, Inc., the respondents in this proceeding include several Croft subsidiaries and two corporate officers.

[2] The case reported at 516 F.2d 436 enforced the Board's order reported at 210 N.L.R.B. 1007. This court also enforced the Board's other order (210 NLRB 1019) in an unreported decree No. 74–3101 (May 7, 1975).

[3] Special Masters in cases like this one are selected from a list supplied by the Chief Hearing Examiner of the Civil Service Commission. The persons on the list are administrative law judges not connected with the NLRB. Judge Cecil L. Cutler. Jr., the Special Master in this case, is an Administrative Law Judge of the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

given. The master, noting that over 99 percent of the nonstriking employees had received a merit increase during the period of the strike, concluded that the strikers would have received an increase but for the strike, and were therefore entitled to the merit increase upon reinstatement. The Master also found, contrary to the Board's allegations, that the Company had not violated the order by refusing to bargain over job classifications, by failing to pay employees for an extra day off preceding a holiday, by failing promptly to mail out notices required by the order, and by transferring work to other plants. After thoroughly examining the record, the report and the briefs, we hold that the Master's resolution of these factual issues was not clearly erroneous and we therefore adopt his findings. See N.L.R.B. v. J.P. Stevens & Co., Inc., Gulistan Div., 538 F.2d 1152, 1160 (5th Cir. 1976).

The other two issues discussed by the Master—whether the Company refused to bargain after March 10, 1978, and whether two officers of the Company should be held in contempt—are primarily leal determinations, so the clearly erroneous standard does not apply. N.L.R.B. v. Alterman Transport Lines, Inc., 587 F.2d 212, 220 (5th Cir. 1979). Nevertheless, we agree with and adopt the Master's findings of fact and conclusions of law in this regard. The company does not deny that it refused to bargain after March 10, 1978, but contends that its refusal was justified since the parties had reached an impasse. " 'Impasse' within the meaning of the federal labor laws presupposed a reasonable effort at good-faith bargaining which, despite noble intentions, does not conclude in an agreement between the parties." N.L.R.B. v. Big Three Industries, Inc., 497 F.2d 43, 48 (5th Cir. 1974). A determination of whether an impasse exists requires examination of what kept the parties from reaching an agreement. The Master found that the Company and the Union would have reached an agreement if they had resolved one final issue, the arbitrability of merit increase determinations. We cannot as a matter of law hold that the Company's refusal to concede on this one issue constituted bad-faith bargaining, and we therefore agree that an impasse existed. See N.L.R.B. v. Crockett-Bradley, Inc., 598 F.2d 971, 975 (5th Cir. 1979). The Master is also clearly correct in finding that Joseph Bancroft, Chairman of the Board of the Company, and Jean Kuyrkendall, the Executive Vice President, should be held in contempt along with the Company; neither the Board nor the Company contests the Master's finding in this regard.

Finally, the Master recommends that we not assess costs and attorney's fees against the Company "in view of the finding of no liability as to five of the charges * * *." Master's report at 70. Although the Board is correct in its assertion that the denial of some of its charges does not require us to deny assessment of costs against the Company, we agree with the Master that in a case like this one where all parties, including the Board, have engaged in questionable tactics,[4] and the costs have been increased by delays which occurred through the fault of neither party, it is best to let each party bear its own costs.

It is therefore ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that respondents, Croft Metals, Inc., and its subsidiaries, Bancroft Manufacturing Company, Inc., Croft Aluminum Company, Inc., Croft Ladders, Inc., Croft Metal Products, Inc., and Lemco Metal Products, Inc., and Joseph Bancroft and Jean Kuyrkendall, are in civil contempt for having violated the order of this court of January 13, 1978. We hereby adopt and incorporate by reference the Special Master's Recommended Final Order set out in the Appendix.

It is ORDERED that respondents shall purge themselves of civil contempt by:

I

(a) Fully complying with and obeying this Court's judgments of May 7, 1975, and August 14, 1975, and order of January 13, 1978, and not in any way by action or inaction, committing, engaging in, inducing, encouraging, permitting, or condoning any violation of the said judgments and order;

[4] The Master found that "the Board's attitudes and tactics have not always been characterized by impartiality and fairness, and its demands upon the Company, at times, could be termed as 'nit-picking.' " Master's report at 67. He also found that the "overall expenses in this case were unnecessarily increased due to some lack of harmony and cooperation existing between counsel for the parties as well as unanticipated delays which occurred through no fault of either party." Master's report at 71.

(b) Immediately reinstating the former practice of paying Christmas bonuses to leadmen and leadwomen, as previously requested by the Union, and making whole all leadmen and leadwomen for any monetary losses they may have suffered by reason of the Company's failure and refusal to reinstate the 1977 or subsequent Christmas bonuses, together with interest thereon, the amounts, unless agreed upon, to be fixed by the Board, subject to further review by the Court; to continue the practice of paying Christmas bonuses subject to further negotiations about its discontinuance;

(c) If requested by the Union, immediately reinstating the former morning break schedule for glass department employees at its Magnolia facility which existed prior to the April 1978 unilateral change in schedules;

(d) Immediately restoring the status quo ante by resuming operations on line one of the Series 20 Department of the Magnolia facility which it unilaterally shut down on about April 14, 1978, and the two second shift lines of the Series 800 Department of said facility which it unilaterally shut down in about April and May 1978; immediately offering to reinstate to their former positions all employees whom it unilaterally transferred to other jobs and departments as a result of the aforesaid shutdowns and the unilateral shutdown of the first shift in the Series 1400 Department from mid-April to about early May 1978, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges; making all of the aforesaid employees whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of their transfers, together with interest thereon, the amounts, unless agreed upon, to be fixed by the Board, subject to further review by the Court;

(e) Immediately rescinding the oral merit performance evaluation system or any other employee evaluation system unilaterally instituted since January 13, 1978, and immediately instituting the evaluation system agreed upon by the parties during bargaining on about March 9, 1978; and making all employees whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of the Company's unilateral actions with respect to employee evaluations or its reneging on its agreement to implement a new evaluation system together with interest thereon, the amounts, unless agreed upon, to be fixed by the Board, subject to review by the Court;

(f) Immediately, upon the Union's request, returning to the process of bargaining collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the Company's employees in the appropriate unit until there is full agreement or it is clear that a bona fide impasse has been reached, and if any such understanding is reached, embodying such understanding and all the terms thereof in a signed agreement, recognition not to be withdrawn from the Union without further order of the Court;

(g) Immediately, upon the Union's request, proceeding with officials of the Union to set an initial bargaining date, not to exceed fifteen (15) days from the entry of the adjudication, and thereafter proceeding to bargain for no less than two consecutive days per week during regular business hours until all contract proposals have been considered and action taken in relation thereto;

(h) Filing sworn reports signed by the Company and Joseph Bancroft and Jean Kuyrkendall, and by the Union representatives with the said Regional Director, every (30) days showing in detail the nature and course of bargaining in summary form and appending thereto any minutes, proposals, counterproposals, and any written communications between the Union and the Company with respect to such bargaining. If either party has exceptions to the contents of the joint summary, separate additional reports setting forth differences may be filed;

(i) Treating all those employees who went on strike on January 16, 1977, or thereafter, as unfair labor practice strikers, and according such employees all the rights to which unfair labor practice strikers are entitled, including credit for a ten cent ($.10) merit wage increase found to have been awarded non-strikers during the period of the strike; and making said former strikers whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of the Company's failure to accord them all the rights to which unfair labor practice strikers are entitled, including its denial of credit for a merit increase of ten cents ($.10) per hour together with interest thereon;

(j) Refraining from making unilateral changes in wages, hours, and working conditions including layoffs and transfers of employees and transfers of bargaining unit work, work breaks, and other terms and conditions of employment; failing to give the Union adequate notice of such contemplated changes and failing to bargain in good faith with respect thereto;

(k) Refraining from in any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act;

(l) Immediately posting in conspicuous places in its McComb, Mississippi, offices, and all places where notices to employees are customarily posted at its Magnolia, Mississippi, facility, and at all of its other manufacturing facilities, for a period of sixty (60) consecutive days, copies of this contempt adjudication and of an appropriate notice in the form to be supplied by the Board and signed by Joseph Bancroft, individually and as chairman of the board of directors and chief executive officer of the Company, and by Jean Kuyrkendall, individually and as executive vice president of the Company, which states that the Company, Joseph Bancroft, and Jean Kuyrkendall have been adjudicated in civil contempt of this Court for violating and disobeying and failing and refusing to comply with this Court's judgments and subsequent order, and that the Company, Joseph Bancroft, and Jean Kuyrkendall will forthwith undertake the action ordered in purgation in the earlier order and this contempt adjudication, said notices, together with a copy of the order and this contempt adjudication to be maintained in clearly legible condition through such posting period, and insuring that they are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material;

(m) Immediately duplicating at its own expense, signing by Joseph Bancroft or Jean Kuyrkendall, and mailing copies of the notice and the contempt adjudication to each of its present employees and to each of its former employees employed since the entry of the Court's order of January 13, 1978, and providing to the Director of the Fifteenth Regional Office of the Board a list of the names and addresses of all employees and former employees to whom said documents were mailed, together with proof of mailing;

(n) Requiring each officer, director, and supervisor of the Company, and any individual or agent authorized by the Company to negotiate on its behalf, to signify in writing, under oath, that he or she has been furnished with a copy of the contempt adjudication and of the Court's judgments of May 7 and August 14 1975, and order of January 13, 1978; and that he or she has read and understands such decrees, and that he or she will conduct himself or herself in all respects consistent with the terms thereof and will in no way by action or inaction, engage in, induce, encourage, permit, or condone any violation of these decrees of the Court. Copies of the aforesaid acknowledgments shall be furnished by the Company to the Regional Director of the Board's Fifteenth Regional Office;

(o) Filing a sworn statement with the Clerk of this court and a copy thereof with the Director of the said Regional Office within fifteen (15) days after the entry of the adjudication in contempt and again at the end of the posting period showing what steps have been taken by the Company and Joseph Bancroft and Jean Kuyrkendall to comply with the Court's directions;

(p) Preserving and making available to the Board for inspection and copying, all books and records necessary or useful in determining whether there has been compliance with the provisions of the purgation order, and necessary or useful to analyze the amounts of backpay due employees or former employees thereunder.

II

The Company shall pay the amount of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) for its past non-compliance with the provisions of the Court's Order of January 13, 1978, of which it has been found in contempt.

III

To assure a cessation of the violations of the Court's judgments of May 7, 1975, and August 14, 1975, and to assure compliance with the Court's order of January 13, 1978, and with this contempt adjudication, this Court hereby imposes a daily fine for non-compliance against the Company in the amount of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) and in the amount of five hundred dollars ($500) against Joseph Bancroft and Jean Kuyrkendall and any other individual who, with knowledge of this order, acts in concert and participation with the Company, Joseph Bancroft and Jean Kuyrkendall to violate this order. The assessment of such fines shall commence 15 days from the entry of the foregoing order and continue so long as the respondents fail to comply with any of the provisions of this order.

IV

Upon the failure of respondents to purge themselves of civil contempt, the Court reserves jurisdiction to issue attachment against them and any officer or agent of the Company responsible therefor, as well as to substantially increase the amount of compliance fines, and the Court shall take other and further action, and grant such other and further relief as may be adjudged just, reasonable, and necessary to assure compliance with the Court's previous judgments and order, and as this proceeding in civil contempt may require.

NLRB v. Marine Machine Works, Inc.

635 F.2d 522 (5th Cir.), January 30, 1981—243 NLRB 1098

On petition to enforce Board Order

Ingraham, Circuit Judge: Pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of its order issued on August 6, 1979, against Marine Machine Works, Inc. (Marine).[1] The Board based its order, issued upon a stipulated record, on its conclusion that Marine violated section 8(a)(1) and (5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5) (1976), of the Act by unilaterally withdrawing from a multiemployer bargaining unit after negotiations had begun but after the parties had reached impasse, and by refusing to execute the collective bargaining contract agreed upon by a union and the multiemployer association. The Board accordingly entered a cease-and-desist order requiring Marine to comply with the terms of the collective bargaining contract and to make whole any employees who suffered loss as a result of the violation. We enforce that order.[2]

I.

The facts in this case are not in dispute. Marine was a member of the Galveston Area Repairers Council (the Council), an employer association that engages in multiemployer collective bargaining with the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) on behalf of its employer members. The relevant activities all occurred in 1978. On January 18 the Council and the Union commenced negotiations for a new contract to replace the existing one due to expire on January 24. After an extension of the contract until January 26, the contract expired without the parties reaching an agreement on a new one. On January 26 the employees of the Council's member employers voted to reject the Council's contract proposals. On January 27 the employees went out on strike.

Negotiations continued during the strike. On February 20 the employees again rejected contract proposals put forth by the Council elected to remain on strike. On March 6, while the negotiatisns between the Council and the Union were at an impasse, Marine by formal notice withdrew its membership in the Council and so advised the Union by letter. Marine explicitly based its withdrawal on the fact of impasse. Marine also expressed its willingness to negotiate with the Union on an individual basis and invited the Union to suggest dates on which such negotiations might be held. On March 10 the striking employees voted to accept the Council's contract proposals and to end the strike. The new multiemployer agreement became effective on March 10, 1978, for a term of three years. On March 14 Marine refused to sign the new multiemployer contract and continued to refuse to abide by its terms and conditions.

[1] The Board filed its application for enforcement on December 4, 1979. On January 18, 1980, the court granted the motion of D&P Investment Co., Inc. for leave to intervene. D&P sought intervention because of its potential obligation, as a successor to Marine, for remedying any unfair labor practices committed by Marine. The Board has not formally charged D&P with any liability and D&P does not admit to being a successor to Marine for purposes of derivative liability. D&P asserts that it filed an intervenor's brief since the allegedly defunct Marine failed to make any defense to the Board's order. We, of course, express absolutely no opinion on any of these matters.

[2] On February 11, 1980, following Marine's failure to file an answer to the Board's application for enforcement of its order, the Board moved for judgment by default. On March 6, 1980, the court ordered the Board's motion carried with the case. In the light of intervenor D&P Investment Co.'s able defense on the merits of this case, and considering that the Board may look to D&P for remedial compliance with its order, we now deny the Board's motion for judgment by default.

The Board's decision that Marine violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, with respect to both the unilateral withdrawal and the refusal to execute the contract, flowed from its conclusion that Marine's putative withdrawal from the Council on March 6 was unlawful. Before the Board, the General Counsel contended that the occurrence of a bargaining impasse does not constitute an unusual circumstance that will justify an employer's unilateral withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining once negotiations have begun. Marine argued that case law in this circuit and others establishes that impasse is indeed a sufficient condition to exonerate a withdrawal that would otherwise violate the Act. The parties before this court press these same arguments. Thus, the question we must decide is whether unilateral withdrawal by a member employer from a multiemployer bargaining unit solely because of impasse constitutes a refusal to bargain in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. We hold as a matter of law [3] that it does.

II.

Our resolution of this issue requires consideration of the Board's policy toward and rules governing multiemployer bargaining. The Board has consistently held that employers may not, absent unusual circumstances, withdraw from multiemployer bargaining units once negotiations have commenced, Retail Associates, Inc., 120 N.L.R.B. 388, 395 (1958). Prohibiting such withdrawals contributes to the stability of multiemployer units and prevents the use of the scope of the bargaining unit as a bargaining lever to secure an economic advantage for one side over the other. See NLRB v. Sheridan Creations, Inc., 357 F.2d 245, 248 (2d Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 1005, 87 S.Ct. 711, 17 L.Ed.2d 544 (1967). This furthers the substantial public interest served by multiemployer bargaining, which the Supreme Court has characterized as a "vital factor in the effectuation of the national policy of promoting labor peace through strengthened collective bargaining." NLRB v. Truck Drivers Local Union No. 449 (Buffalo Linen), 353 U.S. 87, 95, 77 S.Ct. 643, 647, 1 L.Ed.2d 676 (1957).

The Board, however, has not taken an inflexible position on this matter. Under the Board's ground rules laid out in Retail Associates any party—employer or union—is free to withdraw from the multiemployer unit prior to the date set for renegotiation of an existing contract or before the parties begin negotiations toward a new contract. Once the parties begin negotiations, however, a party may withdraw only if unusual circumstances exist or if both the union and the employer's association agree to the withdrawal.

By allowing unlimited wihdrawal prior to the start of negotiations, the Board gives each party an opportunity to go its separate way at a time when the withdrawal will not substantially jeopardize the multiemployer bargaining process. The Board also protects a party's interest in striking its own individual bargain by refusing to certify a union as representative of employees in a multiemployer unit unless the employers have explicitly agreed to such a unit or a history of multiemployer bargaining demonstrates implicit agreement.[4] Also, the Board protects the employer's interest in bargaining on an individual basis by refusing to bind an employer to multiemployer bargaining absent evidence of clear and unambiguous consent to inclusion in the multiemployer bargaining unit.[5]

Conversely, after negotiations have begun, the parties are required to honor their commitment to the process of multiemployer bargaining, which they freely elected. Thus, the Board then allows withdrawal only if mutual consent is given or in the presence of a limited number of unusual circumstances. One such circumstance exists when a company faces extreme financial pressures, such as impending bankruptcy. Another unusual circumstance justifying unilateral withdrawal is when the multiemployer unit becomes extremely fragmented, for example, though several withdrawals occurring by mutual consent. Significantly, however, the Board has repeatedly and explicitly held that impasse is not an unusual circumstance justifying unilateral withdrawal.

[3] There were no facts, either elemental or inferential, to be found in this case. The Board decided the case on stipulation of facts entered into by all parties. Thus, the standard of substantial evidence on the record as a whole mandated by § 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), for appellate review of findings of fact is not the appropriate standard in this case. Cf. NLRB v. Marcus Trucking Co., 286 F.2d 583 (2d Cir. 1961) (Friendly, J.) (question whether an employer who has made a valid collective bargaining agreement with a Board-certified union and who then recognizes another union during the period of contract-bar protection thereby violates the Act is question of law).

The Board has previously argued before this court that impasse should not be considered an unusual circumstance. NLRB v. Hi-Way Billboards, Inc., 500 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1974). In Hi-Way Billboards, we stated that we were impressed by the cogency of the Board's reasoning on this point. We declined to enforce the Board's order in that case, however, because while we felt that the Board's position would be fair in protecting the interests of the union and the companies' employees, we were not convinced that it would be fair to the employers in the unit. The unfairness, however, did not inhere in the Board's position that impasse does not constitute an unusual circumstance under its Retail Associates rules. Rather, the perceived unfairness was the result of another aspect of those rules, namely, that the Board permitted a union to negotiate separate final agreements with individual employer members of the multiemployer unit. We felt that this was tantamount to allowing the union to withdraw from the multiemployer unit, at least with respect to those individual employers. For the Board to then deny to the other employers a similar right of unilateral withdrawal did not accord with the Board's espoused commitment to applying to both employers and unions the same rules concerning the right to withdraw. See generally Evening News Association, 154 N.L.R.B. 1494, 1495–97 (1965), enforced sub nom. Detroit Newspaper Publishers Association v. NLRB, 372 F.2d 569 570–71 (6th Cir. 1967).

In the last two years, the Board has issued a series of decisions, including its decision in the instant case, dealing with attempted withdrawals from multiemployer units.[6] In these decisions, the Board has specifically addressed the concerns articulated by this court in Hi-Way Billboards and has clarified its prior decisions in the light of those concerns.[7] First, the only separate agreements that the Board will permit are temporary or interim agreements pending the outcome of negotiations in the multiemployer unit.[8] Second, the execution of a final separate agreement by a union and an individual employer of the multiemployer unit is violative of section 8(b)(3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(3) (1976), by the union and of section 8(a)(5) by the employer, unless all parties—the union the employer, and the employer association—consent to the agreement.[9]

III.

With the above modifications, the Board has reaffirmed its position that withdrawal at impasse violates the employer's duty to bargain under section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The Board now asks us to reconsider our position taken in Hi-Way Billboards, in the light of the Board's recent clarifications of its Retail Associates rules. We have undertaken that reconsideration and we conclude that the Board has wisely weighed the competing policy concerns.[10] The Board's rules

[7] These same concerns have been expressed by other circuits as well. See NLRB v. Independent Ass'n of Steel Fabricators, 582 F.2d 135, 146 (2d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Beck Engraving Co., 522 F.2d 475, 482–83 (3d Cir. 1975); NLRB v. NLRB, 471 F.2d 1170, 1172, 1174 n.1 (8th Cir. 1972).

[8] The Board properly distinguishes between interim separate agreements and final separate agreements. Since interim agreements create only temporary arrangements pending the outcome of the group negotiations, ordinarily they do not fragment or destroy the multiemployer unit. Permanent agreements, on the other hand, may well do so, since they are not dependent on the outcome of the group negotiations but rather establish terms and conditions of employment different from those established in the group contract. Thus, while interim separate agreements are legitimate economic weapons in the multiemployer contest, final separate agreements are not. See Callier's Custom Kitchens, 243 N.L.R.B. No. 143 (Aug. 6, 1979); Charles D. Bonanno Linen Serv., 243 N.L.R.B. No. 140 (Aug. 6, 1979).

[10] Following its recent clarification of its Retail Associates rules, the Board has met with some success in requesting other circuits to undertake this same reconsideration. NLRB v. Charles D. Bonanno Linen Serv., 630 F.2d 25 (1st Cir. 1980), enforcing 243 N.L.R.B. No. 140 (Aug. 6, balance an individual party's legitimate interest in striking its own separate bargain against the parties' and the public's legitimate interest in achieving the benefits afforded by continued multiemployer bargaining, including avoiding the industrial strife likely to result from frustration of the bargaining process. In reaching this balance, the Board is treating both unions and employers equally and fairly. The Board permits each to use all available economic weapons in aid of reaching an overall settlement. On the other hand, the Board prohibits each from taking action that is destructive of the multiemployer unit: unions may not seek to negotiate separate permanent agreements with employers, and employers may not withdraw from the unit and seek separate permanent negotiations with the union. This result is well within the Board's broad discretion to resolve the inevitable questions arising in the multiemployer bargaining context. See NLRB v. Truck Drivers Local Union No. 449 (Buffalo Linen), 353 U.S. 87, 96, 77 S.Ct.643, 647, 1 L.Ed.2d 676 (1957). Accordingly, the application for enforcement is granted.

Pet, Incorporated v. NLRB

641 F.2d 545 (8th Cir.), January 30, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied April 3, 1981—244 NLRB 96

On petition to review Board Order

Before BRIGHT, HENLEY and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges

545

HENLEY, Circuit Judge: Pet, Incorporated filed a secondary boycott charge alleging United Steelworkers violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(B) (1976). The National Labor Relations Board dismissed Pet's complaint, and Pet appeals. This court has jurisdiction pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976) because the alleged violations took place in and around St. Louis, Missouri.[1]

546

Pet is a large, diversified conglomerate enterprise with plants and retail stores located throughout the United States. It currently has twenty-seven operating divisions, each engaging in separate and distinct lines of business. In the mid-1970s, most of the divisions were segregated for administrative, operational and fiscal accounting purposes into four "groups." Division presidents report directly to their respective "group" presidents, who in turn report directly to Pet's president.

Responsibility for long range planning, major capital expenditures, and other general management functions rests with Pet's Office of the Chief Executive, comprised of Pet's president and three executive vice presidents. Group presidents file monthly reports with Pet's president. The reports give forecasts of future earnings, discuss items such as industry trends and plant safety, and give analyses of variances in the forecasted (as compared with actual) sales and earnings.

The NLRB found that the divisions of Pet have a good deal of autonomy:

> The various divisions of Pet operate essentially as independent business entities. No division exercises any determination, control, or influence over the administration or operation of any other division. Each division maintains a separate financial system and bank account from which it pays employees; prepares its own budget and financial statements; sets its profit targets; and pays its own bills, including payments to the Pet corporate office for reimbursement of services rendered by it. Policies regarding product line, pricing, and advertising, as well as market strategies, are determined by the divisions. Division presidents are vested with complete authority

[1] While this appeal was pending the basic labor dispute was settled and a new labor contract between Pet's subsidiary, Hussmann Refrigerator, and the Steelworkers was negotiated. Although the basic alleged offending conduct has terminated, at least for the time being, we are persuaded that the appeal is not moot. *NLRB v. over the day-to-day operation of their respective divisions and are accountable for their divisions' profitability. They have complete authority over division labor relations and employment policies for represented and unrepresented employees and can negotiate, execute, and administer collective-bargaining agreements without prior approval from Pet's corporate offices.

A good part of Pet's business is in the area of the manufacture of food products. The products include milk, ice cream, Whitman's Chocolates, Pet-Ritz Frozen Pies, Downy Flake Frozen Breakfast Foods, Easy Jacks, Hot'N Buttery Waffles, and Funsten Nuts. Pet operates a grocery product group of divisions which produce, sell, and distribute Compliment Cooking Sauces, Heartland Cereal and Evaporated Milk, Sego Diet Food, and Musselman Fruit Products. Two of Pet's subsidiaries manufacture canned shrimp and oysters; another subsidiary manufactures Mexican food products.

Pet has operations in addition to the food products. These include plastics and label manufacturing, public warehousing and distribution, and Stuckey's and 905 stores.

Hussmann, a wholly owned subsidiary of Pet, manufactures commercial refrigeration equipment, display cases, shelving, checkout counters, and other commercial and industrial equipment. Hussmann is one of the four "groups" discussed earlier, and consists of three "divisions." It has a plant in Bridgeton, Missouri, which is part of one of these divisions. United Steelworkers (the Union) represents fifteen hundred employees of this plant. The Union does not represent any employees of Pet or its other subsidiaries; or any other Hussmann employees.

When the collective bargaining agreement covering the Bridgeton employees expired on May 1, 1977 the Union commenced an economic strike. On October 21, 1977 the Union's president announced at a press conference in the St. Louis area that, in support of the strike at the Bridgeton plant, he was calling for a "national boycott by our 1.4 million member union of Pet, Inc., food products, their retail store outlets, and commercial refrigeration equipment."

Beginning on November 9, 1977 the Union placed advertisements in local newspapers advising the public of the Union's strike against Hussmann's Bridgeton plant, noting that Hussmann is owned by Pet, and requesting the public to boycott Stuckey's and 905, and to refuse to buy any product of Pet. The advertisements listed seventeen products of Pet.

In October and November of 1977 the Union distributed handbills in the St. Louis area. The handbills contained the same message as the newspaper advertisements. The Union issued boycott instructions which provided that no boycott material should be distributed in the vicinity of a retail establishment owned by Pet or selling Pet products. Furthermore, no one was to interfere with the entrance or exit of workers or others under any circumstances. The handbilling activity conformed to these instructions at all times.

Pet filed unfair labor practice charges against the Union with the NLRB, alleging that the Union violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(B) (1976), by calling for the consumer boycott. The section provides:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—
> (4)(ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof is—
> (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person * * *
> Provided * * *, That for the purposes of this paragraph (4) only, nothing contained in such paragraph shall be construed to prohibit publicity, other than picketing, for the purpose of truthfully advising the public, including consumers and members of a labor organization, that a product or products are produced by an employer with whom the labor organization has a primary dispute and are distributed by another employer, as long as such publicity does not have an effect of inducing any individual employed by any person other than the primary employer in the course of his employment to refuse to pick up, deliver, or transport any goods, or not to perform any services, at the establishment of the employer engaged in such distribution.

Pet argues that the handbilling and other publicity constituted restraint and/or coercion within the meaning of subparagraph (ii) of Section 8(b)(4) of the act because it was directed against "neutral" persons—Pet and its subsidiaries. Pet further contended that the publicity proviso offered no immunity to the Union's activities because Hussmann was not a "producer" of the "products" of Pet or its subsidiaries.[2] Finally, Pet argued that a finding that the Union's conduct was unprotected by the publicity proviso would not conflict with the first amendment.

The NLRB found that the Union's activities were protected by the publicity proviso. The Board expressly refrained from deciding (1) whether Pet and its subsidiaries were "neutral" persons as to the controversy between Hussmann and the Union; (2) whether the activities constituted "coercion" or "restraint"; or (3) whether a finding that the activities were not protected by the proviso would conflict with the first amendment.

On appeal Pet asserts that the Board erred in concluding the Union's activities were protected by the proviso because Hussmann is not a "producer" of the products of Pet and its subsidiaries. Pet further contends that the findings of fact of the NLRB and the law are clear enough that this court can decide in Pet's favor the three issues that the NLRB declined to decide.

We first consider whether the Union's conduct fell within the proviso, or, more specifically, whether Hussmann is a "producer" of the products of Pet. Both the Board and fedeal courts have given the term "producer" a broader meaning than manufacturer or processor.

In Lohman Sales Co., 132 NLRB 901, 48 L.R.R.M. 1429 (1961), a union struck a company which was engaged in the wholesale distribution of cigarettes, other tobacco products, and candies. The striking employees distributed handbills in front of stores which stocked products that Lohman distributed, advising the public of the strike and requesting the public not to purchase tobacco products or candy at the stores. Before the NLRB Lohman contended that it did not produce the products, but only handled products manufactured by others, and thus the proviso should not apply to the union's handbilling. The NLRB rejected this contention and dismissed the complaint, stating:

> [L]abor is the prime requisite of one who produces. A wholesaler, such as Lohman, need not be the actual manufacturer to add his labor in the form of capital, enterprise, and service to the product he furnishes the retailers. In this sense, therefore, Lohman, as the other employers who 'handled' the raw materials of the product before him, is one of the producers of the cigarettes distributed by his customers. A contrary view would attach a special importance to one form of labor over another and attempt to isolate fabricators of products from those who otherwise add to its value.

Lohman Sales Co. was approved by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Servette, Inc., 377 U.S. 46, 55, 84 S.Ct. 1098, 1104, 12 L.Ed.2d 121 (1964). Servette also was a case in which the primary labor dispute was with a wholesaler, and the union asked the public not to purchase the merchandise the wholesaler distributed. The Court stated:

> The proviso was the outgrowth of a profound Senate concern that the unions' freedom to appeal to the public for support of their case be adequately safeguarded * * *. It would fall far short of achieving this basic purpose if the proviso applied only in situations where the union's labor dispute is with the manufacturer or processor * * *. There is nothing in the legislative history which suggests that the protection of the proviso was intended to be any narrower in coverage than the prohibition to which it is an exception, and we see no basis for attributing such an incongruous purpose to Congress.

The term 'produced' in other labor laws was not unfamiliar to Congress. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the term is defined as 'produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on * * *,' 29 U.S.C. § 203(j), and has always been held to apply to the wholesale distribution of goods.

[2] Pet did not contend that the Union's publicity asking consumers not to patronize 905 stores violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii) because 905 and Hussmann may be related as distributor and producer within the meaning of the proviso. After the strike commenced, 905 stores purchased Hussmann equipment manufactured at the Bridgeton plant form an independent distributor.

incongruity * * * may not control the ultimate decision." 356 F.2d at 436.

Although all of the three cases discussed above support a broad reading of the proviso, we do not regard them as dispositive of the present case. Lohman Sales Co., Servette and Great Western Broadcasting all found that the primary was a "producer" when the primary was directly involved in the promotion and/or distribution of products of the secondary.[3] In all three cases, the primary worked on specific products. In the present case Hussmann does not work on any specific products of Pet.

In spite of the absence of any direct relationship of Hussmann's operations to any specific product of Pet, the Board found Hussmann was still a "producer" of Pet's products, reasoning as follows:

> [A]s a result of its relationship with the diversified enterprise, Hussmann applies capital, enterprise, and service to Pet and its other subsidiaries and divisions * * *.
> Diversified corporations, by their very nature, are composed of operations which provide support for and contribute to one another. The contributions of each to the others may vary considerably. However, all add to the diversification which enables the enterprise as a whole to weather economic assault on any one of its operations. All contribute profits, either actual or potential, which enhance the value of the enterprise and foster its economic viability. All contribute a measure of goodwill.
> * * * Hussmann provides part of the diversification which contributes to the success of Pet and its other operations. Hussmann's acclaimed high sales and earnings generate income which inures to the benefit of Pet and to Pet's effort to maintain its other subsidiaries. The goodwill earned by Hussmann likewise enhances the reputation of all Pet operations. Consequently, Hussmann variously contributes to the operation of Pet as a whole and to each of its subsidiaries and divisions and thus is a producer of all Pet enterprises products in the sense that "producer" is used in the proviso as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Servette and subsequent Board decisions.

We are mindful of the Supreme Court's admonition that if the Board's "construction of a statute is reasonably defensible, it should not be rejected merely because the court might prefer another view of the statute." Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 497, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1849, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979). We think that the present case is one of those rare instances in which the Board's interpretation is unreasonable and must be rejected. First, we think it totally at odds with any normal interpretation of the word "produce" to say that because Hussmann's profits inure to the benefit of Pet, Hussmann produces Pet's products. We find the connection between Pet's products and Hussmann to be highly attenuated. Should Pet sell Hussmann tomorrow, Pet would manufacture, distribute, and promote its products the same way it is doing now.

Secondly, we do not think that the Board's decision flows from Servette, supra, because the Supreme Court was not there considering a case in which the primary-subsidiary's products and services were unrelated to the secondary-parent's products. We note in particular the Court's comment, quoted earlier, that "[t]he term 'produced' in other labor laws was not unfamiliar to Congress. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the term is defined as 'produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on * * *,' 29 U.S.C. § 203(j) * * *" 377 U.S. at 55–56, 84 S.Ct. at 1104. Hussmann does not work on any of the products of Pet.

Accordingly, we reverse the decision of the Board that the Union's publicity activities fell within the proviso. Pet has asked us to consider three other issues not ruled upon by the Board. The first two, whether Pet and its subsidiaries are separate "persons" from Hussmann for purposes of Section 8(b)(4), and whether the Union's publicity fell within the prohibition of Section 8(b)(4)(ii), are questions initially committed to the discretion of the Board under Section 10(a), which empowers the Board "to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice * * *" listed in Section 8. 29 U.S.C. § 160(a) (1976). These questions are not trivial and are not free from difficulty. They could be decided by the Board in such a way that it will become unnecessary for us to reach the third issue which is whether, if the Union's conduct is prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(ii), the Union's first amendment rights are violated. In the circumstances, we decline to pass upon any of the three issues not ruled upon by the Board.

Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

McMillian, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I dissent. By interpreting the publicity proviso without considering its place in the overall statutory scheme ad without considering the legislative history, the majority substitutes its judgment not only for that of the Labor Board but also for that of Congress, which clearly intended to exempt this kind of publicity from coverage as a secondary boycott.

The publicity proviso resulted from a concern that the secondary boycott provisions in the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act, which amended the National Labor Relations Act, were overbroad in the area of the first amendment. As the Supreme Court explained in NLRB v. Fruit & Vegetable Packers, Local 760 (Tree Fruits), 377 U.S. 58, 69, 84 S.Ct. 1063, 1069, 12 L.Ed.2d 129 (1964), "the first step in the development of the publicity proviso" was an analysis prepared by Senator Kennedy and Congressman Thompson of the proposed revisions of the secondary boycott prohibitions:

> The prohibition [prior to addition of the publicity proviso] reaches not only picketing but leaflets, radio broadcasts and newspaper advertisements, thereby interfering with freedom of speech.
> * * * [O]ne of the apparent purposes * * * is to prevent unions from appealing to the general public as consumers for assistance in a labor dispute. This is a basic infringement upon freedom of expression.

105 Cong.Rec. 16591 (1959), reprinted in II NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, at 1708 (1959) (hereinafter II Legislative History).

The Senate agreed with this criticism and by resolution instructed its members of a conference committee on the Landrum-Griffin Act to insist on a publicity proviso in the final bill. Sen.Res. 181, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., 105 Cong. Rec. 15905–06 (1959), reprinted in II Legislative History, supra at 1382–83. An analysis of Sen.Res. 181 by its sponsors specified, "There is to be no prohibition on truthful appeals to consumers * * * not to buy goods, because the manufacturer is involved in a labor dispute." 105 Cong.Rec. 15906 (1959), reprinted in II Legislative History, supra at 1383. As Senator Kennedy, who chaired the conference committee, explained, > [T]he union shall be free to conduct informational activity short of picketing. In other words, the union can hand out handbills at the shop, can place advertisements in newspapers, can make announcements over the radio, and can carry on all publicity short of having ambulatory picketing in front of a secondary site.

105 Cong.Rec. 16414 (1959), reprinted in II Legislative History, supra at 1432. See also 105 Cong.Rec. 14339 (1959) (remarks of Rep. Griffin), reprinted in II Legislative History, supra at 1615; 105 Cong.Rec. 16637 (1959) (remarks of Rep. Udall), reprinted in II Legislative History, supra at 1722.

The Congressional purpose could hardly be clearer: whatever secondary objectives were prohibited by § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), activity would not be prohibited if it consisted only of the kind of pure publicity in this case. (An exception exists if the speech had certain effects specified in the publicity proviso itself; no such effects are alleged in this case). As the Supreme Court has explained, "There is nothing in the legislative history which suggests that the protection of the provisio was intended to be any narrower in coverage than the prohibition to which it is an exception, and we see no basis for attributing such an incongruous purpose to Congress." N.L.R.B. v. Servette, Inc., 377 U.S. 46, 55, 84 S.Ct. 1098, 1104, 12 L.Ed.2d 121 (1964) (hereinafter Servette). The Board, therefore, was entirely correct in its approach to this case. Assuming the union's conduct was within the general coverage of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), the conduct was still not prohibited because it involved nothing other than publicity and therefore comes under the publicity proviso.

The majority rests it conclusion to the contrary upon a reading of the words of the publicity proviso apart from the legislative history or statutory purpose. See at 547–550. This kind of lateral reading is not appropriate in interpreting the National Labor Relations Act. N.L.R.B. v. Allis Chalmers Manufacturing Co., 388 U.S. 175, 179, 87 S.Ct. 2001, 2005, 18 L.Ed.2d 1123 (1967). The "'familiar rule, that a thing may be within the letter of the statute, and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers'" has "particular application in the construction of labor legislation * * *" National Woodwork Manufacturers Ass'n v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 619, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 1255, 18 L.Ed.2d 357 (1967), citing Church of the Holy Trinity v. United States, 143 U.S. 457, 459, 12 S.Ct. 511, 512, 36 L.Ed. 226 (1892). For example, under a literal reading, the secondary boycott provisions, § 8(b)(4), would apply not only to secondary activity; the language read literally would also reach primary strikes by employees against their own employer. Local 761, IUE v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 667, 81 S.Ct. 1285, 6 L.Ed.2d 592 (1961). The statute is not read literally because the Congressional intent expressed through the legislative history and statutory scheme was not to prohibit primary strikes. Id. In this case the majority rests its interpretation of the publicity proviso entirely on the statutory words, contrary to the teaching of Muniz v. Hoffman, 422 U.S. 454, 469–70, 95 S.Ct. 2178, 2186, 45 L.Ed.2d 319 (1975), NLRB v. Allis Chalmers Manufacturing Co., supra, 388 U.S. at 179, 87 S.Ct. at 2005, and National Woodwork Manufacturers Ass'n v. NLRB, supra, 386 U.S. at 619, 87 S.Ct. at 1254. In doing so, the majority arrives at an interpretation of the act at odds with the Congressional purpose that the publicity proviso would remove pure speech from coverage under the secondary boycott prohibitions.

The majority rests its conclusion on a reading of the word "produced" in the publicity proviso. The publicity proviso, the majority contends would apply only to publicity about goods "produced" by Hussmann, and in the majority's view it is unreasonable to find that Hussmann is a producer of Pet's other subsidiaries' goods. At 549. First, the majority asserts that the relationship between Hussmann and the other subsidiaries involves only contribution of profit to Pet. Id. at 549. Although the majority recognizes that this profit might be employed in productive activities of other subsidiaries, the relation is too attenuated in the majority's view to involve production of other subsidiaries' goods by Hussmann. Secondly, the majority appears to take the view that the Supreme Court in Servette confined the meaning of the word "produced" in the publicity proviso to its definition under other labor acts, i. e., ultimately "produced" means "worked on" in some fashion. At 549, citing Servette, supra, 377 U.S. at 55–56, 84 S.Ct. at 1104.

The majority's reading of the statute is not compelled by Servette. In that case the Supreme Court explained that Congress meant something broader by "produced" than the word means in ordinary usage. The Court suggested that Congress had in the Fair Labor Standards Act likewise used the word "produced" to mean something broader than in ordinary usage. But the Supreme Court in Servette did not incorporate the Fair Labor Standards Act definition to limit or restrict the meaning of the word "produced" under the publicity proviso. Instead, the Court approved a broad interpretation of the publicity proviso to cover any publicity which absent the proviso would be covered by § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). The Court said it found "no basis" for "incongruous" interpretation of the publicity proviso's language to be "any narrower" than the prohibition on secondary activity of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). Id. at 56, 84 S.Ct. at 1104.

The Board's broad interpretation of the word "produced" results in coverage of the publicity proviso in harmony with the Congressional purpose. The Board's interpretation also does not involve an unjustifiable reading of the word "produced." The majority, at 549, mischaracterizes the Board's position; the Board did not say that Hussmann's only connection with the other divisions is to contribute profits to Pet. The Board said Hussmann contributed not only profits, but also "goodwill" and "diversification." See id. at 549, citing the Board's opinion in this case, United Steelworkers of America, 244 N.L.R.B. No. 6 (1979). The majority does not say why the Board erred in finding a contribution of goodwill and diversification, or why the Board erred in finding that the goodwill and diversification were at least tangentially a part of the production process of Pet's other divisions. Instead, the opinion asserts—pointing to absolutely no support in the record—that "Should Pet sell Hussmann tomorrow, Pet would manufacture, distribute, and promote its products the same way it is doing now." Id. at 549. This assertion simply contradicts the Board's belief that Pet's other divisions would have greater difficulty operating in the absence of the goodwill and diversification and profits contributed by Hussman. In the end, this is an arguable question, and without demonstrating any particular error in the Board's approach, the majority merely substitutes the opinion of the court for that of the Board.

The majority's approach also infringes upon the Board's responsibilities in a less obvious but more serious way. The Board assumed (without deciding) that § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) was applicable to the union conduct in this case and reached only the publicity proviso issue. This approach left open the important question whether picketing (or other activity besides pure publicity) directed against Pet subsidiaries other than Hussmann would be secondary activity under § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). Under the Board's view (and mine), this important question involves the "secondary" nature of activity other than publicity, because it was not Congress' intent to prohibit pure publicity. By ruling the publicity proviso inapplicable to the pure publicity in this case, the majority forces the Board to interpret the coverage of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) in a case that does not involve picketing or other activity other than mere speech. In my view, the Board was correct in finding this case an inappropriate one for resolving this important question of labor relations.

The Board avoided deciding whether a union on strike against one division of a "conglomerate" corporation could picket the whole corporation or must confine strike activities to the division. This difficult problem raises fundamental labor relations issues. An employee organization in one division may, as an economic fact, be up against the entire conglomerate. On the other hand, in some circumstances the conglomerate organizational structure may in fact be loose enough that picketing or other action involving the whole conglomerate could be considered in part secondary activity. It is unfortunate that the majority requires resolution of this important question in a case where the dispute remains in the realm of speech; I would leave the Board free in this sensitive area to await a more suitable case involving picketing or other coercive activity with non-speech components.

Ironically enough, the majority may have decided sub silentio the issue it remands to the Board. As noted above, the Supreme Court in Servette and the legislative history of the publicity proviso compel the conclusion that the publicity proviso applies to all pure publicity that would otherwise come under the coverage of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). In other words, mere publicity apart from picketing is covered by the publicity proviso, unless (1) it is not pure publicity in that it involves a threat or the like, or (2) the publicity is not within § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) because it is not covered secondary activity. No other conclusion is consistent with the Servette understanding that the publicity proviso is just as broad as the prohibition on secondary activity. In this case no one claims that the publicity falls outside the realm of pure publicity. Therefore, the publicity falls outside the publicity proviso only if it is not secondary activity covered by the statute. Although the majority derives its conclusion from a reading of the publicity proviso in isolation and remands for a decision on the applicability of the secondary boycott prohibition, in my view the majority has decided that question, because the publicity proviso and the prohibition on secondary activity have the same breadth of coverage. Furthermore, the majority's decision may well also determine that the publicity in this case would not be prohibited if carried out by picketing. That is, if the publicity is not the kind of secondary activity prohibited by § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), it would not be covered whether carried out by leaflet or picketing.

I do not necessarily disagree with the conclusion that there was no secondary activity in this case. But Congress in the publicity proviso sought to put pure publicity on a different footing than other activity, and this case which involves pure publicity is not appropriate for determining the substantive sweep of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). I would deny the petition for review.

NLRB v. Leonard Creations of California, Inc.

638 F.2d 111 (9th Cir.), February 2, 1981; certiorari denied 452 U.S. 955—243 NLRB 832

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FERGUSON and NORRIS, Circuit Judges, and PANNER,* District Judge

FERGUSON, Circuit Judge: At a union representation election among employees of Leonard Creations of California, Inc., 62 employees voted in favor of representation, 61 voted against, and one ballot is contested. The contested ballot exhibits a full "X" in the box indicating a vote against union representation and a slash in the box in favor of it.[1] The National Labor Relations Board found the ballot invalid, and thus determined the election outcome in favor of unionization. Consequently, the Board certified the union as representative of the employees.

The company refused to bargain with the union, in order to obtain review in this court of the Board's certification of the union. The Board petitioned to enforce its order to bargain, after finding that the company violated §§ 8(a)(5) and (1)[2] of the National Labor Relations Act by its refusal to bargain and by its unilateral grant of a wage increase. We reverse the Board.

While the NLRB has often held that marks in two alternative squares on a ballot render it invalid, see, e. g., Caribe Industrial and Electrical Supply, Inc., 216 N.L.R.B. 168 (1975); Bon Tool & Die Co., 115 N.L.R.B. 103 (1956), the underlying principle favors inclusion of a ballot in an election tally "where the voter's intent has been clearly manifested," NLRB v. Sauk Valley Manufacturing Co., 486 F.2d 1127, 1133 (9th Cir. 1973). This policy has often resulted in inclusion of ballots with marks in both squares. See, e. g., Abtex Beverage Corp.,

On review, an NLRB order will not be upheld unless supported by substantial evidence. NLRB v. Masonic Homes of California, 624 F.2d 88, 89 (9th Cir. 1980). In the present case, the entire record consists of the contested ballot. Examining the ballot in light of our prior decisions and those of the NLRB, we find little support for the Board's conclusion that the voter's intent was unclear. Although the "Yes" box contains a line, only the "No" box received a completed mark. It follows

NLRB v. Jacob E. Decker & Sons

636 F.2d 129 (5th Cir.), February 2, 1981—244 NLRB 875

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Gee, Rubin and Randall, Circuit Judges

Alvin B. Rubin, Circuit Judge: Again we review a National Labor Relations Board order to remedy the effects of an unfair labor practice. The Board ordered discharged employees Dominguez and Orosco reinstated with back pay. Another panel of this court concluded that the company had committed an unfair labor practice in discharging the employees, but remanded the case to the Board to consider the effect of their post-discharge felony convictions and to determine what form of remedy would best serve the policies of the National Labor Relations Act, taking into account the employees' suitability for reinstatement and their entitlement to back pay. NLRB v. Jacob E. Decker & Sons, 569 F.2d 357 (5th Cir. 1978).

On remand, the parties submitted statements of position and the Board ordered a supplemental hearing before an administrative law judge. The ALJ concluded that Dominguez, who was a probationary employee at the time of his discharge, should not be reinstated, but should be awarded back pay from the date of his discharge until the date of his conviction, and that Orosco should be reinstated with back pay notwithstanding his felony conviction for possession of "more than four ounces" of marijuana. The Board affirmed this decision and seeks enforcement of its order.

The company argues that Orosco would automatically have been discharged as a result of his felony conviction and, therefore, reinstatement is not a proper remedy. The Board concluded that the company's management exercised discretion in terminating convicted felons and that the Company's alleged "firm policy" was a pretextual defense. This raises two questions: First, whether the Board's conclusion that the employer did not have a firm policy of automatically discharging all convicted felons is supported by substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole. If we accept the Board's conclusion, we must then determine whether it is correct in deciding that the reinstatement of Orosco effectuates the purposes of the Act.

If the Board's conclusion that company management did not automatically fire all convicted felons is supported by substantial evidence in the record, that decision is not reviewable. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 478, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); NLRB v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d 1338 (5th Cir. 1980). We turn, therefore, to the record.

The local plant manager testified about the Company's policy with respect to convicted felons. His statements suggest that decisions regarding convicted felons had to be "cleared" through Phoenix, the Company's headquarters. The Board attaches great significance to the words the plant manager used. The Company argues that the word "cleared" refers merely to the Company's customary industrial practice: the discharge was automatic but, as a matter of protocol, it was processed through headquarters. We attach little significance to nuances drawn from the manager's words and find them alone insufficient fulcrum on which to lever the opinion.

On the other hand, there was also testimony that the manager told an employee facing a possible criminal prosecution that the manager would "do everything" possible to help the employee retain his job if he was convicted. In addition, there was evidence concerning the actions the Company took with regard to "lead boner Santiago Gonzalez."[1]

[1] Gonzalez's employment history is as follows:

1970	Hired.
12/73	Arrested and indicted for assault with intent to commit murder.
8/74	Pled guilty to assault with intent to commit murder without malice (a lesser felony); sentenced to three years.
8/74	Branch manager McCarty secured Gonzalez's release from jail by signing his appeal bond.
10/16/75	Sentence suspended; Gonzalez placed on probation.
10/19/75	Resigned to work in another city.
12/76	Returned and was hired as a temporary worker for two weeks.
2/77	Applied for permanent position; but told he was unemployable because of his felony conviction.
12/77	Again sought permanent employment. After probation officer told company official that the suspended sentence was not viewed as a conviction by the state, Gonzalez was told to file an application but was not hired (either because of bad references or conviction; the testimony was in conflict).

Despite the asserted company policy of automatically terminating any convicted felon, Decker permitted Gonzalez to continue working as a permanent employee for more than one year after he was convicted of a felony. He then resigned, apparently to work in another city. After his resignation, Gonzalez returned to San Antonio and was hired as a temporary worker. The company argues that Gonzalez was permitted to retain his permanent employment for one year following his conviction only because the conviction was not yet final and that his subsequent employment, being temporary, is irrelevant to our inquiry. When the Board assessed this in the light of the facts that one of the employees allegedly discharged pursuant to Decker's policy was fired immediately after her conviction and three weeks prior to sentencing and that, after his conviction became "final," Gonzalez resigned rather than being terminated, the Board might well find the company's explanation unconvincing.

This evidence, not by any means conclusive, supports the interpretation that at least one employee who was ostensibly affected by the alleged company policy was not considered unemployable because of his felony conviction. The Board might also take into account the fact that only one, or perhaps two, permanent employees were identified by Decker as having been discharged between 1970 and 1978 pursuant to this alleged corporate policy.

These items, the plant manager's testimony, the isolated prior instance of automatic termination and the Gonzalez episode, are not overwhelming. However, when weighed against the little that was offered to support the alleged no-second-chance policy, they suffice for substantiality.[2]

In the light of the Board's conclusion that Decker's management had some discretion to retain or discharge a convicted felon, we must determine, as required by Section 10(c) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. §160(c), whether its order to reinstate Orosco effectuates the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act. In determining whether Orosco's reinstatement effectuates the policies of the NLRA, we consider as one factor the Board's conclusion that all convicted felons were not inexorably discharged. Our primary inquiry, however, is whether reinstatement would create an unacceptable employment relationship and, therefore, frustrate the purposes of the NLRA.

A remedy ordered by the Board is subject only to limited review by this court. Fiberboard Paper Products v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233, 241 (1964). The Board and the courts have refused to order reinstatement of an unlawfully discharged employee who was quilty of unlawful or offensive conduct of such a nature that reinstatement would create an undesirable employment situation. See, e.g., NLRB v. Big Three Welding Equipment Co., 359 F.2d 77, 82–84 (5th Cir. 1966) (employee admitted theft from employer), NLRB v. R.C. Can Co., 340 F. 2d 435 (5th Cir. 1965) (employee threatened company president).

The Board here concluded that reinstatement of Orosco would not create an unacceptable employment relationship and that, in the face of his unlawful discharge, the policies of the NLRA would best be served by ordering him reinstated. This conclusion was within the scope of the Board's remedial discretion.

We also conclude that the back-pay awards to both Dominguez and Orosco properly effectuate the purposes of the Act by making the employees whole for losses suffered as a result of their unlawful discharges. Because we enforce the Board's reinstatement of Orosco, he is entitled to back pay from the date of his discharge until he is offered reinstatement. The Board's action with respect to Dominguez, however, requires a different analysis.

Applying the factors that would be consonant with the discretionary policy, the ALJ concluded that in view of his employment history and other factors, Dominguez would have been discharged after he was convicted of felony. He would, however, have been employed by Decker until that time. Therefore, the ALJ concluded that Dominguez should not be reinstated, but that he is nevertheless entitled to be compensated for wages lost as a result of his unlawful discharge. We conclude that the Board's remedy is a pragmatic and reasonable response to the lawful discharge. If back pay were not awarded, Decker would profit as a result of its unlawful conduct and Dominguez would not be made whole for losses suffered as a result of his unlawful discharge. Therefore, Dominguez should be paid wages lost from the date of his discharge until the date of his felony conviction.[3]

[2] The record also discloses that even the Company's published rules did not contain language that required mandatory discharge if an employee were convicted of a felony. Company Rule 31, in force at the time of Orosco's discharge, read that any conviction would be grounds for "discipline." Under the current corporate rules, a felony conviction "may" result in discharge. While not dispositive, the phraseology of Decker's own rules do not support the assertion that temination inexorably follows an employee's felony conviction.

Accordingly, the Board's order will be ENFORCED, in all respects.

[3] Similarly, in NLRB v. Big Three Welding Equipment Company, 359 F.2d 77 (5th Cir. 1966), we enforced the Board's cease and desist order and its restitution of back pay to unlawfully discharged employees but refused to enforce an order of reinstatement because the employees' admission of pilfering the company's property would have created an unacceptable employment relationship.

Kansas City Power & Light Company v. NLRB

641 F.2d 553 (8th Cir.), February 4, 1981—244 NLRB 620

On petition to review Board Order

Before HENLEY and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges, and HARPER,* Senior District Judge

554

MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judge: This action is before the court pursuant to § 10(e), (f) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), (f) (hereinafter the Act), authorizing judicial review of final orders of the National Labor Relations Board (hereinafter the Board). Kansas City Power & Light Co. (hereinafter the employer) petitions for review of the final order of the Board in Kansas City Power & Light Co., 244 N.L.R.B. No. 93 (1979), finding that the employer violated § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(3) of the Act. The Board has cross-petitioned for enforcement.

For the reasons discussed below, we grant the Board's cross-petition and enforce the order.

The employer is a public utility company engaged in the production, transmission, sale and distribution of electrical energy to customers in Missouri and Kansas. The employer and Locals 412, 1464 and 1613 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (hereinafter collectively referred to as the unions) have had a bargaining reletionship since the early 1940's Together the unions represent approximately 2,100 workers.

The applicable collective bargaining agreements were effective from July 1, 1976 through June 30, 1979. Each collective bargaining agreement contained a wage reopener clause providing that either party could reopen the agreement on June 30, 1978, for the purpose of adjusting wage rates and certain fringe benefits. The wage reopener clause further provided that in the event the parties were unable to reach an agreement, the clause in the collective bargaining agreement prohibiting strikes and lockouts was to be suspended, thereby leaving the unions free to strike in support of their bargaining position. The parties were unable to reach an agreement and the unions began a lawful economic strike on July 1, 1978. The strike continued until November 13, 1978.

When the employees returned to work, the employer required all probationary employees to begin the six-month probationary period anew.[1] In effect, the probationary employees returned to work as "new hires." [2] Thus, the time they had already served before the strike as probationary employees was lost and those benefits [3] that they would have received upon completion of the six-month probationary period were delayed, not for the balance of each employee's probationary period, but for six months.

*The Honorable Roy W. Harper, United States Senior District Judge for the Eastern District of Missouri, sitting by designation.

[1] The collective bargaining agreements define a "probationary employee" as any individual employed by the company for less than six continuous months. A "regular employee" is an individual who has been employed for six continuous months.

[2] The parties sharply disagree over the appropriate characterization of the employer's treatment of the probationary employees. The administrative law judge (ALJ) and the Board describe the employer as treating the probationary employees "as though they had been terminated." The employer denies the probationary employees were terminated and notes that the paperwork associated with termination was never processed, the probationary employees "as though they had been terminated." The employer denies the probationary employees were terminated and notes that the paperwork associated with termination was never processed, the probationary employees were reinstated immediately following the strike, and the new six-month probationary period merely deferred the accrual of the benefits associated with regular employee status.

This squabbling over semantic accuracy is beside the point. As noted in the text, the probationary employees were required to begin a new six-month probationary period following the strike. In practical effect, these employees began as "new hires."

[3] Upon completion of the six-month probationary period, employees are credited with six months seniority and become eligible for a variety of benefits (sick leave, vacation, health and welfare coverage), including a wage step increase.

The unions file unfair labor practice charges, alleging that the employer's treatment of the probationary employees violated § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(3) of the Act. The employer justified its conducted by relying on the collective bargaining agreement provision requiring six months continuous service [4] as a probationary employee, its policy and past practice or requiring those probationary employees with interruptions in their probationary periods to begin anew, and the absence of discrimination because all probationary employees were required to start all over. The Board affirmed the decision of the administrative law judge (ALJ) that the employer's conduct was "inherently destructive" of employee rights and, even absent a showing of antiunion motivation, a violation of the Act under the standards set forth in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 338 U.S. 26, 33-34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1997-98, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967), and further that the employer failed to establish "legitimate and substantial business justifications" for its conduct.

The Board ordered the employer to cease and desist from "discharging" or discriminating against employees who joined or participated in a lawful strike and in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their § 7 rights. The Board further ordered the employer to give credit to all probationary employees "terminated" during the 1978 strike for all service prior to the date of the strike and, upon completion of the total six months employment, treat them as regular employees, giving them retroactive wage step increases and othe benefits lost as a result of the employer's unfair labor practice.

In this petitions to set aside the Board's order, the employer argues that (1) its conduct was not discriminatory and therefore could not constitute a violation of § 8(a)(3); and (2) its conduct was not "inherently destructive" of employee rights and therefore, in the absence of any affirmative showing of antiunion motivation, could not constitute a violation of § 8(a)(3) and § 8(a)(1).

Our review of the Board's decision is quite limited. If the Board's findings are supported by substantial evidence and represent a correct application of the law, the order will be enforced. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); e. g., The PaintSmiths, Inc. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1326, 1329 (8th Cir. 1980), citing Inter-Collegiate Press v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 837, 840 (8th Cir 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 938, 94 S.Ct. 1939, 40 L.Ed.2d. 288 (1974).

First, the employer argues that because all the probationary employees were treated alike, its conduct was not discriminatory and therefore could not constitute a violation of § 8(a)(3). Discrimination is an essential element of a § 8(a)(3) violation. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3).[5] This argument is clearly without merit. In NLRB v. Jemco, Inc., 465 F.2d 1148 (6th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1109, 93 S.Ct. 911, 34 L.Ed.2d. 690 (1973), the employer refused to pay accrued vacation benefits and argued, as the employer does in the present case, that no finding of discrimination, and thus no violation of § 8(a)(3), was possible where all the striking employees had been treated alike. The court rejected the employer's argument.

> Although we are not referred to, nor do we find, any cases involving Section 8(a)(3) discrimination where all employees alike were denied an employment benefit, we do not believe that unequal treatment of different classes of employees is a pre-requisite to finding a Section 8(a)(3) violation where all employees engaged in a concerted activity. The interpretation of Section 8(a)(3) which the Company urges us to adopt would lead to the somewhat absurd result tht an emplyer could never be found in violation of that Section so long as he was careful to treat all employees alike, no matter how destructive of employee rights his conduct may be. The Section 8(a)(3) discrimination in the present case lies in the em> ployment prior to their engaging in a concerted activity and the Id. 465 F.2d at 1152 (emphasis added; footnote omitted); accord, NLRB v. Borden, Inc., 600 F.2d 313, 320–21 (1st Cir. 1979); Allied Industrial Workers Local 289 v. NLRB, 155 U.S.App.D.C. 112, 121, 476 F.2d 868, 877 (1973) ("A practice applied uniformly to all employees may be discriminatory and violate the Act just as a discriminatory practice may be held to be perfectly innocuous."). In other words, "[t]he fact that an employer stigmatizes striking employees while leaving nonstrikers untouched may be an indication of the employer's hostility toward the Union, but such disparity of treatment is not necessary to find a section 8(a)(3) and (1) violation." NLRB v. Borden, Inc., supra, 600 F.2d at 320.

[4] E.g., Collective Bargaining Agreement between Kansas City Power & Light Co. and Local Union 1613, IBEW, 1976-79, art. V. § 1(a) ("The term 'probationary employee' means any individual engaged by the Company for regular employment without limitations as to time who has not completed six months of continuous service with the company.") (emphasis added) (NLRB Ex. J1(c)).

[5] Under section 8(a)(3) of the Act, it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." In NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 233, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1148, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963), the Supreme Court held that discouraging membership in a labor organization under section 8(a)(3) includes discouraging participation in concerted activities such as a legitimate strike.

In the present case all the employees went on strike. The employer therefore could not have discriminated against striking employees and in favor of nonstriking employees. However, as discussed above, disparity in treatment between strikers and nonstrikers is not necessary to finding a § 8(a)(3) violation. Id. Where all the employees engage in a concerted activity, the requisite disparity is between the treatment of all employees before and after the concerted activity. NLRB v. Jemco, Inc., supra, 465 F.2d at 1152. Here, the requisite discrimination lies in the disparity of treatment of probationary employees with breaks in service before and after the strike. The General Counsel presented evidence that before the strike three probationary employees were not required to begin their probationary periods anew even though absent from work between two to ten weeks. We conclude that the Board's finding of discriminatory treatment is supported by substantial evidence.

Next, the employer argues that its treatment of the probationary employees was not "inherently destructive" of important employee rights and was justified by "legitimate and substantial" business justifications. Therefore, the employer argues that absent an affirmative showing of antiunion motivation, its conduct could not constitute a violation of § 8(a)(3) and § 8(a)(1). See NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, 388 U.S. at 33–34, 84 S.Ct. 1197–98; NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 228–29, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1145–46, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963); see generally Christensen & Svanoe, Motive & Intent in the Commission of Unfair Labor Practices: The Supreme Court & the Fictive Formality, 77 Yale L.J. 1269 (1969).

The employer's argument is based upon the distinction drawn in Great Dane between discriminatory conduct which is "inherently destructive" of important employee rights and discriminatory conduct which has a "comparatively slight" adverse effect on employee rights. 388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–98. As outlined in the familiar but somewhat enigmatic passage in Great Dane:

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed [6] and the
> Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations.[7]

[6] Modern labor law cases, that is, post-Radio Officers Union cases, emphasize unlawful or antiunion motivation. "The statutory language 'discrimination * * * to * * * discourage' means that the finding of a violation normally turns on whether the discriminatory conduct was motivated by an antiunion purpose." NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, 388 U.S. at 33, 87 S.Ct. at 1797, citing American Ship Bldg. Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 85 S.Ct. 955, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965). See generally 3 T. Kheel, Labor Law § 12.02 (1980); Janofsky, New Concepts in Interference & Discrimination under the NLRA: The Legacy of American Ship & Great Dane, 70 Colum.L.Rev. 81(1970); Oberer, The Scienter Factor in Sections 8a1 & 3 of the Labor Act: Of Balancing, Hostile Motive, Dogs & Tails, 52 Cornell L.Q. 491, 504–06 (1967) (explaining use of words "motive" and "intent" in Supreme Court opinions); Note, Proving an 8a3 Violation: The Changing Standard, 114 U.Pa.L.Rev. 866 (1966). But see 3 T. Kheel, Labor Law, supra, § 12.02 (discussing the "varient view"); Christensen & Svanoe, Motive & Intent in the Commission of Unfair Labor Practices: The Supreme Court & the Fictive Formality, 77 Yale L.J. 1269 (1968) (emphasizing discrimination, irrelevance of intent or motive); Note, Discrimination & the NLRB: The Scope of Board Power under 8a3 & 8b2, 32 U.Chi.L.Rev. 124 (1964).

[7] The employer in such cases must be held to intend the very consequences which foreseeably and inescapably flow from his actions and if he fails to explain away, to justify or to characterize his actions as something different than they appear on their face, an unfair labor practice charge is made out. But, as often happens, the employer may counter by claiming that his actions were taken in the pursuit of legitimate business ends and that his dominant purpose was not to discriminate or to invade union rights but to accomplish business objectives acceptable under the Act. Nevertheless, his conduct does speak for itself—it is discriminatory and it does discourage union membership and whatever the claimed overriding justification may be, it carries with it

> Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must be proven to sustain the charge if the employer comes forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.

388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–98 (emphasis in original; footnotes added).

"Finding a § 8(a)(3) violation normally requires an affirmative showing that the employer's discriminatory conduct was motivated by an antiunion purpose. But when an employer's conduct is characterized as 'inherently destructive,' 'unlawful motivation is presumed to exist.'" Loomis Courier Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 595 F.2d 491, 495 (9th Cir. 1979) (other citations omitted), citing Western Exterminator Co. NLRB v., 565 F.2d 1114, 1118 n.3 (9th Cir. 1977). Thus, the characterization of discriminatory conduct as either "inherently destructive" or having a "comparatively slight" adverse effect is critical because that characterization determines which party has the benefit of a presumption of lawful or unlawful motivation, once a showing of "legitimate and substantial business justification" has been made. "Inherently destructive" discriminatory conduct bears "its own indicia of intent" and thus relieves the General Counsel of the difficult task of proving unlawful motivation. NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, 373 U.S. at 231, 83 S.Ct. at 1147. Even if the employer establishes a "legitimate and substantial business justification" for "inherently destructive" conduct, the presumption of unlawful motivation remains, leaving the Board the "delicate task" of balancing conflicting legitimate interests in light of the Act and its policy. E.g., NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, 388 U.S. at 33–34, 87 S.Ct. at 1197–98; NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, 373 U.S. at 228–29, 83 S.Ct. at 1145–46; Johns-Manville Products Corp. v. NLRB, 557 F.2d 1126, 1144 (5th Cir. 1977) (Wisdom, J., dissenting) (express reference to balancing respective interests in order to draw correct inference about real motive of employer), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 956, 98 S.Ct. 3069, 57 L.Ed.2d 1121 (1978); Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 1379, 1386 (9th Cir. 1976) (express reference to balancing). Discriminatory conduct which has only a "comparatively slight" adverse effect on employee rights similarly raises a presumption of unlawful motive. However, if rebutted by a showing of "legitimate and substantial business justification," the presumption of unlawful motive disappears, the conduct in question is prima facie lawful, and the General Counsel must affirmatively prove unlawful motive. E.g., NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, 388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–98; Johns-Manville Products Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 557 F.2d at 1144 (Wisdom, J., dissenting).

The Supreme Court has yet to clearly define the phrase "inherently destructive."[8] This Circuit in Inter-Collegiate Press v. NLRB, agreeing that the phrase was not easily susceptible of precise definition, acknowledged that "actions creating visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights" are "inherently destructive." 486 F.2d at 845, citing Case Note, 85 Harv.L.Rev. 680, 680, 686 (1972); accord, Loomis Courier Service, Inc. v. NLRB supra, 595 F.2d at 495, citing Portland Willamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331, 1334 (9th Cir. 1976) (conduct with far-reaching effects which would hinder future bargaining or conduct which discriminates solely upon the basis of participation in strikes or union activity is inherently destruc> unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which he must have intended. As is not uncommon in human experience, such situations present a complex of motives and preferring one motive to another is in reality the far more delicate task, reflected in part in the decisions of this Court, of weighing the interests of employees in concerted activity against the interest of the employer in operating his business in a particular manner and of balancing in light of the Act and its policy the intended consequences upon employee rights against the business ends to be served by the employer's conduct.

NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, 373 U.S. at 228–29, 83 S.Ct. at 1145–46 (emphasis in original; citation and footnotes omitted); see e. g., Johns-Manville Prods. Corp. v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 1379, 1386 (9th Cir. 1976) ("The ultimate problem is the balancing of conflicting legitimate interests.").

[8] In Great Dane the Court describes "inherently destructive" conduct as "conduct [which] carries with it 'unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which he must have intended' and thus bears 'its own indicia of intent.'" 388 U.S. at 33, 87 S.Ct. at 1797, citing NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, 373 U.S. at 228, 231, 83 S.Ct. at 1145–47; see generally 3 T. Kheel, Labor Law, supra note 6, § 12.02.

tive); Johns-Manville Products Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 557 F.2d at 1144 (Wisdom, J., dissenting) ("inherently destructive" describes conduct that thwarts the basic policies of the Act and frustrates the process of collective bargaining or the future of unionization, but not conduct merely influencing workers' ability to maintain their bargaining demands); Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, supra, 538 F.2d at 1386 (discriminatory conduct which is directly related to protected activity is inherently destructive, citing Signal Oil & Gas Co. v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 338, 343–44 (9th Cir. 1968)).

While there is much to be said for the Board's characterization of the employer's treatment of the probationary employees as "inherently destructive," it is unnecessary here for us to decide whether the employer's conduct was "inherently destructive" or whether its effect was "comparatively slight" since in either event the result is the same. The employer's conduct was directly related to the probationary employees' participation in a lawful economic strike, a protected activity under the Act. E. g., NLRB v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 603 F.2d 610, 617 (7th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Knuth Bros., 584 F.2d 813, 815 (7th Cir. 1978) (§ 8(a)(1) violation); NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 840–42 (5th Cir. 1978); Kellogg Co. v. NLRB, 457 F.2d 519, 522 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 850, 93 S.Ct. 58, 34 L.Ed.2d 92 (1972), citing NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, 373 U.S. at 233, 83 S.Ct. at 1148; cf. System Council T-4 v. NLRB, 466 F.2d 815 n.7 (7th Cir. 1971) (adjustment of net credit service dates, as distinguished from seniority, to account for strike time found to have "comparatively slight" adverse effect on employee rights within context of Great Dane) cert. denied, 404 U.S. 1059, 92 S.Ct. 740, 30 L.Ed.2d 747 (1972); Tex-Tan Welhausen Co. v. NLRB, 419 F.2d 1265 (5th Cir. 1969) (benefit adjustment for strike absence), vacated on other grounds, 397 U.S. 819, 90 S.Ct. 1516, 25 L.Ed.2d 805 (1970). Such conduct, when considered from a common sense point of view, is bound to have a discouraging effect on present and future concerted activities, particularly upon the probationary employees' support of the unions. The inevitable consequence of the application of the employer's policy with regard to absences during the probationary period is that probationary employees can strike for one week, or possibly at most for one month,[9] without jeopardizing their accrued probationary service. Such an action creates an obstacle of some dimension to the future exercise of employee rights. Inter-Collegiate Press v. NLRB, supra, 486 F.2d at 845.

We recognize that the employer did present evidence tending to show that it was motivated by legitimate objectives in requiring all the probationary employees to start anew that is, the enforcement of its six months continuous service policy. However, there was evidence in the record that the employer's policy was unwritten, flexible, and administered with some discretion by supervisors, and that within the past several years three probationary employees with substantial breaks in service had not been made to begin the probationary period anew.

As the ALJ found, the testimony offered in justification of the six months rule was conclusory and was not supported by any specific evidence—"for instance why the company found it necessary to terminate one who had completed 5 months and 3 weeks."

In the circumstances, we agree with the Board that the employer's assertions fall short of showing substantial and legitimate business considerations and hold that the employer failed to carry its burden of justifying its conduct.

We distinguish NLRB v. National Seal, Division of Federal-Mogul-Bower Bearings, Inc. 336 F.2d 781 (9th Cir. 1964), denying enforcement in 141 N.L.R.B. 661 (1963). In this pre-Great Dane case, the employer applied a probationary rule that the probationary period of 60 days was required to be completed without interruption to striking probationary employees. The rule was of long standing and had been rigidly enforced prior to the strike. In addition, the parties had stipulated that the employer's sole motive in terminating the strike probationary employees was that the employer wanted all probationary periods to be continuous and unbroken. The court denied enforcement of the Board order, declining to adopt a per se rule on the application of otherwise lawful probationary rules to economic strikers, id at 783, citing Quality Casting Co., 139 N.L.R.B. 928 (1962), enforcement denied, 325 F.2d 36 (6th Cir. 1963), and stressing the absence of evidence of unlawful motivation. 336 F.2d at 784–85. In the instant case we note that the employer's probationary policy was more in the nature of a guideline and not "rigidly enforced."

[9] The employer's then director of employee relations, Mr. Feild, testified that the policy with regard to absences during the probationary period was unwritten and flexible, its general guidelines "generally understood" by the supervisors. Feild further testified that, although not fixed, an absence lasting up to a week was permissible but absences of a month were generally not, leaving absences between a week and a month as a "gray area" to be handled on an individual basis.

Further, we are not persuaded by the employer's argument that its treatment of the probationary employees was compelled by the collective bargaining agreement and was the lawful implementation of a right required through the bargaining process.[10] See G.C. Murphy Co., 207 N.L.R.B. 579 (1973); Roegelein Provision Co., 181 N.L.R.B. 578 (1970). In both of those cases the Board found that the denial of accrued vacation benefits by the employer pursuant to an express provision in the collective bargaining agreement constituted "a lawful implementation of a right understood to have been acquired through the collective bargaining process." G.C. Murphy Co., supra, 207 N.L.R.B. at 582; Roegelein Provision Co., supra, 181 N.L.R.B. at 580. But see G.C. Murphy Co., supra, 207 N.L.R.B. at 579–80 (Member Fanning, dissenting). In each case there was negotiating history that included repeated discussions about the meaning and scope of the provisions. In contrast, the negotiating history in the present case is meager: in the 1974 strike settlement agreement the application of the six months continuous service requirement was suspended, while the settlement agreement for the 1978 strike at issue here did not address the problem. With the exception of the 1974 strike (83 days) and the 1978 strike (4.5 months), past strikes against the company apparently were much shorter and the applicability of the six months continuous service requirement to breaks in service did not become an issue. In any case, we would be very reluctant to find a limitation of the right to strike by probationary employees effected by the language of the provisions of the collective bargaining agreement in question here. See note 10 supra.

In sum, the Board's finding of a unfair labor practice in supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Accordingly, the order of the Board is enforced.

NLRB v. Carroll Contracting and Ready-Mix, Inc.

636 F.2d 111 (5th Cir.), February 5, 1981—247 NLRB 890

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before KRAVITCH and FRANK M. JOHNSON, JR., Circuit Judges, and ALLGOOD,* District Judge

ALLGOOD, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board seeks enforcement of its order issued against Carroll Contracting and Ready-Mix, Inc., wherein Carroll was ordered to bargain on request with the certified representative of its employees.

Carroll, a Florida corporation, is engaged in the wholesale and retail sale and distribution of concrete and asphalt products. In July, 1978, the Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Local No. 385 petitioned to represent Carroll's production and maintenance employees. A stipulation for certification upon consent election was thereafter entered into scheduling an election and defining the appropriate unit. A secret ballot election was held on August 28, 1978. The union won by a vote of 55 to 44, with 13 challenged ballots and two void ballots. Carroll timely filed 24 objections to conduct allegedly affecting the results of the election. The Regional Director of the Board conducted an ex parte investigation, and Carroll was given an opportunity to present evidence. Subsequently, a report was issued by the Regional Director recommending that three of the challenged ballots be sustained; that Carroll's objections be overruled in their entirety; and that the union be certified. Exceptions were then filed by Carroll requesting that the election be set aside, or in the alternative, that an evidentiary hearing be held. These requests were denied by the Board when it adopted the Regional Director's findings, and the union was certified as the bargaining representative of Carroll's production and maintenance employees. In order to test the validity of the certification, Carroll refused to bargain with the union. Consequently, the union filed unfair labor practice charges against Carroll. A complaint was then issued against Carroll by the Board's General Counsel alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relation Act.[1] Carroll answered and the General Counsel moved for summary judgement. A show cause order was issued to which Carroll responded with a motion in opposition to summary judgment. On February 6, 1980, the Board issued its decision and order granting summary judgment and finding Carroll in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Carroll was ordered to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices; to bargain with the union on request; and to post an appropriate notice. The Board now seeks enforcement of its order.

[10] This position comes close to an argument that the probationary employees' right to strike was waived by the collective bargaining agreement, specifically by the provision defining probationary employees as individuals with less than six months continuous service. However, although the right to strike may be waived by appropriate provisions in a collective bargaining agreement, such a waiver of a protected right must be expressed in clear and unmistakable language. E. g., Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 280, 76 S.Ct. 349, 357, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956).

*District Judge of the Northern District of Alabama, sitting by designation.

Among Carroll's 24 objections to conduct affecting the results of the election was alleged improper electioneering, and it is upon that objection that this case turns. The undisputed evidence revealed that before the polls opened, two former Carroll employees wearing "Vote Teamsters" signs on their hats and enlarged reproductions of the ballot with an "X" marked in the "Yes" box pinned on their shirts, positioned themselves in the parking lot where the line of waiting voters formed. This line was approximately 25 feet from the polls. At one time there were as many as 45 employees waiting to vote. As the line of voters passed them by, both men urged the employees to vote for the union and repeatedly gestured to the "Yes" box on the ballot pinned to their shirt. These activities continued throughout the polling hours.

At the pre-election conference, the electioneering in the parking lot was brought to the attention of the Board agent. She stated, however, that she could only control electioneering within the polling place.

The Board set out its policy regarding electioneering in Claussen Baking Company, 134 NLRB 111 (1961). In Claussen, the electioneering took place 15 feet from the polling place and only continued for 15 minutes, at which time it was terminated by the Board agent. Setting the election aside, the Board stated:

> It is the province of the Board to safeguard its elections from conduct which inhibits the free choice of the voters, and the Board is especially zealous in preventing intrusions upon the actual conduct of its elections. In furtherance of this responsibility, the Board prohibits electioneering at or near the polls.

134 NLRB at 112. (Emphasis added).

The Board further defined its electioneering policy in the oft cited Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968), where it stated that elections would be overturned where representatives of any party to the election engaged in "prolonged" conversations with voters waiting to cast their ballots, regardless of the content of the conversation. The Board articulated that the potential for distraction, last minute electioneering, and unfair advantage justified a "strict rule" against such conduct, without requiring an examination into the substance or effect of the conversations. General Shoe Corp. 77 NLRB 124, 127 (1948).

This court reiterated that standard in Home Town Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 392 (5th Cir. 1969). The "laboratory conditions" test represents an ideal atmosphere in which a free choice may be made by employees, protected from interference by employer, union, Board agent, or other parties. 416 F.2d at 396. Cf. NLRB v. Lake Butler Apparel Co., 392 F.2d 76, 82 (5th Cir. 1968). The Board contends that the electioneering which occurred was not improper inasmuch as the two former Carroll employees were not agents of the union, and thus their conduct could not be attributed to the union. We disagree. It is well settled that acts not attributable to the union warrant setting aside the election if the acts disrupted the voting procedure or destroyed the atmosphere necessary to the exercise of a free choice in the representation election. NLRB

[1] Section 8

(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7;

* * * * *

(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of Sec. 9(a).

[29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (5)].

v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1371 (5th Cir. 1980). In Home Town Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 397 F.2d 241 (5th Cir. 1967), this court stated:

> We are not impressed with the argument that all coercive acts must be shown to be attributable to the union itself, rather than to the rank and file of its supporters. "The important fact is that such conditions existed and that a free election is hereby rendered impossible." Diamond State Poultry Co., 107 NLRB 3, 6 (1953).

The Board further argues that the electioneering was not improper because it occurred outside the polling place. We are not convinced. As stated by the Board in Milchem, the last few moments before voting should be the voters own, "as free from interference as possible." 170 NLRB at 362-363. We do not find that this protection from interference is reserved for only those employees who have gained access to the actual polling place to cast their vote. Once the polls opened, the employees waiting outside in line to vote became a part of the polling place, and were entitled to the safeguards against interference espoused by Milchem.

We have held that where the Board promulgates a standard governing conduct under the Act, "such policies are controlling until the Board announces a change and its reasons for the change." Delta Drilling Co. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 109, 113 (5th Cir. 1969); NLRB v. Osborn Transp., Inc., 589 F.2d 1275 (5th Cir. 1979). Since in Claussen the Board has prohibited electioneering "at or near the polls", we must set aside the election and enforcement of the Board's order is denied.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

Seattle-First National Bank v. NLRB

638 F.2d 1221 (9th Cir.), February 5, 1981—241 NLRB 753

On petition to review Board Order

Before SNEED and FLETCHER, Circuit Judges and JAMESON,* District Judge.

JAMESON, District Judge: Seattle-First National Bank has petitioned for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding that the Bank violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) and (1), by failing to bargain in good faith with Financial Institution Employees of America, Local No. 1182 (the Union), and by implementing portions of its last offer before a valid impasse had been reached.[1] The Board in a cross-application seeks enforcement of its order. The Union was permitted to intervene. We deny enforcement and remand to the Board for further consideration.

Factual Background

Seattle-First National Bank is a national banking association headquartered in Seattle and engaged in commercial banking operations at approximately 170 branches throughout the State of Washington. On November 30, 1970, the Union was certified by the Board as the collective bargaining representative of all Bank employees, excluding professional employees, confidential employees, management trainees, and supervisors and guards. The bargaining unit consists of approximately 4,800 employees. The Union and the Bank entered into two successive bargaining agreements, effective from about August 1, 1971 to July 31, 1974, and from August 1, 1974 to July 31, 1977. On July 6, 1977, while the second agreement was still in effect, the Union and the Bank began meetings directed toward the negotiation of a third agreement. The first six meetings were devoted to the presentation and discussion of the Union's first offer. The Bank presented its first offer, exclusive of cost items, on July 27. On July 29, the parties extended the second agreement indefinitely pending negotiations, subject to termination on ten days notice.

The Bank presented succeeding offers at the 11th meeting, on August 10, this one containing its first economic proposals; at 1224 the 16th meeting, on August 23; at the 21st meeting, on September 7; at the 27th meeting, on September 27; at the 33rd meeting, on October 13; and on October 20, in the wake of the 36th meeting, held on October 19. The Union presented succeeding offers at the 17th meeting, on August 29; at the 24th meeting, on September 16; and at the 35th meeting, on October 18. Apart from these offers both sides made counterproposals in limited areas from time to time, and accord was reached on some issues, subject to agreement on a total contract. In all, approximately 45 meetings were held without reaching an agreement. A federal mediator participated in the meetings on and after October 13.

*The Honorable William J. Jameson, Senior United States District Judge for the District of Montanna, sitting by designation.

[1] The order was issued on April 5, 1979 and is reported at 241 N.L.R.B. No. 117.

The Bank's final offer of October 20 was accompanied by a letter summarizing those areas in which the offer improved upon existing proposals. It stated:

> Our employees have waited long enough. We have met 36 times to date and have yet to reach agreement on major issues. We have bargained in good faith and believe the time has come to conclude these negotiations.
> As a result, you have until the end of this month to accept the enclosed offer. If you do not accept it by the end of the month, we will assume these negotiations remain at an impasse, and we will implement our offer effective November 1, 1977.

Also on October 20, the Bank sent the Union a ten day notice terminating the 1974 agreement.

On October 25, the Bank again wrote to the Union, urging that any objections it might have to the final offer be discussed before the November 1, 1977, effective date of the notice of termination. The Union responded by letter on October 28, proposing a meeting on November 2 to discuss and negotiate certain named topics and other items on which agreement had not been reached. The Bank replied the same day:

> While we are willing to continue meeting with you to discuss any of the open issues, as long as further negotiations appear fruitful, you have the Bank's final offer and the statements contained in the letters to you dated October 20 and 25, 1977, still stand.
> We look forward to seeing you on November 2nd.

The Union did not accept the Bank's offer of October 20, and the Bank implemented the economic portions of its final offer on November 1. The Bank also stopped furnishing monthly employee status reports, as required by the old agreement, and stopped observing the dues check off provision of the old agreement. Despite the Bank's unilateral action and its claim that impasse was reached in late October (incidental to the "final" offer of the 20th) negotiations continued.

Board Proceedings

Charges of unfair labor practices were filed by the Union on September 19 and October 26, 1977. A consolidated complaint was issued by the Board on November 29, 1977, alleging that the Bank had violated § 8(a)(1) and (5) during contract negotiations by acting with an overall lack of good faith.[2] The bad faith of the Bank was allegedly evidenced by: (1) the content of certain of the Bank's contract proposals, (2) the Bank's insistence to impasse on nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, and (3) the Bank's unilateral implementation on November 1 of portions of its last offer.

The order of the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) discussed exhaustively each of the contract proposals urged by the Union as evidence of the Bank's bad faith.[3] It also discussed other alleged indicia of bad faith. The ALJ's findings, however, were limited to the contract proposals, which the judge found provided a basis in themselves for concluding the Bank acted with bad faith during the negotiations. The ALJ also found that the Bank's insistence upon nonmandatory subjects of bargaining up to the time of impasse constituted an unfair labor practice, and that since the Bank had failed to negotiate in good faith no genuine impasse had been reached. The unilateral implementation of portions of its "final offer" accordingly was unlawful under the Act. The ALJ concluded that each of these findings constituted a violation of § 8(a)(1) and (5).

[2] The applicable portions of Section 8 of the NLRA, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 158, provide:

> 8(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—.
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 (Section 7 guarantees the right of employees "to bargain collectively * * *, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining * * *.")
> (5) To refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees. * * *

Section 8(d) defines the duty to bargain collectively as "the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment * * *." This obligation does not, however, "compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *." Id.

[3] This portion of the ALJ's order sets out in detail each of the objectionable contract provisions as first proposed, the revised version contained in the Bank's October 20 final offer, the changes made after the "final" offer, and the distinctions between the proposals and comparable provisions in the existing contract.

The Board affirmed the order of the Administrative Law Judge insofar as it held that the Bank had failed to bargain in good faith and had implemented portions of its last offer before a valid impasse had been reached. It reversed the ALJ's ruling that the Bank had bargained to impasse on nonmandatory subjects of bargaining, concluding that the objectionable proposals had not been negotiated to impasse, but were simply items raised and left unresolved by the negotiations. The Board issued a cease and desist order and ordered the posting of notices.

Scope of Review

The Board's findings of fact must be affirmed if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 477, 71 S.Ct. 456, 459, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); K-Mart Corp. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 704 (9 Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Sacramento Clinical Lab., 623 F.2d 110, 112 (9 Cir. 1980). "If facts are open to conflicting inferences we are not at liberty to draw an inference different from the one drawn by the Board, even though it may seem more plausible and reasonable to us." NLRB v. Millmen, Local 550, 367 F.2d 953, 956 (9 Cir. 1966); Queen Mary Restaurants Corp. v. NLRB, 560 F.2d 403, 407 (9 Cir. 1977). It is required, however, "that substantiality be determined in the light of all that the record relevantly presents." Universal Camera, 340 U.S. at 488, 71 S.Ct. at 464.

Bad Faith Bargaining

Ascertaining compliance with the duty to bargain in good faith generally requires inquiry into an employer's motive or state of mind during the bargaining process. NLRB v. Stanislaus Implement and Hardware Co., 226 F.2d 377, 380 (9 Cir. 1955). "Since it would be extraordinary for a party directly to admit a 'bad faith' intention, his motive must of necessity be ascertained from circumstantial evidence * * *." Continental Ins. Co. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 44, 48 (2 Cir. 1974). Good faith must be determined from an examination of the totality of circumstances. NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 871, 883 (9 Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., Inc., 572 F.2d 1343, 1347 (9 Cir. 1978). "A state of mind such as good faith is not determined by a consideration of events viewed separately. The picture is created by a consideration of all the facts viewed as an integrated whole." NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d at 883,[4] quoting NLRB v. Stanislaus Implement and Hardware Co., 226 F. 2d at 381.

This court has uniformly deferred to the expertise of the Board to make the initial determination whether an employer's conduct demonstrates an unwillingness to bargain in good faith. See, e. g., NLRB v. Dent, 534 F.2d 844, 846 (9 Cir. 1976); Queen Mary Restaurants Corp. v. NLRB, 560 F.2d 403, 407 (9 Cir. 1977). We have recognized that the "Board has been afforded flexibility to determine * * * whether * * * conduct at the bargaining table evidences a real desire to come into agreement" and that this determination is made by "drawing inferences from the conduct of the parties as a whole." NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Ford, Inc., 465 F.2d 717, 719 (9 Cir. 1972), quoting NLRB v. Insurance Agents Union, 361 U.S. 477, 498, 80 S.Ct. 419, 432, 42 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960).

On the other hand, Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act expressly provides that the duty to bargain in good faith does not "compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *." This provision has been interpreted to mean that "the Board may not, either directly or indirectly, compel concessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective bargaining agreements." NLRB v. American Nat'l Ins. Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404, 72 S.Ct. 824, 829, 96 L.Ed. 1027 (1952). While this court has sanctioned the Board's consideration of the content of bargaining proposals as part of its review when making a determination as to the good faith of parties negotiating a contract, NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Ford, Inc., supra, 465 F.2d at 719, inferences drawn from those proposals are not alone sufficient to support a finding of a violation of the oblitation to bargain in good faith. "In addition * * * the Board must show 'substantial evidence that the company's attitude was inconsistent with its duty to seek an agreement' * * *" NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., Inc., supra, 572 F.2d at 1348–49, citing NLRB v. MacMillan Ring-Free Oil Co., 394 F.2d 26, 29 (9 Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 914, 89 S.Ct. 237, 21 L.Ed.2d 199 (1968).[5] [4] In his decision the ALJ quoted from the Board's decision in Tomco. This court, however, in denying enforcement of the Board's order in that case did not find "the requisite substantial evidence of bad faith in the record as a whole," noting the court's divergence from the Board is most apparent in the evaluation of bargaining proposals" and rejecting the Board's analysis of the employer's final offer as "terms which no self-respecting union could be expected to accept." Id. at 883.

We turn now to a consideration of the Board's findings of bad faith in the light of these principles. The findings apparently were based solely upon the contract proposals.[6] The Board made no findings with respect to other evidence which assertedly demonstrated bad faith.[7] Nor has it made any findings with respect to the evidence presented by the Bank in support of its contention that it was bargaining in good faith and that the parties were unable to agree because of the Union's "unreasonable proposals and hard bargaining." In other words, we cannot conclude from the Board's findings that it considered the "totality of the circumstances" which are indicative of mental state.

This conclusion is entirely consistent with the holding in the leading case of NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131 (1 Cir.) cert. denied, 346 U.S. 887, 74 S.Ct. 139, 98 L.Ed 391 (1953). In that case the employer and the union, as here, engaged in a prolonged period of negotiations without making substantial progress toward reaching agreement. The Board, in reaching its conclusion that the employer had violated his duty to bargain in good faith, examined not only the contract proposals, but all of the circumstances indicative of the employer's mental state which attended the negotiating process. Id. at 134–40. In sum, the Board there examined "the totality of the employer's conduct * * *." Id. at 134.[8]

The determination of whether the Bank was engaged in impermissible "surface bargaining" or permissible "hard bargaining" involves the application of statutory considerations to complex facts susceptible of varying interpretations.[9] This determination can properly be made only upon consideration of the "totality of the circumstances." We remand to the Board for a re-examination of the record to determine whether the record as a whole, including the course of negotiations as well as the contract proposals, supports a finding of bad faith.

[5] In Pacific Grinding Wheel, the court recognized that "Board disapproval of proposed terms," "a company's adamant insistence on strong pro-management terms," and "rejection by the employer of terms which were in a previous contract" are not sufficient in themselves to establish bad faith, but are factors which may be considered by the Board with other evidence, and that the "totality of the circumstances may justify a finding of failure to bargain in good faith." Id. at 1348.

[6] The ALJ found, and the Board agreed, that the Bank, among other things, sought to have the Union abdicate its right to strike even over unfair labor practices, to remove most disputes involving employees from any effective grievance and arbitration procedure, to require the exhaustion of contract remedies before employees could exercise any rights they might have under labor or civil rights statutes and simultaneously to set a short statute of limitations during which such complaints might be filed with outside agencies, and to reserve the right in the Bank to change employee-benefit plans without notice to the Union.

[7] While the record contains evidence of other acts of the Bank's representatives before and during negotiations and after impasse from which bad faith could be inferred and both the ALJ and Board were aware of this evidence, the Board's conclusion that the Bank violated its obligation to bargain referred only to the Board's evaluation of the contract proposals made by the Bank. In finding a violation of the obligation to bargain in good faith based exclusively on contract proposals the Board is in effect doing that which it is prohibited from doing—sitting in judgment upon the substantive terms of a proposed collective bargaining agreement.

[8] This court has cited NLRB v. Reed & Prince to support its holdings in NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Ford, Inc., supra, 465 F.2d at 719; NLRB v. Yutana Barge Lines, Inc., 315 F.2d 524, 528 (9 Cir. 1963); NLRB v. Stanislaus Implement & Hardware Co., supra, 226 F.2d at 381. In NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., supra, 567 F.2d at 883, and NLRB v. MacMillan Ring-Free Oil Co., supra, 394 F.2d at 29, the court, although agreeing with the result of Reed & Prince, expresses reservations concerning some of its language.

[9] Surface bargaining is defined as "'going through the motions of negotiating,' without any real intent to reach an agreement." K-Mart Corp. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 704, 706 (9 Cir. 1980). It is often difficult to detect, and is generally provable only through inferences drawn from circumstantial evidence. While it is permissible for a party to engage in "hard bargaining", utilizing its economic power to its advantage to retain as many rights as possible, NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., supra, 567 F.2d at 884, good faith presupposes a desire to reach ultimate agreement, thus management and labor cannot maintain an attitude of "take it or leave it." NLRB v. Ins. Agents International Union, supra, 361 U.S. at 485, 80 S.Ct. at 424. Sophisticated pretense in the form of apparent or surface bargaining is violative of the Act—what is required is that both parties "enter into discussions with an open and fair mind, and a sincere purpose to find a basis of agreement * * *." NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Ford, Inc., supra, 465 F.2d at 719. This requirement must be religiously adhered to lest an employer be allowed to utilize his superior economic strength to talk a union to death. See Cox, "The Duty to Bargain in Good Faith", 71 Harv.L.Rev. 1401, 1413 (1958).

Unilateral Implementation of Bank's "Final Offer"

Those engaged in collective bargaining are normally required to bargain to impasse on all mandatory issues. NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d at 881. An employer's "unilateral change in conditions of employment under negotiation" is a violation of § 8(a)(5) since it is "a circumvention of the duty to negotiate." NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1111, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). If one party fails to bargain in good faith, no valid impasse can be reached. NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 572 F.2d at 1349.

The Board here found that there could be no impasse since the Bank did not bargain in good faith. If, on remand, the Board decides that the Bank did bargain in good faith, it must then address the question of whether an impasse was reached before the unilateral change in wages and working conditions.[10] If not, there would be an independent violation of the duty to bargain in good faith. NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., Inc., 572 F.2d at 1349.

Enforcement of the Board's order is denied and the case is remanded to the Board for further consideration consistent with this opinion.

---

[10] On appeal the Board has raised the question of whether under the facts of this case impasse was indeed reached. It appears from the record that the bank, after having submitted its "final" offer of October 20, revised that offer in two significant respects on November 10, ten days after implementing its economic proposals: (1) by deleting the language "unfair labor practice strike" from its no strike clause, and (2) by deleting language requiring that the grievance/arbitration procedure be exhausted before employees could exercise rights outside the contract. Then on December 5, the Bank presented a "revised final offer" which also was rejected. A number of bargaining sessions were subsequently held. These factors raise some question as to whether an impasse had in fact been reached.

ROSENN, Circuit Judge: This case comes before us on a petition for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or "Board"), filed pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act ("Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). The Board found that K & K Gourmet Meats, Inc. ("K & K" or "Company") committed certain unfair labor practices during the course of a union organizing campaign and directed the Company to recognize and bargain with the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, Food Employees Union Local 590 ("Union"). The practices complained of occurred at the K & K plant, located in Leetsdale, Pennsylvania.

I.

K & K is a small, family-owned company engaged in processing specialty meats. The business is run by its president, Arthur Katz, assisted by Barbara Weiler, the most senior employee.[1] The Company was founded by Arthur and his brother Leo, who died shortly before the events giving rise to this proceeding. Besides Katz and Weiler, the Company employed fourteen full-time and three part-time workers at all times relevant to this cause.

In October 1978, employee Cheryl Welsh communicated with George Nestler, a Union representative, concerning the possibility of organizing the K & K workforce. A meeting was arranged for the evening of October 23. Eight employees attended the meeting, all of whom signed Union authorization cards at that time. One additional card was obtained the following morning.[2]

Nestler confronted Katz with the cards on October 24, 1978, demanding that K & K recognize the Union as the authorized representative of its employees. Katz refused and referred Nestler to the Company's attorney who indicated that K & K had a good faith doubt that the Union represented an uncoerced majority of the employees.

*Honorable John B. Hannum, United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, sitting by designation.

[1] The Board found Weiler to be a "supervisor" within the meaning of 29 U.S.C. § 152(11). The Company does not dispute that finding in this court.

[2] Two more cards were obtained on Saturday, October 28, 1978. The Company does not dispute that the number of cards held by the Union was sufficient to demonstrate majority strength.

After work on October 24, Weiler stopped for coffee at a local restaurant with employee Ann Anderson, a personal friend with whom she rode to work. In the course of their conversation, which ranged over various topics, the two women discussed the recent events surrounding the Union's organizing drive. Weiler expressed her opinion that the timing of the campaign was unfortunate, since Leo Katz had recently died and Arthur's wife was ill and hospitalized. Weiler also commented that a previous attempt to organize had been unsuccessful and that she thought the present one would also fail. Weiler then asked Anderson whether a majority of the employees were supporting the Union and whether she had signed a Union authorization card. Anderson answered "yes" to both inquiries and then asked that the subject be dropped. Weiler immediately honored that request.

On Saturday, October 28, Weiler telephoned Anderson and another employee, Nancy Green, and in the course of her discussion with each, the subject of working conditions came up. Weiler informed both women that Katz would hold a meeting with all the employees and that he would announce a new pay and benefit package. Weiler claimed that the package would include wages comparable to those paid at a larger food processing plant nearby, a hospitalization plan, and a profit-sharing plan.

Katz did, indeed, hold a meeting with all K & K employees on October 30, 1978, at which he discussed hospitalization insurance and profit-sharing. He indicated that he had considered these items as potential employee benefits and that he had taken steps to obtain further information relating to them. Also at this meeting, Katz made several statements to the employees expressing his interest in their concerns and his desire that those concerns be made known to him.

On the evening of October 30, the employees met with George Nestler to discuss Katz' remarks earlier that day. It was decided that Katz was not to be believed and that the employees would strike. Nestler then filed unfair labor practice charges against K & K, alleging various violations of section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as well as a refusal to bargain in violation of section 8(a)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1 & (5).

A hearing was held before an Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") who, in a decision issued May 29, 1979, found four unfair labor practices on the part of K & K. First, the ALJ found that Ann Anderson was coercively interrogated by Barbara Weiler during their conversation at the coffee shop on October 24. Second, the ALJ found that, during the same conversation, Weiler had threatened Anderson by indicating that her Union activities would be futile. Third, he determined that Weiler, during her telephone conversations with Anderson and Nancy Green on October 28, had unlawfully promised a grant of benefits if the Union were defeated. Finally, the ALJ found that Arthur Katz promised benefits in the form of hospitalization and profit-sharing in exchange for the Union's defeat at his meeting with the employees on October 30. The ALJ specifically recommended dismissal of that portion of the complaint alleging that Katz had solicited employee grievances and expressly or impliedly promised to remedy them. Finally, the ALJ concluded that a bargaining order was not warranted and recommended that K & K be ordered to cease and desist from further violations of the Act and to post appropriate notices.

The Board, reviewing the parties' exceptions to the ALJ's decision, adopted that decision except as it dealt with issues of solicitation of grievances and the need for a bargaining order. The Board concluded that the evidence established that Katz had, in fact, solicited grievances at his October 30 meeting with the employees and "in so doing impliedly promised to remedy them." 245 N.L.R.B. No. 173, slip op. at 3. The Board also found that the Company's purpose underlying its unlawful acts was "to impress upon the employees the fact that they did not need a union to obtain satisfaction of their demands." Id. at 5. The Board therefore ordered the Company to cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practices, including the refusal to bargain collectively with the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, Food Employees Union Local 590. Affirmatively, the Board ordered the Company to bargain upon request with such union as the exclusive representative of all its employees in the appropriate unit and to post appropriate notices. It is that order which is presently before us for enforcement.

II.

In viewing the Board's findings of fact, we are limited by statute to a determination whether they are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1950). As to the Board's choice of remedy, we are admonished that "[t]he Board's power is a broad discretionary one, subject to limited judicial review." Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964), citing NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953). The Board's choice of remedy "must * * * be given special respect by reviewing courts." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939 n.32, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

These, then, are the parameters of our scrutiny in this case. They do not, however, render us, as judges, "automata." See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 489, 71 S.Ct. 456, 465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). Courts are still charged with responsibility for seeing that national labor policies are carried out. As the Supreme Court explained in Universal Camera, "Congress has imposed on [courts] responsibility for assuring that the Board keeps within reasonable grounds." 340 U.S. at 490, 71 S.Ct. at 465. It is in the exercise of that responsibility that we proceed to examine the decision of the Board on the record before us.

III.

Of the five unfair labor practices found to have been committed by K & K, two occurred while Barbara Weiler and her personal friend and commuting partner, Ann Anderson, were having coffee after work on October 24. The ALJ heard testimony from both women concerning the content of their conversation in the coffee shop. On direct examination, Anderson summarized the conversation thus:

> Well, on the way home that night [October 24], we stopped for coffee, and she said she knew that I had to know what was going on, and I said I did, and she says, well she was sorry to see that happen, because of all Art's troubles, which was true, and I said I did know, and she says, well, it would never go through, because thay had tried it before, and that it had been blocked, and that it would be blocked again, and she asked me how many girls worked there, and did we have a majority, and I said we did, and she asked me if I had signed a card, and I said yes, I had signed a card, and I told her not to ask me no more questions, and not to tell me nothing.

Except for a later concession that Weiler identified Leo Katz as the one who "blocked" the Union in the past, and that he was dead at the time of this conversation, Anderson gave no other testimony on the content of the conversation in the restaurant. Anderson's version of the conversation was generally corroborated by Weiler, who was found by the ALJ "to be a generally credible witness."

The Board adopted the ALJ's finding that Weiler's statement to the effect that "the Union was blocked before and would be blocked again" constituted a threat that Anderson's organizing activities would be futile. Neither the ALJ nor the Board supplied any reasoning in support of the conclusion that such conduct constitutes an unfair labor practice or that it was anything more than a permissible expression of opinion. In its brief to this court, however, the General Counsel relies on two fifth circuit cases in support of the Board's finding that a violation occurred. NLRB v. Henriksen, Inc., 481 F.2d 1156 (5th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Varo, Inc., 425 F.2d 293 (5th Cir. 1970). both of these cases, however, dealt with employers who had made threats as to what they would do if the Union were successful. In Henriksen, for example, the Company president stood before the employees and stated that she would bargain with the union in the same way she bargained with her suppliers—that is, in a very "hardnosed" fashion. 481 F.2d at 1160 n.4. The Board found that the employer had misrepresented, through use of her analogy, her obligation to bargain in good faith with the Union, should it be selected. In Varo, a Company foreman told an employee that the Union "would never get a contract." 425 F.2d at 299. The distinction to be drawn, of course, is that in this case, Weiler was speaking about the unlikelihood that the Union would be successful. This could only have been a matter of opinion because the employer in no real way controlled the results of the organizing campaign. In cases such as Henriksen and Varo, on the other hand, the employer was threatening to be obstructionistic in a matter which does, in fact, require his cooperation and in which a degree of his cooperation is demanded by law. See also NLRB v. Hedstrom, 629 F.2d 305, 308 (3d Cir. 1980) (en banc) (Hedstrom II) (employer "would never sign a contract with Union"); NLRB v. Sky Wolf Sales, 470 F.2d 827, 831 (9th Cir. 1972) (employer "would not sign a contract with the Union"); NLRB v. Louisiana Manufacturing Co., 374 F.2d 696, 701–02 (8th Cir. 1967) (employer "had no intention of signing a contract with a Union"). The most that may be said of Weiler's comments is that she raised the not unexpected likelihood that the employer, exercising its lawful rights, would oppose the Union's drive and that she believed the Company would prevail.

The theory advanced by the Board in this case bears a remarkable similarity to the theory rejected by this court in NLRB v. Gentithes, 463 F.2d 557 (3d Cir. 1972). In Gentithes, the Board contended that various remarks by an employer to the effect that he opposed unionization "were designed to demonstrate to the employees the futility of any attempt seeking to establish a bargaining representative." 463 F.2d at 560. Chief Judge Seitz, speaking for a unanimous panel, held that "no interpretation of the limited number of such remarks appearing in the record suggests a coercive attempt by the Company to impose upon its employees its own aversion to unionization * * *. Absent a coercive character the statements cannot be considered violative of § 8(a)(1) of the Act." Id. In this case, the Board has wholly failed to articulate facts that substantiate the "coercive character" of Weiler's appraisal of the Union's propects. Thus, the remarks fall within the protective cloak of section 8(c), which operates to ensure an effective exchange of information from both union and management in the sphere of labor relations. NLRB v. Lenkurt Electric co., 438 F.2d 1102, 1108 (9th Cir. 1971). See also Old Dominion Branch No. 496, National Association of Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 94 S.Ct. 2770, 41 L.Ed.2d 745 (1974). Therefore, we reject the Board's conclusion that Weiler's comments to Anderson that the Union would be blocked constituted a violation of section 8(a)(1) as neither supported by law nor by substantial evidence.

The second violation found to have occurred during the October 24 conversation was Weiler's interrogation of Anderson regarding her personal position on unionization. The record leaves no doubt that Weiler did question Anderson concerning the Union's majority status and whether she had signed a Union authorization card. However, section 8(a)(1) does not proscribe all inquiries into employees' union sympathies, it is only "when doing so suggests to the employees that the employer may retaliate because of those sympathies" that a violation occurs. Hedstrom II, 629 F.2d at 314 (footnote omitted). But the fear of retaliation need not actually appear, the test is whether "'under the circumstances existing, [the employer's conduct] may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act.'" Id., quoting NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d 239, 242 (3d Cir. 1976). Thus, we are not swayed by the General Counsel's argument that Anderson's request that the subject be dropped indicated "that she saw her personal friendship with Weiler as providing no reason for ignoring the inherently coercive nature of the comments and questions being advanced." Nor do we consider in this inquiry Weiler's testimony that Anderson expressed her feeling that the Union drive and the apparent conflict of feelings would not "ruin [their] friendship." The subjective response of the employee is not controlling. See Local 542, International Union of Operating Engineers v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 850, 852 (3d Cir. 1964).

The objective nature of the inquiry is, however, limited by the specific circumstances in which the interrogation takes place. The Union had already informed the Company that it represented a majority of the employees. Weiler's question was put to a self-described "good friend" with whom she not only regularly rode to work but also engaged in social and recreational activity. Weiler and Anderson shared the ownership of a boat. It was not uncommon for the two women to stop at the restaurant on their way home, nor was it unusual that they should talk about work. Anderson's testimony also shows that the Weilers and the Andersons were social companions, and it was common for them to have dinner together. It also appears that Anderson was comfortable with her friend's position in the company; so comfortable, in fact, that in Anderson's company Weiler endured some dinnertime "teasing" about not walking the picket line when the employees finally went out on strike. Under these circumstances, we fail to discern the coercive element that would transform Weiler's inquiries into unlawful interrogation.

The Board also adopted the ALJ's findings that both Weiler and Arthur Katz violated section 8(a)(1) by promising grants of benefits to employees in exchange for defeat of the Union. K & K challenges this finding on the ground that both Weiler, in her phone conversations with Anderson and Green on October 28, and Katz, in his meeting with employees on October 30, emphasized that they were legally unable to promise benefits in exchange for Union opposition and that they were not so doing. The General Counsel argues that this recitation of legal inability was a kind of a "nod and a wink" and will not insulate the Company from its clearly illegal attempts to trade benefits for the Union's defeat. See, e.g., Michigan Products, Inc., 236 N.L.R.B. 1143 (1978); Montgomery Ward & Co., 228 N.L.R.B. 750 (1977). See also NLRB v. Garry Manufacturing Co., 630 F.2d 934, 942 (3d Cir. 1980).

We conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's findings with respect to both of these violations. In Weiler's telephone conversation with both Anderson and Green on October 30, she initiated a discussion of possible improvements that might occur in their employment situation, specifically mentioning a pay increase, hospitalization benefits and a profit-sharing plan. The conversation appears to have been substantially identical with both women, and it could reasonably be concluded by the listener that she was conveying the Company's proposed bargain to settle the existing "problem" in a manner that would benefit everyone concerned. This is clearly illegal. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 84 S.Ct. 457, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964). For his part, Katz not only described what he had been contemplating in the way of employee benefits, he held those benefits out to the employees with the implied promise that they would be instituted if K & K remained a union-free enterprise. We agree with the Board that employer discussions of potential benefits during a union organizing campaign creates an inference that the benefits do not come without strings attached. That inference becomes more perceptible where, as here, the discussion does not come during a regularly convened meeting of management and labor and when the proposed benefits are different not only in degree but in kind from those presently enjoyed by the employees.

The final unfair labor practice found by the Board was Katz' solicitation of employee grievances coupled with an implied promise to remedy them. This finding of the Board is directly contrary to an express finding of the ALJ. Although this circumstance does not enlarge our scope of review, the ALJ's finding is a portion of the record in this case and must be considered when making a determination whether the Board finding is supported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 493–94, 71 S.Ct. 456, 467, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); Frattaroli v. NLRB, 590 F.2d 15 (1st Cir. 1978).

We begin our discussion of this aspect of the case by noting that a solicitation of grievances is not an unusual occurrence during a union organizing drive. "[A]n organizational drive often comes as a rude shock to an employer, and a simple offer to hear any complaints the employees may have, or to set up machinery to that end, is a natural and non-coercive response." NLRB v. Rollins Telecasting, Inc., 494 F.2d 80, 83 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 964, 95 S.Ct. 224, 42 L.Ed.2d 178 (1974), quoted with approval in NLRB v. Eagle Material Handling, Inc., 558 F.2d 160 (3d Cir. 1977). For this reason, a "solicitation of grievances is not in and of itself an unfair labor practice." Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 558 F.2d 1137, 1142 n.12 (3d Cir. 1977) (Hedstrom I). "To listen to suggestions does not in and of itself imply that the suggestion will be acted on * * * ." Visador Co., 245 N.L.R.B. No. 71, slip op. at 3 (Sept. 27, 1979).

The Board relied on the testimony of three witnesses, as well as several bits of Katz' own testimony, in finding the solicitation and promise in the instant case. Those witnesses testified that Katz had said he "hoped" to settle disputes and that employees should "try" to resolve their differences with him directly. Such expressions, however, are no more than are reasonably inferred from any solicita- tion of grievances. Indeed, Katz' remarks are less promissory than those of the employer in Visador, a case decided just on day after the case at bar, in which the Board declined to find an implied promise to remedy grievances. In Visador, the employer stood before the employees and announced: "Whatever problems we've got, we don't need a union to solve them. If you work with me I promise to be fair and to listen to suggestions for improving our plant." 245 N.L.R.B No. 71, slip op. at 3.

A solicitation of grievances becomes an unfair labor practice only when it is accompanied by either an implied or express promise that the grievances will be remedied. Hedstrom II, 629 F.2d at 314. This type of conduct is coerive because it lulls employees into believing that they can obtain the benefits being promised by the union without the union's aid. Tower Enterprises, Inc., d/b/a Tower Records, 182 N.L.R.B. 382, 387 (1970). However, that policy demands that an actual promise to remedy be found. In the case at bar, we can find only a willingess to listen and to consider. That is not sufficient to constitute a section 8(a)(1) violation.

This record will not support a finding that Katz made specific promises to remedy grievances, for it does not appear that any complaints were actually tendered. We do not believe that a general, implied promise that complanits will be considered is sufficient to support a finding of a section 8(a)(1) violation. In every case to which this court is cited in support of the Board's finding in this case, the solicitation of grievances was effective and the employer was found to have responded with a promise. See NLRB v. Eagle Material Handing, Inc., 558 F.2d 160, 162, (3rd Cir. 1977) (employer responded to worker complaints about pay by promising package that would be "Cadillac of the industry"); Landis Tool Co., Division of Litton Industries, v. NLRB, 460 F.2d 23, 24 (3d Cir. 1972) (employees complained to employer who claimed they "could of [sic] worked this all out "without a union); Reliance Electric, Madison Plant Mechanical Drivers Division, 191 N.L.R.B. 44 (1971), enforced, 457 F.2d 503 (6th Cir. 1972) (series of 10–15 meetings of employees with management officials at which "gripes" were aired.). See also Hedstrom II, 629 F.2d at 314 (employer "promised that [subject matter of grievance] would 'be handled differently' by the company's new personnel.' "). Thus, we do not find the Board's conclusion on this matter to be supported by substantial evidence. We agree with the ALJ that "[Katz] told [the employees] he hoped they could resolve their problems together. But such does not amount to unlawful solicitation of greivances."

For the reasons stated above, we conclude that only the Board's findings with respect to promised grants of benefits are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. It remains to determine whether these two violations justify the Board's issuance of a bargaining order in theis case and our enforcement of it.

IV.

All modern-day bargaining orders trace their roots to the landmark case of NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), in which the Supreme Court laid down the ground rules under which the Board could force employers to bargain with unions that had not won representation election. Gissel treated three types of situtations: (1) " 'exceptional' case marked by 'outrageous' and 'pervasive' unfair labor practices"; (2) "less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes"; and (3) "minor or less extensive unfair labor practices which [have only a] minimal impact on the election machinery." 395 U.S. at 613–15, 89 S.Ct. at 1939–1940. In the first situation, the Board is authorized to issue a so-called Gissel I order, which orders recognition and bargaining with a union although it has never demonstrated majority strength through authorization cards of otherwise. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 1054 (1980). In the second situation, the Board may issue a Gissel II order, requiring the employer to bargain with a union that has demonstrated majority strength prior to the commission of the unfair labor practices the order is meant to remedy. Rapid Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 144, 148 (3d Cir. 1979). It is clear that it is a Gissel II order that we are asked to enforce in this case.

The subject of Gissel II remedies was recently discussed by this court in Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305 (3d Cir. 1980) (en banc).[3] In Hedstrom the Board found that the employer had committed in excess of 40 unfair labor practices, that it had "unlawfully interrogated employees, solicited employee grievances, promised and granted benefits to employees, and threatened employees with discharge, plant closure, reduced benefits, and more onerous work rules." Id. at 307. The Board's order was enforced because the case had "all of the elements that * * * are common to those cases in which we have enforced orders to bargain." Id. at 312. We also noted that the Company had committed additional violations since we had heard an earlier appeal and that the order was especially appropriate in light of the employer's history of union opposition, demonstrating a propensity to commit unlawful acts.

In NLRB v. Garry Manufacturing Co., 630 F.2d 934 (3d Cir. 1980), this court enforced another bargaining order issued by the Board. In Garry, the Board had found that the employer had committed serious unfair labor practices in distributing leaflets that tended to imply a loss of job security and plant closings if the union were elected. Also, the employer had: solicited and expressly promised to remedy employee grievances (to the extent that he had installed a bedside "hotline" when he was ill); removed currently utilized machinery from the plant in an effort to convince employees that he could, and would, move his operations elsewhere; promised employees wage increases if the union were defeated; discriminated against union supporters in disciplinary procedures; and obstructed the Board's investigation of the unfair labor practice charges. Finally, the employer scheduled a family outing for employees at an amusement park for the same day as the union's last organizational meeting before the election.

Obviously, the unfair labor practices in the instant case cannot compare with the numerous and grave violations found to have occurred in Hedstrom and Garry. Even were we to have upheld all the Board's findings, this case at its worst would bear only the resemblance to the other two that "slo-pitch" bears to "hardball." To state the lack of comparability between the cases, however, is to demonstrate that precedents are useful only as very rough guides; the determination is essentially one of fact. It is for this reason that we require the Board to specify the reasoning and findings underlying its issuance of a bargaining order. NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d 239, 244–45 (3d Cir. 1976). To discover whether the Board was reasonable in its evaluation of the facts of the case is the only task before us.

The ALJ termed the violations he found in this case "minimal." The Board disagreed, calling those acts "serious" and concluding that their occurrence "precludes the holding of a fair election." The Board appears to have grounded its decision that a bargaining order was necessary primarily on its findings that there had been promises of benefits in exchange for the union's defeat, findings which we have upheld. The Board quoted at length from a "promised benefits" case, Honolulu Sporting Goods Co., Ltd., a subsidiary of Zale Corp., 239 N.L.R.B. No. 173 (1979), which taught that "[a]n employer may have the right to persuade the employees that representation is not in their best interest, but it does not have the right to threaten them or confer benefits on them which are designed to influence the employees against choosing a representative. When, as here, an employer does so, free choice in a subsequent election becomes a matter of speculation.* * * ." Here, the Board also found that K & K's actions were "designed to impress upon the employees the fact that they did not need a union to obtain satisfaction of their demands." The employer's conduct, the Board found, was such as "to undermine the Union's majority status" and "a bargaining order [was] necessary and appropriate to protect the majority sentiment expressed through authorization cards." With these talismanic words, Gissel II was invoked and, in the Board's mind, satisfied.

The selection of an exclusive collective bargaining agent is not a game of chance but a matter of the highest importance to employees and employers alike. Legislation and experience indicate that an employee's statutory right to select an exclusive bargaining agent should be determined by democratic process in a free and open election. The Board's responsibility for holding such elections was not meant to be supplanted by the authority found to exist in Gissel. Only in exceptional circumstances, where it is obvious that the extensive machinery and power of the NLRB is inadequate to ensure a free election, should employees be denied their right to cast a secret ballot for or against an exclusive bargaining agent.[4] In this case, the Board indulges in the grossest kind of speculation to invoke Gissel II. The Supreme Court plainly stated that, before a Gissel II order should issue, the Board must make a determination that "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order." 395 U.S. at 614–15, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. This is a determination of actual fact on the evidence received in each case. No room is left for automatic formulae under which, for example, one threat, two coerced interrogations and a promise of a wage increase will result in an order while another combination will not. The bargaining order is an extraordinary remedy and, because it operates to disenfranchise the workers in the choice of their representative, it is appropriate only when the harmful effects of that disenfranchisement are outweighed by the positive advancement of the policies underlying federal labor law. We agree with the ALJ and do not believe the Board has struck the appropriate balance in this case.

The record demonstrates that K & K's employees were not much impressed by Arthur Katz' speech on October 30. At a meeting that night, they collectively decided that his representations were not to be believed. They struck. Such are not the actions of cowering and coerced workers. Since the only unfair labor practices which we find to have occurred were promises by Weiler and Katz that certain benefits would be granted in exchange for the Union's defeat, and the employees did not believe those promises, we fail to perceive why the effects of those practices cannot be "erased * * * by the use of traditional remedies." Indeed, it appears to us that the effects of the unfair labor practices were easily and speedily erased by the evening of October 30, without any remedial action by the Board. We conclude that there was no basis in fact for the Board's determination that the extreme remedy of a bargaining order was necessary under these circumstances.

[4] The dissent submits that against the concern for employers and employees subject to bargaining orders must be weighed "the strong federal policy in favor of the formation of collective bargaining relationships." (Dissenting op., p. 474.) On the contrary, we believe that the federal policy with respect to the formation of collective bargaining relationships is neutral. We view the trust of federal policy as the protection "of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively" when they are so inclined. See 29 U.S.C § 151 (1976). See also 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). Therefore, Congress in its declaration of national policy encouraging collective bargaining has also stated its policy in "protecting the exercise of workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing." 29 U.S.C. § 151. Freedom of association and free selection of a bargaining agent, however, may be substantially diminished by dependence on authorization cards.

Cards have inherent uncertainties and risks attached to them. Even when the language is clear and unambiguous, the union solicitor may inform the signer that the card will be used only to obtain an election or merely to show interest in an election and that the language above the signature should be disregarded. NLRB v. Boyer Bros., Inc., 448 F.2d 555 (3d Cir. 1971). It may be accompanied by representations that it is not a final designation until there is an election. See Amalgamated Clothing Workers v. NLRB, 365 F.2d 898, 906–08 (D.C. Cir.1966). There may also be misrepresentations, e.g., that a majority of the employees have signed authorization cards when in fact they have not. See NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 277, 94 S.Ct. 495, 498, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973). The solicitations may also be attended by coercion or threats of reprisals and the employee's signature may not be the free and informed decision made in the privacy of a voting booth. See Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 436 F.2d 520, 524 (7th Cir. 1971). The Court in Gissel recognized that cards are "admittedly inferior to the election process," although they may perhaps be the only way of assuring employee choice when the employer engages in conduct disruptive of the election process. 395 U.S. at 602–03, 89 S.Ct. at 1934. As we note in the text, there is nothing in the record here to indicate that the Board could not conduct a fair election at the K & K plant.

The Board's application for enforcement of its order requiring (a) K & K to cease and desist from promising employees benefits to discourage them from engaging in activities on behalf of the Union or any other labor organization; (b) that the Company refrain from in any like or related manner interfering with or restraining employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by section 7 of the Act; and (c) that the Company post appropriate notices, will be enforced. In all other respects, emforcement of the order will be denied.

Each side to bear its own costs.

Gibbons, Circuit Judge, dissenting: It is no secret that at least a significant minority of the members of this court believe that the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), erred in interpreting the National Labor Relations Act to permit the National Labor Relations Board to enter a bargaining order as a remedy for unfair labor practices committed in the course of an organization campaign. Nor is it any secret that those judges who are uncomfortable with the Gissel construction of the statute have been signalling the Board vigorously that bargaining orders are unwelcome in this circuit. See, e.g., NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1976); Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, (Hedstrom I); 558 F.2d 1137, 1148 (3d Cir. 1977) (Hedstrom I); NLRB v. Craw, 565 F.2d 1267 (3d Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Garry Mfg. Co., 630 F.2d 934, 946 (3d Cir. 1980) (Weis, J., dissenting); Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305, 319 (3d Cir. 1980) (en banc) (Rosenn, J., dissenting); NLRB v. Permanent Label Corp., No. 80-1617 (3d Cir., filed Jan. 8, 1981). At the same time the Board is receiving from a different group of judges on this court a quite different signal. See, e.g., NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d at 246 (Gibbons, J., dissenting); Kenworth Trucks of Philadelphia v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 55 (3d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Daybreak Lodge Nursing and Convalescent Home, 585 F.2d 79 (3d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Garry Mfg. Co., 630 F.2d 934 (opinion of the court); Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305 (opinion of the court); NLRB v. Permanent Label Corp., No. 80-1617, slip op. at 28 (Seitz, C.J., dissenting). Those different signals are that we acknowledge the primacy of the Supreme Court in interpreting the Act, at least until Congress speaks, that we acknowledge the primacy of the Board's role as a fact finder, and that if the Board decides to enter a Gissel order we will be satisfied with a statement of reasons reasonably identifying for us the basis, among several permissible bases, for choosing that remedy.

Until this case the guerilla warfare against Gissel orders has been carried out by insisting that the Board's opinion writing is so opaque that we cannot understand it, and remanding. See NLRB v. Permanent Label Corp., No. 80-1617, slip op. at 28 (Seitz, C.J., dissenting). With the present majority a new weapon is resorted to. The majority simply substitutes its fact finding for that of the Board. Perhaps the new tactic reflects a conclusion that finally the Board has devised a formula for stating its reasons satisfactorily. I hope so. The Board's statement follows:

> Respondent's unfair labor practices are serious in nature, and began on the day the Union demanded recognition. Its entire course of conduct, which included a promise of a wage increase, promises of better benefits, and solicitation of and a promise to remedy grievances, was designed to impress upon the employees the fact that they did not need a union to obtain satisfaction of their demands.[5]
> Under the principles set forth in N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Company, Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), a bargaining order is appropriate where a union's majority is established by cards and the nature and extent of the employer's unfair labor practices render unlikely a free choice by the employees in our election. As previously set forth, Respondent's unfair labor practices were clearly designed to undermine the Union's majority status. Here, the promises of a wage increase, increased benefits, and new approaches to resolve employee grievances, coupled with the threat that the organizational campaign would be futile, result in giving the employees much if not all of what they were seeking through union representation.

> In Honolulu Sporting Goods Co., Ltd. a subsidiary of Zale Corporation, 239 NLRB No. 173 (1979), the Board quoted with approval the following statement from Tower Enterprises, Inc., d/b/a Tower Records, 182 NLRB 382, 387 (1970), which is directly applicable:
>> It is difficult to conceive of conduct more likely to convince employees that with an important part of what they were seeking in hand union representation might no longer be needed. An employer may have the right to persuade the employees that representation is not in their best interests, but it does not have the right to threaten them or confer benefits on them which are designed to influence the employees against choosing a representative. When, as here, an employer does so, free choice in a subsequent election becomes a matter of speculation, so long as the effects of the interference remain unremedied.
> Accordingly, we find that a bargaining order is necessary and appropriate to protect the majority sentiment expressed through authorization cards and otherwise to remedy the violations committed.[6]

For me this statement of reasons is adequate.

Turning to the factual bases for the Board's findings of unfair labor practices, I can do no better than to quote them:

> We agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of Act by interrogating an employee concerning employee interest in and activity on behalf of the Union, promising employees a wage increase and health insurance and profit-sharing benefits to discourage their interest in or activity on behalf of the Union, and threatening an employee that the employees' activity on behalf of the Union would be futile.[3]
> [3] The Administrative Law Judge further found that Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by changing its method of calculating gross pay for income and social security tax purposes or by assignments of allegedly more arduous work. No exceptions were taken to these findings.
> The Administrative Law Judge recommended dismissal of the complaint allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when President Katz, in a meeting with the employees the week following the Union's demand for recognition, solicited and impliedly promised to remedy employee grievances. We find merit to the General Counsel's exception to this recommendation.
> In concluding that there was no solicitation of grievances, the Administrative Law Judge apparently ignored the uncontroverted testimony of three employees, Ann Anderson, Nancy Green, and Evelyn Wirhgt [sic], that Katz stated at the meeting that he wanted the employees to bring their problems to him. Thus, Anderson testified that "Katz said he hoped to settle our disputes among ourselves" and "to try to resolve our problems with him to come to him and get this settled that way." Similarly, Green testified that "Katz said he didn't realize all our problems we had, or were having, and he felt we could handle this problem between us," and Wright testified that "Katz said he hoped he could work with us better in the future, and he told us that he hoped he could settle things, without an outside organization." Indeed, Katz testified himself, on direct examination, that he said that he wanted the employees to deal directly with him and "I also told them that in the past, I probably haven't heard them out * * *. I mean just haven't been around enough to hear what's happened, or what should be happening." On cross-examination, he admitted that he told the employees that they could work out their problems better without a third party and that they should bring their problems to him so that they could try to do so.
> The Administrative Law Judge did not make any factual findings based on the testimony of these witnesses as to this issue, but the testimony of all four is consistent and mutually corroborative. In addition, Katz' concession that he told the employees to bring their problems to him is clearly an admission against interest. Based on this testimony,[4] we find that Katz solicited employee grievances and in so doing impliedly promised to remedy them. Reliance Electric Company, Madison Plant Mechanical Drives Division, 191 NLRB 44, 46 (1971).
> [4] It is well settled that the Board has the power to make findings of fact based on the uncontradicted testimony of witnesses whose testimony has been neither credited nor discredited by an administrative law judge. See Retail Clerks International Association, AFL–CIO, Local 219 (National Food Stores, Inc.), 134 NLRB 1680, 1683 (1961).

In making this finding, and in adopting the Administrative Law Judge's findings that Katz and Supervisor Barbara Weiler unlawfully promised employees improved benefits to dissuade them from their union activity, we find no merit to Respondent's contention that Weiler and Katz rebutted any inference of promises by stating in their conversations with employees that they could not make such promises. The Administrative Law Judge made no finding regarding Weiler's testimony that she stated in her telephone calls to two employees, in which 473 she was found to have made promises of increased wages and improved benefits, that Katz could make no promises. Nor did the Administrative Law Judge make any finding either on Katz' testimony on direct examination that during his October 30 speech to the employees he had told the employees he could make no promises, or on Katz' concession on cross-examination that he did not explain to the employees his instructions from his attorney not to make promises. We find it irrelevant in the circumstances of this case whether Weiler or Katz denied the ability to make promises, for as stated in Michigan Products, Inc, 236 NLRB No. 147, ALJD, sl. op., p. 6 (1978): "It is immaterial that an employer professes that he cannot make any promises, if in fact he expressly or impliedly indicates that specific benefits will be granted." See also Montgomery Ward & Co., Incorporated, 228 NLRB 750, 757 (1977).

Thus, we have found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by interrogating employees concerning union activities; threatening employees that the Union's organizational campaign would be futile; promising to increase wages and benefits; and soliciting employee grievances. However, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, we find that Respondent's unlawful conduct precludes the holding of a fair election, and warrants the issuance of a bargaining order.

The Union demanded recognition on October 24, 1978. That afternoon, Respondent interrogated a union proponent, and threatened that the organizational campaign would be blocked. True to its word, Respondent announced several days later that it would grant the employees a substantial wage increase. Then, on October 30, Respondent announced that it had been considering a medical insurance plan and a profit-sharing plan. Furthermore, during the October 30 meeting, Respondent's president told the employees that he hoped to settle the problems "without an outside organization." As previously set forth, we find that, by this latter conduct, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by soliciting and impliedly promising to remedy employee grievances.

A comparison of the well written majority opinion with that of the Board discloses that the majority, looking at the same record evidence, has chosen to draw inferences from that evidence different from those the Board drew. Our scope of review under the National Labor Relations Act does not permit such action. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); Tri-State Truck Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 616 F.2d 65, 72 (3d Cir. 1980) (Gibbons, J., dissenting).

Conscientious Board members reading our opinions from Armcor Industries in 1976 to Permanent Label in 1981 must be puzzled about what they should attempt to do in a Gissel bargaining order case to satisfy us. The answer to their puzzlement, I fear, is that for the judges uncomfortable with the Gissel interpretation of the statute nothing the Board does will be likely to appear satisfactory. I do not mean to suggest that discomfort over Gissel orders is an unreasonable judicial posture. We are all well aware that in recent years labor unions have been winning far fewer contested elections than heretofore. A Gissel order insulates a union from the hazards of an election, and arguably tilts the scale too far in the union's favor. But the Supreme Court interpreted the Act in the Gissel cases to give the Board that authority, and Congress has not chosen to react. If I were a congressman requested to vote on overruling Gissel, I am not sure how I would vote. The opponents of Gissel orders point out that they tend to undermine secret balloting in the choice of bargaining representatives. On the other hand, the keystone in the arch of federal labor policy is collective bargaining, which cannot take place until a bargaining representative has been recognized A card majority is a legitimate means for such recognition. NLRB v. Atlas Lumber Company, 611 F.2d 26 (3d Cir. 1979); Eisenberg v. Hartz Mountain Corp., 519 F.2d 138, 143 (3d Cir. 1975); Suburban Transit Corp. v. NLRB, 499 F.2d 78, 82–83, 85–86 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1089, 95 S.Ct. 681, 42 L.Ed.2d 682 (1974); NLRB v. Air Master Corp., 339 F.2d 553, 556–57 (3d Cir. 1964). If on the basis of a card majority a collective bargaining agreement resulted, we would not be overly concerned about the undermining of secret balloting in the choice of bargaining representatives. Thus one has to take at somewhat less than face value the oft-repeated concern that Gissel orders are inimical to the interests of employees. The real concern is for employers, but against that concern must be weighed the strong federal policy in favor of the formation of collective bargaining relationships. See 29 U.S.C. § 151 (1976).[1] From that perspective Gissel orders do not look quite so threatening. In any event, it is not the role of an intermediate appellate court to substitute its balancing of the competing policies for that of the legislature, in the guise of requiring statements of reasons or of substituting its factual inferences for those made by the Board.

I would enforce the Board's order.

> Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

Amcar Division, ACF Industries Incorporated v. NLRB

641 F.2d 561 (8th Cir.), February 9, 1981—247 NLRB 1056

On petition to review Board Order

Before STEPHENSON and HENLEY, Circuit Judges, and HUNTER,* District Judge

STEPHENSON, Circuit Judge: Amcar Division ACF Industries, Inc. (Amcar) petitions for review of a final decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board.[1] The Board, in reversing the decision of the administrative law judge, found Amcar to have committed unfair labor practices under section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3). The NLRB has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order. The Board found that Amcar committed the unfair practice when it (1) warned employees that they would be charged with unexcused absences if they engaged in a "sympathy strike" by not crossing another union's picket line at the Amcar plant, and (2) subsequently used absences occurring during the period the picket line was maintained in disciplining employees. Because we conclude the Union[2] had waived its employees' right to engage in such a sympathy strike, we deny enforcement of the Board's order.

I. FACTS[3]

Amcar is engaged in the manufacture and sale of railroad freight cars and related products at its facility in St. Louis, Missouri. Two collective bargaining units exist at the Amcar plant, a large "production and maintenance" (P & M) unit consisting of approximately fourteen hundred (1400) employees, and a small maintenance electrician unit consisting of approximately thirty-five employees. The latter were represented by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 1, AFL-CIO (Local 1), while the P & M unit is represented by five jointly certified unions (Union).[4]

A. The 1978 Labor Dispute

On October 20, 1978, the maintenance-electrician employees represented by Local 1 established a picket line at the Amcar plant in support of its demands for a new collective bargaining agreement, the former agreement expiring at midnight on October 19, 1978. The picket line was maintained from October 20, 1978 through November 14, 1978.

On October 19, 1978, in anticipation of the strike and picket line by Local 1, Robert Allen, Amcar Director of Labor Relations, proposed to James Johnson, the business agent for the Carmen and the Union's chief negotiator for the 1978 contract negotiations, that Amcar and the Union give the following as a joint notice to the plant P & M unit employees:

> NOTICE
> TO: ALL ST. LOUIS PLANT EMPLOYEES
> The collective bargaining unit agreement between the Company and the I.B.E.W. covering the maintenance electricians terminates tonight at twelve midnight. At this time a new agreement has not yet been reached. The parties are still meeting. However, if an agreement is not reached the I.B.E.W. may post pickets at the plant after twelve midnight tonight.
> Nevertheless all employees other than those maintenance electricians affected are expected to report to their jobs as scheduled. All other employees have an agreement in effect which contains a no-strike clause. Any employee who refuses to report to his job may be considered to be in violation of the no-strike clause and will be counted as absent.

What followed is largely undisputed and well-summarized in the findings of the administrative law judge:

> Johnson said that he agreed that the production and maintenance employees should cross the picket line, but that he would not sign the notice unless he heard from the Union's counsel, although he (Johnson) thought the notice was accurate. Allen then took it upon himself to contact the Union's counsel who stated that he also thought that the production and maintenance employees should cross the picket line, but that he would not advise the Union either way on whether they should sign the notice. Allen next tried to contact Johnson again, but was unable to do so before the end of the first shift at the plant, i.e., the latest time by which notice could be given to the first shift employees prior to the strike. The Company then proceeded to unilaterally distribute the above notice to all of the plant employees, over the signature of plant manager W.D. Harrison. The next day, i.e. the first day of the strike, Allen sent a telegram to the Union in which he protested that the maintenance electrician employees were engaging in mass picketing which prevented some other employees from reporting to work. Allen restated the Company's position that the no-strike clause of their contract precluded the production and maintenance unit employees from honoring the picket line, and he demanded that the Union "take any and all steps reasonable and necessary to insure that the employees of the Company represented by said jointly certified unions report for and perform work at the Company's premises, and that said Article VIII not be violated." That same day (October 20) business agent Johnson told Allen that as far as he was concerned, the employees should cross the picket line.

None of the employees informed Amcar that they would be absent during the period because of the picketing, nor did they offer this as an excuse upon returning. Amcar stipulated that had such an excuse been offered it would have been rejected. It was stipulated that four employees have been discharged and twenty employees have been suspended for absenteeism, with one or more of the absences occurring during the period from October 20, 1978 to November 14, 1978. There were also others absent during that time who could be disciplined for absenteeism based in part on the absences during this period.

B. The Collective Bargaining History

Amcar and the Union have been parties to a series of collective bargaining contracts effective from 1969 to 1972, 1972 to 1975, 1975 to 1978, and the current contract executed in 1978, which was in effect at the time of the strike by Local 1. Since 1969, every collective bargaining agreement between Amcar and the Union has contained the following "no-strike" clause: "During the term of this Agreement there shall be no lock-out, strike, stoppage of work or slow down." Each contract has also contained a grievance procedure and binding arbitration for grievances. The 1978 contract, in effect at the time of the strike by Local 1, defined "grievance" as "any dispute or difference between the employees and the Company involving the meaning or application of the terms of this Agreement."

The collective bargaining history is explained by the detailed joint stipulation filed by the parties before the Board. We set out its discussion of this history in full:

"14. Following the negotiation of the 1969–1972 contract, picket lines were set up by IBEW Local 1 representing and on behalf of employees other than maintenance electrician employees and by Firemen and Oilers Local 6. These picket lines were set up by IBEW Local 1 and Firemen Local 6 in support of the contract demands of those unions. Employees of Respondent represented by the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, Boilermakers Local 1012 and District No. 9, International Association of Machinists refused to cross the picket lines of IBEW Local 1 and Firemen Local 6 and report to work. By agreement dated June 18, 1969, with all of the unions * * * except Firemen Local 6, those unions agreed to direct the employees represented by them to cross the picket line of any union picketing the plant premises on or about June 19, 1969, and so directed those employees during the period June 19 to June 24, 1969, while there remained at the plant of Respondent the picket line established and maintained by Firemen and Oilers Local 6. On June 24, 1969, the picket line established and maintained by Firemen and Oilers Local 6 was taken down.

"The picket line set up by IBEW Local 1 and that set up by Firemen and Oilers Local 6 in 1969 were set up notwithstanding Respondent's position that a collective bargaining agreement had been entered into by the certified joint bargaining representative consisting of the five unions * * *. The picket lines of both unions were taken down with the agreement and understanding that as a matter of law and contract the said 5 unions comprise a single bargaining unit of production and maintenance employees (excluding maintenance electrician employees) for purposes of collective bargaining.

"15. In the contract negotiations for the 1972 agreement, the collective bargaining representative * * * presented two composite proposals on behalf of all 5 unions. The first such proposal, dated March 14, 1972, requested that the no-strike provision (Article VIII) be changed to provide that there would be no-strike 'until a grievance has been processed through the third written step' and, further, that the no-strike clause would not apply in the event of certain safety disputes. The second composite proposal, submitted to Respondent on March 27, 1972, repeated the foregoing sought for changes in the no-strike clause and further requested the addition of the following new article, to be numbered Article XXXIII:

> In the event that any Union having an Agreement with the Company shall establish a picket line with the authorization of the International of the Union legally representing the picketing employees, the employees of any other Union having an Agreement with the Company may refuse to cross said picket line without violating this Agreement.

"During the 1972 negotiations the Respondent asked the position of the joint representative with respect to the meaning and effect of the proposed new Article XXXIII. It was the position of the joint representative and each of the 5 unions making it up that should any of the 5 unions or any other union set up a picket line at Respondent's plant then employees represented by the 5 unions would be free to respect those picket lines and not come to work, notwithstanding the existence of a contract. It was the Respondent's position that this question of respecting a picket line notwithstanding the existence of a contract had been settled in the way described in paragraph 14 in 1969. The joint representative and respresentatives of the 5 unions composing it stated that the 1969 agreement was only good for 1969 and it was their position that their members had the right to respect the picket line of any union, regardless of a contract between the Respondent and the joint representative. On April 28, 1972, Respondent discontinued negotiations with the joint representative and refused to bargain further with the joint representative for the stated reason provided to the joint representative that the positions taken with respect to the picket line issue were contrary to the 1969 agreement. Unfair labor practice charges were filed by Respondent against the joint representative with regard to this asserted refusal to honor the 1969 agreement and unfair labor practice charges were filed by the joint representative against Respondent for breaking off negotiations. In an agreement between Counsel for Respondent and the joint representative, both unfair labor practice charges were withdrawn and the negotiations resumed, resulting in the 1972–1975 contract previously described, without change in the no-strike clause or the addition of Article XXXIII.

"16. In the contract negotiations in 1975, the joint representative proposed union demands under date of March 4, 1975. Including, at page 81, the addition of a new Article XXXIV stating as follows: 'It shall not be a violation of the Agreement and it shall not be cause for discharge or disciplinary action in the event an employee refuses to go through or work behind a picket line at the Plant.' In the discussions concerning the above-quoted proposal, Respondent inquired about the meaning and effect of the proposal and was informed that it was specifically directed to the picket lines of other unions than those comprising the joint representative, whether representing employees of Respondent or other employees. The aforesaid proposed addition to the contract (Article XXXIV) was not included in the 1975–1978 agreement.

"17. The 1975–1978 agreement went into effect on September 22, 1975. On that same date, IBEW Local 1 established a picket line at Respondent's plant on behalf of maintenance electrican employees and directed to supporting IBEW Local 1's contract demands for an agreement covering maintenance electricians. Some employees of Respondent represented by the joint representative did not report for work as scheduled and, although urged to report for work by the joint representative, continued to remain away from work, until the issuance of a temporary restraining order and order to show cause at 5 p.m. on September 22, 1975 in Cause No. 75-842C(1)."

The above Order was premised in part upon a finding that, "[t]he strike activity and attendant work stoppage sought to be enjoined by the instant proceeding derives from grievances which all parties are contractually obligated to resolve in accordance with the grievance and arbitration procedure set out in the collective bargaining agreement between Plaintiff and Defendant Local Unions." ACF Industries, Inc. v. Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, Civ.No. 75-842C, slip op. at 2 (E.D.Mo. September 22, 1975). The parties were ordered to submit the matter to arbitration and the employees represented by the union thereupon returned to work. The parties reached a settlement that the complaint would be dismissed and the temporary restraining order dissolved and that there would be no concerted walk out by P&M employees with respect to the 1975 dispute between Amcar and Local 1. The Union waived its right to arbitrate the issue of honoring the Local 1 picket line, but the agreement provided, "[t]his waiver shall not apply to any future Labor dispute between Plaintiff and Defendants."[5]

The 1975 contract also included a new absentee and tardiness control program negotiated by Amcar and the Union in response to what both parties agreed was a serious attendance problem at the Amcar plant. Amcar was particularly concerned about high absenteeism on Fridays and Mondays. The Union favored a "mechanical" program which did not give Amcar discretion in excusing absences. This view prevailed. The agreement limited excused absences to funeral leave, jury service, service as a witness, or personal leave of absence with prior company approval. All other absences, without regard to reason, were classified as unexcused. Sinçe the implementation of the program, Amcar has not kept track of the reason for any absence.

[5] The settlement stated in pertinent part:

3. The parties hereto agree that there shall be no concerted walk out or any other concerted activities by the employees in the Plaintiff's production and maintenance bargaining unit pertaining to the current labor dispute between Plaintiff and the employees in the Local 1, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers electricians maintenance unit.

4. The Defendants herein waive their right to arbitrate the issue of their asserted right to honor the Local 1, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers picket line. This waiver shall not apply to any future labor dispute between Plaintiff and Defendant.

The 1975 agreement provided for a graduated series of discipline for those who violated the no absentee provision of the contract. Those employees incurring five or more unexcused absences would receive "counseling" (oral warnings). The next three unexcused absences could also result in warnings, with the fourth resulting in suspension or discharge. Because the Union felt the employees were not "getting the message," the 1978 negotiations resulted in the imposition of a temporary one-week suspension prior to discharge being added to the program.

In 1976, the Absence Control Program with Amcar was subject to a contractual arbitration proceeding when the Union grieved the discharge of an employee who had been discharged for alleged excessive absenteeism. The Union contended absences for legitimate illness or injury are "excused" under the contract, and therefore discharge was not warranted under the circumstances. The arbitrator found no absences were excused under the program except those enumerated and to rule otherwise would be to add terms to the contract, which he as the arbitrator was prohibited from doing. The arbitrator ruled the discharge was for a just and proper cause, and no appeal was taken. The arbitrator's decision thus became the law of the contract. Although there was considerable discussion in the 1975 negotiations concerning what an excused absence might be, there was no discussion with regard to absenteeism due to sympathy strikes.

II. ANALYSIS

At the threshold it should be noted that neither party challenges the ALJ's decision that deferral to arbitration and grievance procedures was inappropriate in the instant case.

Section 7 of the Act generally protects employees who engage in sympathy strikes in support of a lawful, primary strike by another union. See, e. g., W-I Canteen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 738, 743 (7th Cir. 1979), and cases cited therein. Section 8(a)(1) provides that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with section 7 rights. However, in the collective bargaining agreement, employees may waive their right to engage in sympathy strikes. NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., 345 U.S. 71, 80–81, 73 S.Ct. 519, 524–25, 97 L.Ed. 832 (1953); Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. General Teamster Local Union 326, 624 F.2d 1182, 1185 (3d Cir. 1980) Where there is not an express waiver of this right, the evidence of the wavier must be "clear and unmistakable." W-I Canteen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 606 F.2d at 743. See NLRB v. Gould, Inc., 638 F.2d 159 (10th Cir. 1980).[6]

In determining whether there has been a waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes, the collective bargaining agreement must be interpreted as a whole and in light of the law relating to it when made. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 279, 76 S.Ct. 349, 356, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956); Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. General Teamster Local Union 326, supra, 624 F.2d at 1184; W-I Canteen Service Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 606 F.2d at 745. The collective bargaining agreement in the instant case contains an express no-strike provision. There are a number of relevant facts to examine in determining whether the Union intended to waive its right to engage in sympathy strikes. We look to the language of the contract, the structure of the contract, the bargaining history, and any other relevant conduct of the parties that shows their understanding of the contract. Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. General Teamster Local Union 326, supra, 624 F.2d at 1185; Iowa Beef Processors, Inc. v. Amalgamated Meat Cutters, 597 F.2d 1138, 1144 (8th Cir. 1979), cert denied, 444 U.S. 840, 100 S.Ct. 79, 62 L.Ed.2d 52 (1980). See W-I Canteen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 606 F.2d at 745; NLRB v. Keller-Crescent Co., 538 F.2d 1291, 1296 (7th Cir. 1976), enf'g. 217 N.L.R.B. 685 (1975); Montana-Dakota Utilities Co. v. NLRB, 455 F.2d 1088, 1091–92 (8th Cir. 1972).

The contract's no-strike clause provides, "[d]uring the term of this Agreement there shall be no lock out, strike, stoppage of work or slow down." In our view, this is insufficient, in and of itself, to constitute a waiver of the right to engage in sympathy strikes. See Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 350 U.S. at 283–84, 76 S.Ct. at 358. However, a number of cases have interpreted general no-strike clauses to preclude sympathy strikes. See W–I Canteen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 606 F.2d at 745, and cases cited therein. The broad language of this no-strike clause, when examined in light of the bargaining history, the existence of the Absence Control Program, and the facts surrounding the parties' actions at issue here, indicate a clear waiver of the union's right to engage in a sympathy strike.

[6] The Board has followed this analysis in all its recent cases and it is our view that it is the proper approach. See, e. g., American Cyanamid Co., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 17, 102 LLRM 1443 (1979); Daniel Construction Co., 239 N.L.R.B. 1335 (1979); Local 18, Operating Engineers (Davis-McKee, Inc.), 238 N.L.R.B. A. Bargaining History of the No-Strike Clauses

The no-strike clause has remained unchanged since its adoption in 1969, despite attempts by the Union to amend it. The signing of that contract in 1969, was followed by picketing on behalf of two of the five amalgamated unions. The dispute was caused by the view of the striking unions that they were not part of the single bargaining unit. The dispute was settled by an agreement recognizing the five jointly certified unions as a single unit of production and maintenance employees and the Union directed its members to cross the picket line of any union picketing the Amcar plant on or about June 19, 1969.

During the 1972 negotiations, the Union indicated that its agreement in 1969 to cross picket lines was effective only from 1969 through 1972. In 1972, the Union then sought to include a provision in the agreement giving it the right to refuse to cross lawful picket lines, which would have included the right to take part in sympathy strikes. Negotiations were broken off by Amcar who filed unfair labor practice charges, and the Union then filed similar charges for breaking off negotiations. A settlement was reached omitting the disputed provision from the agreement and retaining the same no-strike provision. While sympathy strikes were not the focal point of the 1972 negotiations, the right to engage in such activity was included in the proposal submitted by the Union. Prior Supreme Court and Board decisions have stated that an attempt by the Union to add such a provision is significant in inferring that the Union was waiving its right to engage in sympathy strikes. NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., Inc., supra, 345 U.S. at 79–80, 73 S.Ct. at 524; The Hearst Corp., 161 N.L.R.B. 1405, 1416 (1966), enf'd sub. nom., News Union of Baltimore v. NLRB, 393 F.2d 673 (D.C. Cir. 1968). See Gary-Hobart Water Corp., 210 N.L.R.B. 742 (1974), enf'd, 511 F.2d 284 (7th Cir. 1975). cert denied, 423 U.S. 925, 96 S.Ct. 269, 46 L.Ed.2d 252 (1976) (Board applied same analysis when it was employer who had unsuccessfully sought to insert provisions regarding sympathy strikes into agreement).

The Board contends that the action by the Union in 1972 should not have the same effect as it did in Rockaway News and Hearst because the attempt to amend was not contemporaneous with the origin of the no-strike provision. It argues another possible inference is that the Union was attempting to get in express writing that which it felt the contract already provided. Additionally the Board relies on Local 18, Operating Engineers (Davis-McKee Inc.), 238 N.L.R.B. 652 (1978), and Keller-Crescent Co., 217 N.L.R.B. 685 (1975), for the proposition that the parties must discuss the issue of sympathy strikes before waiver can be found. In the instant case the parties were aware that the discussed proposal included sympathy strikes, although this was not the focus of the proposal.

The Board's interpretation becomes less tenable when considered in light of the negotiations for the 1975 contract. The Board's conclusion that "this was really the first direct proposal between the parties in the matter" is not correct. As previously stated, in 1972 the parties discussed the point that the deleted provision would have allowed the union to engage in strikes against any union, although sympathy strikes were not the central point to the negotiations. The Union's action in 1975—again making an express written proposal which would allow for sympathy strikes—together with the facts that the 1975 proposal was discussed by the parties, opposed by Amcar, and not included in the agreement, takes on added significance. It is much less likely the Union was still attempting to "clarify" the contract.

B. The 1975 Sympathy Strike

Other extrinsic evidence supports a conclusion that the Union waived its right to engage in sympathy strikes at the Amcar plant in the 1975 agreement. The P & M unit and Amcar reached agreement and their contract went into effect in September 1975. On the same date the agreement went into effect, Local 1 went on strike. These activities parallel the 1978 controversy. In 1975, some of the P & M unit employees respected the picket line, although urged to report by the Union's joint representative.

Amcar obtained a temporary restraining order, entered by the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri. The Order directed the P & M unit to return to work and required the matter to be set for arbitration. The parties reached an agreement and did not arbitrate the dispute. The agreement provided, in relevant part, that P & M unit employees waived "the right to arbitrate the issue of their asserted right to honor the Local 1 * * * picket line." It was expressly provided this waiver did not apply to any future labor disputes between Amcar and the Union.[7]

Amcar argues that this episode clearly demonstrates the Union's belief that it had waived the right to engage in sympathy strikes, otherwise the joint representative would never have urged the P & M unit employees to cross the Local 1 picket line. The Board stated that there might be "other reasonable explanations" for this action by the Union, that the Union "may have believed that the maintenance electricians were capable of obtaining their contract demands through ecomonic pressure without the need for additional assistance from other union employees." There is no support in the record for such speculation, and it is unlikely that thirty-five Local 1 employees would not need the support of the large P & M unit. See Acme Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 389 F.2d 104, 106 (8th Cir. 1968).[8]

C. The Absence Control Program

A clear indication that the Union had waived its right to engage in sympathy strikes is further evidenced by the presence of the Absence Control Program in the 1975 collective bargaining agreement. This is a mechanical program excusing absences in only four enumerated situations,[9] and making no reference to sympathy strikes or picket lines. The parties arbitrated the meaning of the program in 1976, and the arbitrator ruled that these four reasons were the only excuses provided for and any other excuses could be achieved only by amendment. The Union did not grieve the arbitrator's decision. In the 1978 negotiations, the Union did not attempt to include sympathy strikes as an exception to the "Absence Control Program," nor did they attempt to amend the no-strike clause in these negotiations to allow for sympathy strikes.

The Board argues the no-strike clause and the Absence Control Program were separately negotiated and the parties were not thinking of the issue of sympathy strikes when they negotiated the Absence Control Program and vice versa. In interpreting a collective bargaining agreement, however, we must construe the contract as a whole. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, supra, 350 U.S. at 279, 76 S.Ct at 356. While it is possible that the Union made no connection between the two issues, the joint representatives are experienced negotiators and the more reasonable inference is that made by the ALJ, who stated that "the absentee program, as incorporated into the contract is inconsistent with an interpretation that the production and maintenance employees were free to cross the Union's picket lines at the plant without being counted absent."

D. Action Surrounding the 1978 Strike

Finally, a clear and convincing waiver is evidenced by the parties' actions in response to the picket line set up by Local 1 in 1978. The chief negotiator for the joint representative, James Johnson, told the company the notice given by Amcar "was accurate." Counsel for the joint representative, Charles Werner, said that the P & M unit employees should cross the picket line. The notice stated, inter alia, "[a]ny employee who refuses to report to his job may be considered to be in violation of the no-strike clause and will be considered as absent."

[7] See note 5 and accompanying text supra. The Union's reservation of its right to arbitrate the agreement does not indicate that it believed it possessed the right to engage in sympathy strikes. The Union did not arbitrate at this time nor has it sought arbitration since. As noted by the ALJ, "if the Union adhered to the view that unit emmployees could honor maintenance electrician picket lines, then it is difficult to see why the Union would avoid the arbitration directed by the Court and choose instead to go through the same problem again at a future date."

[8] "The Board is entitled to draw reasonable infrences from the evidence but some substantial evidentiary basis must exist to support the inferences drawn. Inferences cannot be based purely on speculation." Acme Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 389 F.2d 104, 106 (8th Cir. 1968).

That court also made the following observation related to our standard of review. "[I]n resolving the crucial issue of whether the Board's determination is based upon substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, the Trial examiner's findings which turn on credibility determinations with respect to witnesses whom he alone saw and heard, are entitled to considerable weight." Id. See also Cartwright Hardware Co., Inc. V. NLRB, 600 F.2d 268, 270 (10th Cir. 1979) (quoting Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 496, 71 S.Ct. 456, 468, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951)).

We disagree with the Board's conclusion that this action was not significant. The Board argues that there was no evidence that Johnson and Werner had negotiated the original no-strike clause and therefore their opinions could not be attributed to the Union as a whole. Whether speaking as individuals or in their official capacities, however, the views of the people who have just negotiated the collective bargaining agreement then in effect is more important than what the original drafters of the 1969 no-strike clause may have intended. There is a strong inference of waiver considering that it is unlikely Union negotiators would lightly presume they had waived the right to engage in sympathy strikes. See News Union of Baltimore v. NLRB, supra, 393 F.2d at 678. As stated by the ALJ:

> If the Union believed that notwithstanding the no-strike clause, unit employees could honor the 1978 IBEW picket line without being charged with an unexcused > absence, then it may reasonably be inferred that the Union would have advised employees who wished to honor the picket line to notify the Company of the reason for their absence, in order to preserve the rights of the employees in an arbitration or litigation. However, the Union did not do this. * * * [T]he Union took no action in contradiction of [the notice]. The Union did not file any grievances in the matter, nor did it file or join in the present unfair labor practice charge. Instead, the Union's representative sat in silence at the rear of the hearing room, while Company official Allen testified concerning the Union's stated position.

E. Amcar's Other Contentions

Amcar also alleges that the Board's petition for enforcement should be denied for the reason that Amcar had no knowledge that any of its employees were engaged in sympathy strike activities. Our finding of waiver obviates the necessity of reaching this or other points alleged as error by Amcar.[10]

III. CONCLUSION

On the basis of the foregoing discussion, we conclude that the substantial evidence did not support the Board's conclusion in the instant case that the Union maintained its right to engage in sympathy strikes. While none of the evidence alone—the broad no-strike clause, the Absence Control Program, the evidence of the bargaining history, or the other evidence extrinsic to the contract—may clearly show a waiver, taken together we agree with the dissenting Board member and the ALJ that the evidence demonstrates an unmistakable waiver of the employees' right to engage in sympathy strikes. Amcar was therefore entitled to take disciplinary action in accordance with the Absence Control Program in the collective bargaining agreement.

The petition for enforcement of the Board's order is denied in its entirety.

[10] We note that the dissenting member of the Board relied on the opinion of the ALJ only with regard to the waiver question.

NLRB v. H.M. Patterson & Son, Inc.

636 F.2d 1014 (5th Cir.), February 9, 1981—245 NLRB 1412

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before TJOFLAT, VANCE and THOMAS A. CLARK, Circuit Judges

1015

VANCE, Circuit Judge: This is a petition for the enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board arising out of a finding by the Board that the respondent company had violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act,[1] 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (5), by refusing to bargain with the union certified by the Board. The company, H.M. Patterson & Son, Inc., a funeral home business with four mortuary facilities in Atlanta, Georgia, refused to bargain, arguing that the [1] 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq. (hereinafter referred to as the Act).

Board's determination of the appropriate bargaining unit arbitrarily departs from established Board precedent that an all-employee unit is the only appropriate unit in the funeral home industry. Additionally, the company contends that the Board's decision that the four sons of a twenty percent shareholder were not eligible voters was erroneous.

H.M. Patterson & Son, Inc., founded in Atlanta in the last century, is a closed corporation, entirely owned by relatives of the late Fred W. Patterson, Jr. The business is managed exclusively by Brannon Lesesne, president and thirty percent shareholder, and Dan Allen, vice president, secretary and twenty percent shareholder.

On June 6, 1978 General Teamsters Local Union No. 528 filed a representation petiton for an election in a unit consisting of licensed funeral directors, licensed embalmers and apprentice embalmers. The company opposed the union's petition on the ground that the unit sought by the union was inappropriate and that the appropriate unit should consist of all employees, including attendant-receptionists, office clericals, maids, porters, yard staff, drivers, maintenance men and organists. Following a hearing held on June 20 and 21, the regional director included attendants-receptionists in the unit,[2] concluding that all of these employees work together in the preparation of the body for final burial. The director rejected the company's contention that all the employees of the firm should be included in the bargaining unit. Although recognizing that there was some occasional, minor overlap of duties between the included and excluded employees, the director concluded that the unit sought by the union, as modified, shared a community of interest and was therefore an appropriate bargaining unit.

In a representation election held on August 3, 1978, there were eighteen ballots in favor of the union, fourteen against, and five were challenged; a number sufficient to affect the results of the election. The challenged ballots included those of the four sons of Dan Allen and the grandson of Brannon Lesesne. A hearing on the challenges was held on September 11. The evidence at the hearing, in addition to showing the family ownership of the firm, also disclosed that the four Allen sons had all been in college until June 19, 1978, with a major part of their expenses paid by their father. They lived at home with their parents until mid-July when they moved to a cabin owned by their father, for which they pay one hundred dollars monthly rent, including utilities. Based on this evidence, on September 27 the hearing officer issued his report, recommending that the four challenges to the Allen children be sustained, that the Lesense challenge be overruled, and that the union be certified. Thereafter, respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Board adopted the hearing officer's recommendations, without reaching the challenge to Lesesne, because the remaining challenge was no longer determinative of the election.

In reviewing the Board's determination of the appropriate bargaining unit, we note that "the Board is not by statute required to choose the most appropriate bargaining unit, only to select a unit appropriate under the circumstances," NLRB v. Southern Metal Service, Inc., 606 F.2d 512, 514 (5th Cir. 1979) (citing NLRB v. Bogart Sportswear Manufacturing Co., 485 F.2d 1203, 1206 (5th Cir. 1973)) (emphasis in original). Our standard for reviewing a Board determination of the collective bargaining unit is "exceedingly narrow." NLRB v. Fidelity Maintenance & Construction Co., 425 F.2d 707, 709 (5th Cir. 1970). "Board unit determinations involve of necessity a large measure of informed discretion and should not be set aside unless the reviewing court finds that the Board has exercised its discretion in an arbitrary or capricious manner." Spartan Industries v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 1002, 1005 (5th Cir. 1969).

Applying this standard of review, the Board's determination of the bargaining unit does not justify denial of enforcement of the bargaining order. The employees found by the Board to share a "substantial community of interest" are all directly involved in working with the body of the deceased. The funeral directors and embalmers, along with the assistant funeral directors and registered apprentices, embalm and cosmetize the remains, dress them, and place them in a casket. The attendants-receptionists style the hair of female remains and manicure their nails. Accordingly, they work together on a common task with which the other employees have little or no involvement. In this case the Board has selected a unit "appropriate under the circumstances." NLRB v. Southern Metal Services, 606 F.2d at 514.

[2] The regional director determined that the appropriate unit for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of section 9(b) of the Act was "All full time and regular part time funeral directors, assistant funeral directors, embalmers, apprentices, and attendant receptionists employed by the Employer at its four Atlanta, Georgia mortuary facilities, but excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act."

The company argues that we are faced with an exception to the general rule of deference to the Board's decision, because the Board is not following its own precedents, contending that "[W]here the Board makes an unexplained departure from its established criteria for unit determination we should deny enforcement * * *." NLRB v. WGOK, Inc., 384 F.2d 500, 503 (5th Cir. 1967). The company cites four prior Board cases involving funeral homes that it asserts establish that only an all-employee unit is appropriate. Riverside Memorial Chapel, Inc., 226 N.L.R.B. 2 (1976); W.W. Chambers Co., 124 N.L.R.B. 984 (1959); D.W. Newcomer's Sons, 117 N.L.R.B. 565 (1957); Utter-McKinley Mortuaries, 98 N.L.R.B. 450 (1952). These cases, however, do not establish a uniform rule. In D.W. Newcomer's Sons musicians were not included in the unit, and in Riverside Memorial Chapel, Inc. office clericals were excluded. In addition, in some of these cases job classifications were included in the unit absent disagreement among the parties.

The Board adopted the hearing officer's recommendation that the challenges to the four Allen sons be sustained. The hearing officer based his finding that the sons were ineligible to vote in the election on two independent grounds. First, he determined that the four sons were "employed by their parent and, as such, under Section 2(3) of the Act, are not employees of the Employer." [3] Alternatively, the hearing officer excluded them under section 9(b) of the Act for being more "closely aligned" with management than with their fellow employees.

In Linn Gear Co. v. NLRB, 608 F.2d 791 (9th Cir. 1979) the court reviewed the history of the relationship between sections 2(3) and 9(b) in adopting the standard to be applied by the Board in determining whether to include or exclude a blood related employee from a bargaining unit. The ninth circuit approved the following guidelines enunciated by the seventh circuit in NLRB v. Caravelle Wood Products, Inc., 466 F.2d 675 (7th Cir. 1972):

> There are a number of factors the Board must consider under section 9(b): how high a percentage of stock the parent or spouse owns, how many of the shareholders are related to one another, whether the shareholder is actively engaged in management or holds a supervisory position, how many relatives are employed as compared with the total number of employees, whether the relative lives in the same household or is partially dependent on the shareholder.

466 F.2d at 679.[4] Additionally, the court in Linn added three other factors for consideration:

> (1) the activity, if any, of the employee in the Union (2) the total number of employees as against the number of blood related employees and (3) the overall ties and social activities of the family involved.

608 F.2d at 796.

Like the ninth circuit, we follow a "community of interest" test in determining the appropriateness of a bargaining unit. Southern Metal Service, Inc., 606 F.2d at 513. We threfore join the seventh and ninth circuits in adopting the Caravelle and Linn standards, noting that not every factor on the list may be relevant in all cases, and that the list of factors is not exhaustive. Applying the Caravelle test, and recognizing the discretion Congress has given the Board, NLRB v. Smith Alarm System, 524 F.2d 983, 985 (5th Cir. 1975), we uphold the Board's determination on the voting challenges.

1018

A number of procedural issues are also raised by the company on appeal. One contention is that the Board improperly sustained a challenge to the Allen sons on a ground not specifically raised by the union at the time of the voting. The union challenged the ballots of the four sons on the basis of section 2(3) not section 9(b). The challenge was worded "son of an owner" or "of an Employer." Nonetheless, in view of the close relation historically between the two sections, and after having read the record of the hearing, we find no abuse of discretion on the part of the Board. We have examined defendant's other complaints, and find them to be without merit.

Truman Medical Center, Incorporated v. NLRB

641 F.2d 570 (8th Cir.), February 11, 1981—247 NLRB 396

On petition to review Board Order

Before LAY, Chief Judge, HENLEY, Circuit Judge, and HANSON, Senior District Judge*

571

HANSON, Senior District Judge: This case is before the Court on the petition of Truman Medical Center, Inc. (TMC) for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board, and on the Board's cross-application for enforcement of the same order. The Board found that TMC violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and 158(a)(5), by failing to abide by the union security provision of a collective bargaining agreement formerly in effect between TMC and the Service Employees International Union, Local No. 96 (Union). TMC admits that it violated the security provision; it denies, however, any violation of the Act, claiming that it is a political subdivision of the State of Missouri exempt from coverage under § 2(2) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(2).[1] The Board first rejected TMC's claim of exemption and assumed jurisdiction over it in a representation proceeding brought by the Union in early 1978, concluding that TMC "is neither a political subdivision nor a joint employer with one nor a provider of essential services to one and, since [it] otherwise meets the Board's jurisdictional standards, we find it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein." 239 NLRB 1067 (1978). This conclusion was reaffirmed in the subsequent unfair labor practices proceeding brought by the Union after TMC violated the security provision in order to gain judicial review of the Board's assumption of jurisdiction. 247 NLRB No. 58 (1980). Finding that it has " 'warrant in the record' and a reasonable basis in law," NLRB v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 322 U.S. 111, 131, 64 S.Ct. 851, 860, 88 L.Ed. 1170 (1944), we affirm the Board's assumption of jurisdiction and enforce its order.

1. The Board has long considered an entity to be a political subdivision of a state within the meaning of § 2(2) only if it is (1) "created directly by the State, so as to constitute a department or administrative arm of the government," or is (2) "administered by individuals who are responsible to public officials or to the general public." NLRB v. Natural Gas Utility District of Hawkins County, Tennessee, 402 U.S. 600, 604–05, 91 S.Ct. 1746, 1749, 29 L.Ed.2d 206 (1971) (Hawkins County); cf. Mobile Steamship Assn., 8 NLRB 1297 (1938); Natchez Trace Electric Power Assn., 193 NLRB 1098 (1971), enf'd, 476 F.2d 1042 (5th Cir. 1973). TMC satisfies neither of these tests as they have been applied by the Board and the courts.

A. TMC is a not-for-profit corporation organized under the general not-for-profit law of Missouri. Compare Camden-Clark Memorial Hospital, 221 NLRB 945 (1975) (hospital not incorporated or organized separately from the city). No special act of the state legislature or any public official was required to create it. Compare Hawkins County, supra (utility district organized under a special public law requiring findings by county judge that organization served the public convenience). It is true that TMC was organized in 1962 at the instance of the City of Kansas City, Missouri, to take over from the Kansas City Department of Health the operation of the Kansas City General Hospital; but this was done for the specific reason that the hospital needed more money than the City could provide, and operation of the hospital as a department of the City precluded the availability of federal funds and private grants. It is also true that TMC has assumed the statutory responsibilities of Kansas City and Jackson County, Missouri, for medical care of indigents; but this has been done pursuant to a series of contracts between City and County and TMC under which TMC operates the City and County hospitals, not pursuant to any statutory duty imposed on TMC itself. Since 1971 TMC has also operated as a teaching hospital under an affiliation agreement with the University of Missouri-Kansas City. TMC's contractual relations with exempt political subdivisions of Missouri do not transform TMC itself into a political subdivision of the State. E. g., Herbert Harvey, Inc. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 770 (D.C.Cir. 1969). TMC's operations are not governed by state or local regulations applicable to government agencies. Its employees are not covered by any governmental merit system. It does not require City, County or State approval to borrow money, issue notes, or pledge its property as security for loans. It has no power to tax, no power to eminent domain, or any other sovereign power. There is no evidence in the record that its books and records are "public documents" under Missouri law, although they are subject to inspection by City and County pursuant to contract. Compare, generally Hawkins County, supra. The Board's finding that TMC was not created directly by the State so as to constitute a department or administrative arm of the government is amply supported by the record. It is not significantly undermined by evidence that TMC has been treated as a governmental agency by certain federal agencies for certain purposes.[2]

*The Honorable William C. Hanson, Senior United States District Judge for the Northern and Southern Districts of Iowa, sitting by designation.

[1] 2(2) provides in pertinent part:

> (2) The term "employer" * * * shall not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation, or any Federal Reserve Bank, or any State or political subdivision thereof . . . .

B. Nor is TMC administered by individuals who are responsible in the required sense to public officials or to the general public. Its governing body is a self-perpetuating board of directors, the majority of whom—31 out of 49—are neither appointed by nor subject to removal by public officials or the general public and have no official connection to Kansas City, Jackson County or the University of Missouri. Compare Camden-Clark Memorial Hospital, supra (all members of the hospital board of trustees subject to confirmation by city council); Hawkins County, supra (utility district's commissioners appointed by county judge and subject to removal under the general law applicable to removal of public officials). It is true that the remaining 18 directors are appointed by or associated with the City, County or University. But the directors determine policy by majority vote and the votes of the government directors are no more significant than the votes of the other directors. Decisions by the board are not subject to approval by any governmental body and are not communicated to City, County or University officials other than those on the board itself. The responsibility of the board of directors to City, County and University, while undoubtedly heavy, derives from the contractual relations between TMC and these political subdivisions, and is not the sort of direct personal accountability to public officials or to the general public required to support a claim of exemption under § 2(2). Cf. NLRB v. Highview, Inc., 590 F.2d 174, modified on other grounds, 595 F.2d 339 (5th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Natchez Trace Electric Power Assn., 476 F.2d 1042 (5th Cir. 1973). Finally, while TMC's affiliation agreement with the University gives the University a veto power in the appointment of certain of TMC's top officials, this power has never been exercised, and the University does not possess the power to remove any of the officials once they have been appointed and has never sought to do so. Cf. NLRB v. E. C. Atkins & Co., 331 U.S. 398, 67 S.Ct. 1265, 91 L.Ed. 1563 (1947) (military's right to veto hire of guards not sufficient to remove employer from Board's jurisdiction).

2. TMC's claim that it is a "joint employer" with the City, County and University is no better founded than its claim that it is itself an exempt political subdivision. We look here to TMC's relations with the unit of service and maintenance employees represented by the Union in the present dispute; our inquiry is whether TMC has retained sufficient control over its relations with these workers that it "is able to bargain effectively about the terms and conditions of employment with the employees' representative." NLRB v. St. Louis Comprehensive Neighborhood Health Center, Inc., 633 F.2d 1268 at 1270 (8th Cir. 1980); Board of Trustees of Memorial Hospital v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 177, 185 (10th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Austin Developmental Center, Inc., 606 F.2d 785, 789 (7th Cir. 1979). We have no doubt that TMC has retained sufficient such control. No statutory provision gives City, County or University control over the salaries or other benefits of the employees in question; compare NLRB v. Chicago Youth Centers, 616 F.2d 1028 (7th Cir. 1980) and Lutheran Welfare Services of Ill. v. NLRB, 607 F.2d 777 (7th Cir. 1979). No provision of the contracts between TMC and the City, County or University gives any of the latter the right to approve or disapprove TMC's decision as to "staffing, wage rates and fringe benefits; the employment of any person listed [in a list of all employees]; and the total wages paid to all employees in any given classification," nor has TMC agreed "not to enter into any written contract of employment * * * or any collective agreement covering terms and conditions of employment * * * without the express written consent" of City, County or University; compare Board of Trustees of Memorial Hospital v. NLRB, supra, 624 F.2d at 185–86. On the contrary, under its contracts with City, County and University TMC has retained virtually complete control over its relations with the employees here in question, and it has since 1973 negotiated two collective bargaining agreements with them with minimal and only informal consultations with City, County and University. The fact that TMC's ability to bargain is constrained by budgetary restraints arising from its contract does not preclude it from bargaining effectively with the Union; these limitation merely serve "to define the economic framework with [in] which [TMC] and the Union may conclude their bargaining." NLRB v. St. Louis Comprehensive Neighborhood Health Center, Inc., supra, at 1271; cf. NLRB v. Austin Developmental Center, Inc., supra, 606 F.2d at 789 n.8. In short, substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that TMC is not a "joint employer" of the workers here in question with any political subdivision of Missouri.

[2] For example, the IRS has ruled that TMC is not subject to tax on its income because it is an instrumentality of Kansas City, and has approved its pension plan as a "government" plan. However, as the IRS cautioned in its ruling on the status of the pension plan, "This letter relates only to the status of your plan under the Internal Revenue Code. It is not a determination regarding the effect of other Federal or local statutes." Moreover, the IRS has also ruled that the interest TMC pays on notes is not exempt from federal tax under the exemption for interest on the obligations of political subdivisions of states. Cf. NLRB v. Randolph Electric Membership Corp., 343 F.2d 60, 64–65 (4th Cir. 1965):

> These rulings * * * point in several directions, and are not helpful to the argument. In any event, these rulings of the Internal Revenue Service are not determinative of the meaning of the section 2(2) exemption for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

3. Prior to 1979 the Board sometimes declined to exercise its jurisdiction over an otherwise nonexempt employer if it found that there was an "intimate connection" between the basic or traditional functions of an exempt political subdivision and the services provided to that subdivision by the nonexempt employer. See Rural Fire Protection Co., 216 NLRB 584 (1975); Temple University, 194 NLRB 1160 (1972). TMC argues that the Board should have declined jurisdiction over it on that basis, citing its provision of health care to indigent residents of Kansas City and Jackson County. However, the Board has consistently taken the view that "the operation of a hospital is not necessarily so basic or traditional a government function as to warrant our declining to assert jurisdiction," Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart, 221 NLRB 1215 (1975); and in any case the Board abandoned the "intimate connection" test in National Transportation Service, Inc., 240 NLRB 64 (1979). We find no abuse of discretion in the Board's assertion of jurisdiction here.

The order of the Board is enforced.

On petition to review and enforce Board Order

Before GOLDBERG, POLITZ and SAM D. JOHNSON,
Circuit Judge

GOLDBERG, Circuit Judge: Over two centuries ago, James Otis decried a political system which dared to impose taxation without representation. Nearly a decade ago, the Supreme Court played an encore to the blare of Gideon's trumpet[1] and held that there could be no incarceration without representation.[2] About six years ago, the Court applied this concept to the labor relations arena, and ruled that an investigatory confrontation without representation was an unfair labor practice.[3] Today we must determine the parameters of an investigatory confrontation in order to decide whether union representation was required at a meeting between an employee and his superior when no discipline was intended by the employer.

4629, represents petitioner's employees. In early 1978, Paul Nestle, a member of the union, was employed at Lennox's Fort Worth plant as an assembly line worker under the supervision of Leo Ary. Fred Boenker, manager of final assembly, was Ary's superior.

Nestle had experienced some difficulty with his assembly line duties and had been criticized by Ary for his slow work. On February, 16, 1978, Ary approached Nestle on the work floor and stated that he would like to talk to Nestle at his (Ary's) desk. Nestle asked that a union representative be present at the meeting, but Ary responded that one would not be necessary. Nestle repeated his request, but nevertheless proceeded toward Ary's desk. As the two men walked, heated words were exchanged and Ary interpreted one of Nestle's remarks as a threat.[4] Ary then asked Nestle to accompany him to Boenker's office and Nestle agreed.

Ary began the meeting with Boenker by complaining that Nestle had threatened him, but Nestle denied this. Boenker asked if there had been any witnesses to the altercation and was told that there were none. Boenker then changed the subject by turning to the issue of production and stating that he had wanted to talk to Nestle and Ary even before their argument. At this point Boenker's telephone rang and as Boenker spoke on the telephone, Nestle and Ary expressed their contempt for each other. Boenker completed his phone call and told Nestle and Ary that while he was aware of their personal differences, he would like to see them get along. Boenker again changed the subject to productivity and discussed the deficiencies of some employees, including Nestle.[5] Nestle attempted to defend himself and asked for a union committeeman to represent him. Boenker replied that if he thought that Nestle needed a committeeman, one would be provided. Boenker then stated that Nestle would have to continue to work under Ary's supervision, and that he did not want any disharmony between supervisors and assembly line workers. He added that Nestle's production would have to improve, but assured Nestle that no threat was intended. The meeting then ended, and both Ary and Nestle left Boenker's office.

In light of the fact that Nestle had requested a union representative and was refused, the National Labor Relations Board found that Lennox had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.[6] The Board ordered Lennox to cease and desist from this unfair labor practice and from any practice which would interfere with an employee's exercise of his right of concerted activity, as guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act. Lennox has petitioned this court for review of the Board's decision, and the Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order.

On appeal, Petitioner Lennox argues that the Board erred in finding a violation of Nestle's right to a union representative at an investigatory meeting. Petitioner notes that the Administrative Law Judge found that discipline was never intended to result from the meeting, and that no discipline in fact resulted. Petitioner reasons that in light of these findings, the meeting was not investigatory, the employee did not reasonably fear discipline, and no union representative was therefore required.

In the landmark case of NLRB v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 95 S.Ct. 959, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975), the Supreme Court held that Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act "guarantees an employee's right to the presence of a union representative at an investigatory interview in which the risk of discipline reasonably inheres." 95 S.Ct. at 965–67. The Court noted that such a rule provides benefits for both employee and employer: it insures adequate representation for an employee who may be too fearful or inarticulate to adeqately present his case, and it enables the employer to save time and effort by getting to the bottom of an incident more quickly. Moreover, "[r]equiring a lone employee to attend an investigatory interview which he reasonably believes may result in the imposition of discipline perpetuates the inequality [of employer/employee bargaining power] the Act was designed to eliminate, and bars recourse to the safeguards the Act provided 'to redress the perceived imbalance of economic power between labor and management.'" Id. at 966 (citations omitted).

[5] Boenker said that he had been observing Nestle and a co-employee, and that he believed that they were instigating a production slow-down.

[6] Section 8 of the Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158 (West 1973), provides, in pertinent part:

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 157 of this title * * *

"Section 157 of this title," Section 7 of the Act, protects concerted activity by employees, including one employee's request for the presence of a union representative at an investigatory interview which the employee reasonably believes might result in discipline. J. Weingarten, Inc., supra, 95 S.Ct at 965–67; Anchortank, Inc. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 1153, 1157–58 (5th Cir. 1980). The Board's finding in the case at bar was based upon this doctrine.

Under Weingarten, an employee is entitled to a union representative only when (1) the interview in question is investigatory, i.e., when it is designed to elicit answers to work-related questions which might affect the employee or the bargaining unit, and (2) the employee reasonably fears that discipline might result from the interview. Thus where the purpose of a meeting is disciplinary rather than investigatory, i.e., where the meeting is designed simply to inform an employee of a previously made decision to impose discipline, no union representative is required since there is no attempt to elicit facts which might result in discipline.[7] See NLRB v. Certified Grocers of California, Ltd., 587 F.2d 449 (9th Cir. 1978); Texaco, Inc., 247 N.L.R.B. No. 56 (Jan. 30, 1980); Roadway Express, Inc., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 180 (Dec. 14, 1979); Baton Rouge Water Works Co., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 161 (Dec. 14, 1979). Similarly, where the purpose of a meeting is supervisory rather than investigatory, e.g., where the meeting is designed simply to show an employee how to improve his work performance, no right to a union representative inheres. See AAA Equipment Service Co. v. NLRB, 598 F.2d 1142 (8th Cir. 1979); Alfred M. Lewis, Inc. v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 403 (9th Cir. 1978). In the case at bar we must thus decide whether the interview in question was an investigation which Nestle reasonably feared might result in discipline, thereby requiring the presence of a union representative upon request.

Employee Nestle was asked questions concerning both his poor work performance and his less than friendly altercation with his supervisor. Such questioning is investigatory in that it is designed to elicit responses which might well result in discipline against the employee. Moreover, even if the employer had previously decided that discipline would definitely not result from the interview in question, information could be elicited at that interview which might enable the employer to build a case against the employee, culminating in discipline at some later date. Hence an interview like the one in the case at bar where the employee is asked questions about poor work or an altercation with a superior is by its very nature "an investigatory interview in which the risk of discipline reasonably inheres." See J. Weingarten, Inc., supra, 95 S.Ct. at 966.

Insofar as it is inconsistent with this analysis, we reject the language in Eighth and Ninth Circuit opinions which suggests that it is only when disciplinary action is "probable" or "seriously considered" that the right of representation arises. See, e.g., AAA Equipment Service Co., supra, 598 F.2d at 1146; Alfred M. Lewis, Inc., supra, 587 F.2d at 410. Such language is plainly inconsistent with the dictates and rationale of the Supreme Court in Weingarten. An interview may well be "investigatory" and may well reasonably include the "risk of discipline" even though the employer is not seriously contemplating discipline at the time the interview is conducted. Indeed, a purpose of the interview may be to decide whether discipline against an employee is an option to be serious considered. Furthermore, an interview in which work-related questions are asked of an employee, but which the employer does not intend to result in discipline may nevertheless result in discipline if the employee surprises his employer with an answer which the employer finds unsatisfactory or threatening. The Weingarten rule is designed to protect such "fearful" or "inarticulate" employees from the inadvertent results of their answers during work-related interviews. See, J. Weingarten, Inc., supra, 95 S.Ct. at 966–67. For the Weingarten rationale to be effectively achieved, courts must not narrow the scope of the doctrine as enunciated by the Supreme Court: it is whenever the risk of discipline reasonably inheres in an investigatory interview that a union representative is required, and not merely when disciplinary action is "probable" or "seriously considered." See id. 965–67. But see AAA Equipment Service Co., supra, 598 F.2d 1146; Alfred M. Lewis, Inc., supra, 587 F.2d at 410. We break no new ground, but merely restate the words of Weingarten in holding that where an interview is designed to elicit information which might reasonably result in discipline—either immediately or at some time in the future—a union representative is required if the employee so requests. Because the risk of discipline is inherent in interviews focusing upon poor work or upon an employee/supervisor confrontation, we agree with the Board and find that a union representative was required in the case at bar.[8]

[7] The rationale behind this rule was simply stated by this Court in Anchortank v. NLRB, supra:

> Since the disciplinary decision has already been made, the union representative cannot safeguard the interests of the entire bargaining unit be exercising vigilance to make certain that the employer does not initiate or continue a practice of imposing punishment unjustly. Similarly, because there is no factfinding at such an interview, the union representative cannot aid the employer and employee by furthering the former's investigation of the incident as issue.

Id. at 1168 (citations omitted); see Mt. Vernon Tanker Co. v. NLRB, 549 F.2d 571, 575 (9th Cir. 1977) (interview not investigatory, since "[t]he result from the outset is a foregone conclusion").

Petitioner also argues that Nestle did not properly request the presence of a union representative at the meetings in question and that therefore no representative was required. Petitioner points out that the purpose of the original meeting between Nestle and Ary was unknown, and that the subsequent meeting in Boenker's office was a result of the altercation between Nestle and Ary. Because the second meeting involved a different presumably a different company official and presumably a different subject, petitioner argues that the employee's request for a representative at the first meeting was not sufficient to require a representative at the second.

It is clear that "an employee may make a request for union representation while on the plant floor, and need not repeat the request at the office if the official there is aware of such request * * *." Roadway Express, Inc., supra. Petitioner is correct in pointing out that Boenker, the official in whose office the second meeting was held, was unaware of Nestle's original request for a union representative. However, supervisor Ary was present at the second meeting as well as the first, and he was well aware of Nestle's request. Thus Nestle need not have repeated his request in Boenker's office. Moreover, the Administrative Law Judge correctly characterized the two meetings as a "single, interrelated episode," enabling a single request for a union representative to suffice for both meetings. The fact that the scope of the second meeting included the Nestle-Ary confrontation as well as Nestle's poor work is unimportant. Nestle presumably believed that the first meeting would focus on his work performance, and the second meeting dealt with this topic as well. Ary knew that Nestle desired and requested a union representative at the first meeting, and he certainly should have known that a representative was desired at the second. Indeed, once the scope of the second meeting was expanded to include the Nestle-Ary confrontation, there was even more reason for Nestle to want a union representative, since the risk of discipline was increased. It was therefore unnecessary for Nestle to repeat his S.O.S. in distress at the meeting in Boenker's office.

The rationale of Weingarten does not require an employee to repeat his request for union representation each time the subject changes during a meeting with company officials. Such a rule would be both burdensome for the employee and tedious for the company officials. As long as one or more company officials are aware of the employee's desire and request for the presence of a union representative, a single request will suffice for the multiple subjects of a single meeting, or for multiple meetings which are part of a "single, interrelated episode," as here. The union representative's admission ticket gained by the employee's original request entitles the employee to representation during both ends of the doubleheader.

The facts of this case fit neatly within the parameters of the rule that in the labor arena there must be no investigatory confrontation without representation. The meetings here were clearly investigatory, and substantial evidence supported the Board's finding that the employee reasonably feared the risk of discipline. Moreover, the employee's request for a union representative was sufficient to require a representative's presence at both meetings, since one company official was present at both meetings and was aware of the request, and since the two meetings were part of a "single, interrelated episode." The Board's order is therefore.

[8] Petitioner's argument that there was not sufficient evidence to support the Board's finding that Nestle reasonably feared discipline as a result of the meetings is without merit. As noted above, it is certainly reasonable for an employee to fear the risk of discipline as a result of a meeting focusing on poor work or on an altercation with his superior. Moreover, assurances that a union representative will be provided if a company official thinks one is necessary are insufficient to allay those reasonable fears. Columbus Foundries, Inc., 229 N.L.R.B. 34 (April 18, 1977), aff'd, 84 Lab. Cas. ¶10,645 (5th Cir. January 27, 1978); Van Tran Electric Corp., 218 N.L.R.B. 43 (May 29, 1975). The Board's finding that Nestle reasonably feared discipline is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole and must therefore be left undisturbed. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464–65, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Crystal Springs Shirt Corporation, Bernstein and Sons Shirt Corporation

637 F.2d 399 (5th Cir.), February 19, 1981—245 NLRB 882

On petition to enforce Board Order

INGRAHAM, Circuit Judge: Pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of its order issued against Crystal Springs Shirt Corporation and Bernstein & Sons Shirt Corporation (collectively Crystal or the Company).[1] The Board, adopting the findings and conclusions of an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), rules that Crystal had engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (5) (1976), by unilaterally changing piece rates and production quotas, without notifying or bargaining with the certified collective bargaining representative, commencing in May 1977 at its garment factory in Crystal Springs, Mississippi.[2] The Board further found that a strike by Crystal's employees in April 1978 was called in response to Crystal's unfair labor practices and therefore constituted an unfair labor practice strike. Accordingly, the Board entered a broad cease and desist order on September 28, 1979.[3] We enforce that order.

The History of the Case

In June 1974 the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union) was certified as the bargaining representative for a unit of Crystal's production and maintenance empolyees. The parties begun negotiations in September 1974. From then until December 1975 the parties met twenty times without agreeing on a contract. At the last meeting, Crystal submitted its final proposal on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. The Company offered wage increases in return for the Union's acceptance of certain other Company demands and abandonment of certain Union demands. The Union asked for further meetings on the proposal, but Crystal declared that the parties were at impasse. Twenty-five minutes after the December 1975 meeting ended, Crystal unilaterally announced to the plant employees its proposed wage increases and thereafter implemented them. In response, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges. In April 1977 the Board found that Crystal had engaged in surface bargaining with no intention of entering into any final binding collective bargaining agreement and had made unilateral changes in wages in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[4]

In May 1977 the Union formally requested that Crystal resume negotiations. It also asked the Company to provide information on total earnings during a representative period for all employees in the bargaining unit. From this wage and piece rate data, the Union negotiator made certain wage analyses. After the hiatus of over eighteen months, Crystal and the Union sat down again in July 1977. At the next meeting, in September 1977, Crystal gave the Union negotiator additional data showing total earnings summaries and piece rates then in effect at the plant. The Union negotiator complained that the data showed that the Company had converted from production mostly of woven goods entirely to knit goods and also had made changes in the piece rates and production quotas. In October 1977 the Union once again filed unfair labor practice charges against Crystal, alleging violations of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[1] The Board's decision and order are reported at 245 NLRB No. 112 (Sept. 28, 1979).

[2] The Board also ruled that Bernstein & Sons and its wholly owned subsidiary, Crystal Springs, constitute a single employer for purposes of the act. This ruling, manifestly supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, is not challenged by Crystal in this appeal.

[3] The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from engaging in the unfair labor practices found and from in any other manner interfering with the employees' Section 7 rights. Affirmatively, the order requires the Company to comply with the following terms: (1) upon request, to bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining agent and, if an understanding is reached, to embody it in a signed agreement; (2) upon request, to furnish the Union with all records necessary and relevant to the Union's decision whether to restore the piece work rates and production quotas in effect prior to May 1977; (3) if the Union so desires, to revoke the unilateral changes in piece work rates and production quotas instituted in May 1977, and to restore the rates of pay and quotas in effect prior thereto, making employees whole for any loss they may have suffered by reason of the unlawful changes; (4) to preserve and, upon request, to make available to the Board and its agents for examination and copying, all records relevant and necessary to a determination of the amounts due employees; (5) upon application, to offer all employees who struck on April 3, 1978, or thereafter, full and immediate reinstatement to their former positions or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, any employee hired after April 3, 1978; (6) to make strikers whole with interest for wages lost commencing five days after unconditional offers to return to work are made until reinstatement is offered, less net interim earnings; and (7) to post customary notices.

[4] Crystal Springs Shirt Corp., 229 NLRB 4 (1977). Crystal consented to the entry of a court judgment; this court entered a judgment enforcing the Board's order on September 11, 1978. (No. 78–2148) Unlike the changes in piece rates and production quotas at issue in the present appeal, the wage increases in that case involved changes in the base rates.

In February 1978 the Union called a meeting of Crystal employees. Union personnel discussed with the employees the history of negotiations with the Company over the past three and one-half years, including the fact that the Company had engaged in surface bargaining and, most recently, had implemented unilateral changes in piece rates and production quotas when it changed from woven production to knit. The Union personnel also explained the difference between an economic strike and an unfair labor practice strike. Thereafter, the employees voted unanimously to authorize the Union to call a strike against Crystal. After one month of preparations, the employees struck in April 1978.

In this application for enforcement, our standard of review is to determine whether there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's findings. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1965). It is not our function to overturn the Board's choice between two equally plausible inferences from the facts, if the choice is reasonable, even though we might reach a contrary result if deciding the case de novo. NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 88 S.Ct. 988, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968). Acknowledging these principles, Crystal argues that the challenged changes did not violate sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act and that, even if they did, the strike was not called in response to those changes and therefore was not an unfair labor practice strike.[5] We turn now to an examination of each of these arguments.

The Section 8(a)(1) and (5) Violations

It is undisputed that during the last three quarters of 1977, Crystal unilaterally changed certain existing piece rates and production quotas. Conceding this, Crystal attempts to justify its conduct on two grounds. First, Crystal argues that the Union knew or should have known of the changes long before the September 1977 meeting because of certain data previously furnished to the Union. From this notice premise, Crystal argues that the Union waived its right to negotiate over the changes. Second, Crystal argues that even if the Union did not receive notice of the changes, the changes were permissible since they were automatic responses to changes in the underlying job requirements and served only to maintain the status quo.

In support of its notice contention, Crystal points to two occasions on which it provided the Union with certain information relating to piece rates. The first of these was in January 1977 following a negotiating session between counsel for Crystal and the Union negotiator concerning a different plant not involved in these proceedings. Although the data do indicate that there was a piece rate for knit fabric in existence at Crystal during December 1976, there is no indication whatsoever that significant production—or indeed any production—of any knit garments was actually taking place.[6] The second occasion in June 1977, was in response to the Union's request for bargaining data, including a complete set of current piece rates, to be used at the July 1977 resumption of negotiations. This material also failed to give any indication whatsoever of the degree to which Crystal was converting to knit production and implementing corresponding piece rate and production quota changes.[7] Because of the differençe in graphic presentation, moreover, it is impossible to correlate the two sets of data in any manner that would give notice of changes in particular rates. These disclosures, charitably so characterized, do not constitute "circumstances which afford a reasonable opportunity for counter arguments or proposals." See NLRB v. Citizens Hotel Co., 326 F.2d 501, 505 (5th Cir. 1964). "Notice, to be effective, must be given sufficiently in advance of actual implementation of a decision to allow reasonable scope for bargaining * * *. Notice of a fait accompli is simply not the sort of timely notice upon which the waiver defense is predicated." International Ladies' Garment Workers Union v. NLRB, 463 F.2d 907, 919 (D.C. Cir. 1972). Thus, the information presented to the Union at the September 1977 meeting, which was in a format allowing direct comparison with the rates shown in the June material and which showed rates for operations exclusively on knit fabric, gave the Union its first real notice that Crystal had unilaterally implemented changes in existing piece rates and production quotas. Accordingly, Crystal's waiver argument is without merit.

[5] Crystal also objects to the terms of the Board's remedy. The Company asserts in a conclusory manner that the make-whole remedy gives to the Union a veto over a substantive condition of employment, namely the setting of price rates and production quotas. Since before the Board Crystal did not except with any specificity whatsoever to the ALJ's proposed remedy, we decline to entertain this objection now. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976); NLRB v. Ochoa Fertilizer Corp., 368 U.S. 318, 322, 82 S.Ct. 344, 347, 7 Ed.2d 312 (1961); NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co. of Miami, 344 U.S. 344, 350, 73 S.Ct. 287 290, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953); Marshall Field & Co. v. NLRB, 318 U.S. 253, 255–56, 63 S.Ct. 585, 586, 87 L.Ed. 744 (1943).

[6] It is undisputed that prior to the period at issue here the bulk of Crystal's production consisted of woven garments, for example, Crystal introduced records before the ALJ that seem to indicate that knit production first began during the last week of October 1976.

We next must determine whether these changes were permissible as merely responsive to changes in the underlying job requirements serving only to maintain the status quo. We are mindful that Crystal "carries a heavy burden of proving that such adjustments of wages * * * are purely automatic and pursuant to definite guidelines." NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Corp., 601 F.2d 870, 875 (5th Cir. 1979). The origin of this defense is the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). In Katz, the Court implied that unilateral wage changes that "in effect, were a mere continuation of the status quo" would not constitute a violation of section 8(a)(5). See id. 746, 82 S.Ct. at 1113. The protection of this defense, however, runs to wage changes that are "in fact simply automatic increases to which the employer has already committed himself." See id. The Supreme Court rejected the status quo defense in Katz because the wages challenged there "were in no sense automatic, but were informed by a large measure of discretion." Id. We think the same must be said of the changes in piece rates and production quotas challenged here.

Crystal asks us to distinguish this case from one involving the unilateral introduction of new base rates of modification of existing base rates, which Crystal concedes would be a discretionary change.[8] The Company argues that its use of time and motion studies to determine the new piece rates and production quotas for knit fabrics insulates those changes from a finding of section 8(a)(5) violation—in other words, that application of the scientific method somehow removes the element of discretion. We disagree.

The piece rate is the price Crystal pays an employee for performing a dozen repetitions of a certain operation. The production quota is the number of dozens of such operations that a so-called "100% worker" can perform in one day. The piece rate is mathematically computed in such a manner that the 100% worker will earn, for all pieces produced in a day, an amount equivalent to the base rate, expressed as a per hour wage, multiplied by the eight hours of the standard work day. Thus, the establishment of a production quota directly affects the amount that the 100% worker can earn each day. But the establishement of that production quota is itself a discretionary choice. It involves breaking down the entire production process into discrete operations, each composed of certain elements of physical motion. It involves selecting the number of repetitions to be timed in order to arrive at an average time per operation. It involves applying a performance rating to the timed average based on the timer's estimation of the operator's output efficiency. It involves making some allowance for the clerical and bundling time necessarily spent by any operator. All of these estimations and calculations must be performed in order to establish the average time that the 100% worker should spend on a given operation.

Next, the available work time in the day is divided by the average time spent on each operation in order to determine how many operations the 100% worker will accomplish—that is, the production quota for that operation. But this determination is also influenced by discretion. The 480 minute day is first reduced by an amount that represents time spent on breaks. The remaining time is further reduced by an amount that compensates for physical fatigue and machine delay. Thus, Crystal computes its production quotas on the basis 404 of a 391 minute day. In the light of the divers judgmental elements outlined above, we find that the piece rate and production quota changes instituted by Crystal through the use of time and motion studies "were in no sense automatic, but were informed by a large measure of discretion." NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. at 746, 82 S.Ct. at 1113.

[7] In fact, a simple tally indicates that approximately 70% of all discreet rates listed were for operations performed on woven fabric. At the hearing before the ALJ, however, Crystal introduced records indicating that as early as the first week of April 1977 approximately two-thirds of the operators were performing knit work as opposed to woven.

[8] See case cited note 4 supra.

Finally, we note that these unilateral changes in piece rates and production quotas manifestly did not serve to maintain the status quo. In fact, workers generally experienced significant increases in earnings. By Crystal's own admission, from the third quarter of 1976 to the fourth quarter of 1977, 77% of the piece work operators experienced increases in earnings, 18% of them experienced decreases in earnings, and 5% experienced no change. These results can hardly be characterized as maintenance of the status quo. In his opening remarks to the ALJ, counsel for Crystal seemed to argue that these general wage increases somehow exonerated the Company's conduct. On the contrary, we conclude that Crystal unilaterally instituted changes in piece rates and production quotas in derogation of the Union's right to negotiate over wages. See also Waycross Sportswear, Inc. v. NLRB, 403 F.2d 832, 835-36 (5th Cir. 1968); McGraw-Edison Co v. NLRB, 419 F.2d 67, 77 (8th Cir. 1968).

The Unfair Labor Practice Strike

Crystal argues that even if we find substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that the unilateral changes violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5), we nevertheless should conclude that the walkout in April 1978 was not an unfair labor practice strike. "A strike is characterized in this way so as to give employees the right to be reinstated in an unfair labor practice had anything to do with causing it." NLRB v. Safway Steel Scaffolds Co. of Georgia, 383 F.2d 273, 280 (5th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 955, 88 S.Ct. 1052, 19 L.Ed.2d 1150 (1968) (citing Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956)). The result is the same even if the alleged unfair labor practice was only one of multiple causes of the strike. Multiple motivation does not deprive the employees of their status as unfair labor practice strikers so long as the employer's unfair labor practice was a contributing cause. NLRB v. Pope Maintenance Corp., 573 F.2d 898, 907 (5th Cir. 1978).

The issue is this portion of the case is one solely of credibility. There is testimony in the record that, immediately prior to the strike vote, Union personnel recounted the long history of labor strife with the Company, the surface bargaining engaged in by the Company, the labor strife at other plants owned by the Company's corporate parent, and the recent unilateral changes in piece rates and production quotas after the changeover from woven production to knit. The ALJ expressly found that testimony credible. The Company attacks the veracity of the testifiant and asks us to reject the ALJ's credibility determination. When the issue is simply one of the believability, the credibility resolutions of the ALJ are entitled to affirmance unless they are inherently unreasonable or self-contradictory. NLRB v. National Fixtures, Inc., 574 F.2d 1305, 1306 (5th Cir. 1978). We find substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the ALJ's and the Board's finding that Crystal's unilateral changes in piece rates and production quotas were contributing causes of the April 1977 strike.

For the foregoing reasons, the application for enforcement of the order of the National Labor Relations Board should be granted.

ENFORCED.

641 F.2d 500 (7th Cir.), February 19, 1981—250 NLRB 614

On petition to review Board Order

Before CUMMINGS and CUDAHY, Circuit Judges, and BONSAL, Senior Distric Judge*

*The Honorable Dudley B. Bonsal, Senior District Judge of the Southern District of New York, is sitting by designation.

CUMMINGS, Circuit Judge. This matter is before us on a petition of Sullair P.T.O., Inc. pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) to review and set aside a final order of the National Labor Relations Board issued against Sullair on July 15, 1980, and reported at 250 NLRB No. 104. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order. We hold that the Board's findings do not support its legal conclusion and therefore deny enforcement.

Sullair, the wholly owned subsidiary of a larger corporate enterprise, is engaged in the manufacture, sale and distribution of air compressors installed as power-take-off units. Sullair's home office is in Michigan City, Indiana, and it does business in Indiana and elsewhere. The events giving rise to this dispute occurred at its plant in New Buffalo, Michigan, which employs approximately 12 production and maintenance workers. These employees are not represented by a union.

Among the fringe benefits Sullair provided its New Buffalo employees from 1975 to 1979 was the opportunity to buy unlimited quantities of gasoline at 35¢ per gallon. On May 31, 1979, Sullair posted on the New Buffalo plant bulletin board a notice that because of increasing cost and a shortage with its suppliers, starting June 1 employees would be able to buy only 10 or 15 gallons of gasoline per week, depending on whether they lived in New Buffalo or out of town, at a cost of 50¢ per gallon "until the shortage lessens with our suppliers."

Later that day,[1] General Manager William A. Jones was stopped on the shop floor near some employees who had questions and complaints about the changed gasoline policy. One of these employees was Terry Lee Boyle, who had been employed by Sullair as a mechanic at the plant since November 1977. Boyle told Jones that Sullair was "f.....g" the employees by the new policy and asked how he, Boyle, was going to be able to afford the price increase "on his f.....g salary." Jones suggested that Boyle could get another job if he thought he could do better. Jones then told the employees he would try to find out whether the change was temporary or permanent and that Sullair's Controller and Human Relations Committee would investigate the matter.

The next day, June 1, 1979, at the request of another employee, Plant Controller Douglas Sommers, who was subordinate to Jones, met in the shop lunchroom with seven or eight of the 12 employees to discuss the gasoline policy. During this meeting, Boyle became the primary employee speaking out against the change. When he asked Sommers "what the f..k" could be done about the change, Sommers replied that it was a policy change by the parent corporation. Thereupon Boyle said Sullair was attempting "to f..k the employees" and then asked if those "rotten m....r f.....g c.........s" at the main plant would ration gas there if there had been a gas shortage at the New Buffalo plant. Sommers told Boyle that he would be glad to stand there to talk about the gas program but not with Boyle's using such profanity. Sommers added that if Boyle were unhappy he could get a job somewhere else. Boyle said that if that was Sommers' answer, he was a "f.....g poor manager."

Sommers immediately went to Jones' office and told him what had occurred. Ten to 20 minutes after the meeting had ended, Jones fired Boyle for "insubordination," reminding him of a previous incident in December 1978 when Boyle had been orally reprimanded for insubordination after complaining that he was being "f....d again" by the company and calling Jones a liar. On that occasion Jones warned Boyle that he would be terminated if such insubordination happened again and that he must not direct vulgar shop language toward management.[2]

Three days after Boyle's discharge, Jones and Sommers prepared two memoranda for Boyle's personnel file reciting complaints about Boyle and his work. These memoranda indicate that Boyle was warned orally on January 11, 1979, to refrain from his continual complaining because it was having a detrimental effect on working conditions[3] and that on February 13 and May 9 other employees complained to management that it was difficult to work with Boyle because of his negative attitude.

[1] It is immaterial whether this incident occurred on May 31 as the parties' briefs state, or on June 1st as the Administrative Law Judge found (App. 14, 15). The record is unclear on the matter.

[2] It makes no difference whether warnings are oral or written. Coors Container Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 628 F.2d 1283, 1287 (10th Cir. 1980).

[3] At this meeting in Jones' office, Boyle was at least cautioned, if not formally warned, about his future behavior.

On June 26, Boyle filed with the Board an unfair labor practice charge against Sullair asserting that he was wrongly fired for insubordination to Sommers. After a hearing, the Administrative Law Judge concluded that Boyle was engaged in activity protected under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 157) when he voiced his June 1st complaint about the changed gasoline policy, that his obscene language in the course of the protest was not so serious as to deny him the Act's protection, and that Sullair had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act (29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1)) by discharging Boyle for engaging in protected activity.

The Board affirmed these findings and ordered Sullair to offer to reinstate Boyle, to expunge from its records any reference to the discharge, to make Boyle whole for any loss of pay and benefits suffered, and to post an appropriate notice. The order also required Sullair to cease and desist from the unfair labor practice found and from interfering in any like or related manner with employee rights under Section 7. This petition for review followed.

II

It is undisputed that Boyle was engaged in a concerted activity protected under Section 7 when he used the obscene language. In Dreis & Krump Manufacturing Co., Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 544 F.2d 320, 329 (7th Cir. 1976), this Court stated that "communications occurring during the course of otherwise protected activity remain likewise protected unless * * * 'so violent or of such serious character as to render the employee unfit for further service.'" While it is for the Board to make an initial determination whether allegedly offensive conduct or language exceeds the protection of the Act, its determination will be disturbed on review when "illogical or arbitrary." National Labor Relations Board v. Thor Power Tool Co., 351 F.2d 584, 587 (7th Cir. 1965). Here we conclude that Boyle's insubordination clearly justified his discharge and that the Board's contrary determination was illogical and arbitrary.

The Administrative Law Judge found that the June 1st obscenities interspersed with Boyle's complaints about the gasoline policy were not so serious as to exceed the Act's protection because they were (1) not beyond the pattern of vulgar "shop talk" prevalent in the plant and (2) not directed at Sommers personally (App. 21-22) The record shows that employees at the plant were in fact given great latitude in lodging complaints and that the usage of vulgar or obscene words of sexual connotation was relatively common and tolerated. However, the record also shows that Boyle was an easily excitable person who used vulgar "shop talk" more than other employees and that in spite of warnings he did direct his obscenities at management. Finally, the record shows that the vulgar expressions used by Boyle at the June 1 meeting were directed at management and that he called Sommers a "f.....g poor manager."

We cannot condone Boyle's use of such vulgarities directed at management and Sommers in front of other employees, causing three of them to leave the meeting. It is clear that Boyle was fired shortly afterwards for insubordination in accordance with his December 7th warning and not because he protested the new gasoline policy. The record is devoid of anything to the contrary. Other employees who questioned the gas policy on May 31 and June 1 were not disciplined, and Sommers was willing to continue the dialogue with them until Boyle's disruptive behavior ended the June 1 meeting. Indeed, Boyle admitted in his charge lodged with the Labor Board that he was fired for his insubordination to Controller Sommers. More important, the Administrative Law Judge (whose decision was adopted with an immaterial exception by the Labor Board) twice found that Boyle's June 1st conduct was the overriding reason for his discharge (App. 21). We conclude therefore that the record as a whole fails to support the Board's determination that the overriding reason for Sullair's discharge of Boyle following the June 1st meeting was his vigorous protest of the changed gasoline policy rather than his outrageous behavior punctuated by shouted obscenities.

Our holding here is consistent with our recent decision in National Labor Relations Board v. Truck

Drivers, Oil Drivers, Etc., 630 F.2d 505 (1980) (hereafter "Teamsters Local 705"). There the executive officer of the employer issued two employees a warning in December 1976 that they would be dismissed unless their work records improved. In April 1977, instead of following established procedures for seeking pay increases, the employees distributed a letter repeating their wage demands to the employer's executive board during a political luncheon for Chicago's then mayor, "to the potential embarrassment" of their employer (at p. 508). That afternoon they were fired for insubordination. Although the Labor Board held that the employees were engaged in activity protected by Section 7 of the Act and therefore ordered their reinstatement with back pay, we denied enforcement of the order. Our rationale was that in these circumstances "the employer's right to performance of assigned duties in a loyal manner" overbalanced the employee's right to petition (at p. 509). The panel added (ibid.):

> "The National Labor Relations Act is directed toward recognition of the legitimate rights of both employer and employees, 29 U.S.C. § 141(a). There must be room in the law for a right of an employer somewhere, some time, at some stage, to free itself of continuing, unproductive, internal, and improper harassment."

Teamsters Local 705 was based on sound precendent. As the Fifth Circuit stated in Florida Steel Corporation v. National Labor Relations Board, 529 F.2d 1225, 1234 (1976):

> "Section 7 rights are a shield against employer retaliation, not a sword with which one may threaten or curse supervisors. Corriveau & Routhier Cement Block, Inc. v. NLRB, 410 F.2d 347, 350 (1st Cir. 1969). Neither threats of violence nor insubordination constitute protected activities."

Thus in Chemvet Laboratories, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 497 F.2d 445 (8th Cir. 1974), the court reversed the Labor Board's order requiring Chemvet Laboratories to offer employee Connie Ellis reinstatement to her job with make-whole pay. Before the regular quitting time she ceased production and was told by one of the two principal shareholders of the company that it was not yet time to quit and to return to work. However, Ellis refused to do so and referred to the shareholder as a "son-of-a-bitch." When she continued to refuse to work, she was discharged. Although the Administrative Law Judge found, as here, that vulgar language was not uncommon in the plant, those using it, apart from Ellis, did not refer to their supervisor in profane terms in their presence. Because of her aggravated conduct toward a superior, the court held that Section 7 did not operate to suspend the company's right to discharge Ellis for cause (497 F.2d at 452).

Similarly, in National Labor Relations Board v. Prescott Industrial Products Company, 500 F.2d 6 (8th Cir. 1974), the court refused to enforce the Labor Board's order to reinstate with back pay three employees who had been discharged for insubordination where the employees had been disruptive and used abusive language directed at management during a plant manager's lawful speech to a group of employees.

Finally, in Boaz Spinning Company v. National Labor Relations Board, 395 F.2d 512 (5th Cir. 1968), the company had discharged R. C. Alexander for insubordination. During a meeting called by the plant manager, the employees were told they could not make speeches but that after the plant manager's speech he would try to answer any employee questions. When Alexander attempted to make a talk after the close of the plant manager's speech, the plant manager told him to sit down until the plant manager finished answering questions. However, after sitting down momentarily, Alexander jumped up and pointed his finger at the plant manager and said that he was "no different than Castro." Alexander was thereupon fired for insubordination. The court of appeals agreed with the trial examiner that Alexander's Castro remark was made in a deliberate and defiant manner and was a form of flagrant disloyalty warranting his immediate discharge. The Labor Board had disagreed with the trial examiner and ordered his reinstatement. There, as here, the employee was violating the employer's rules and using intemperate language in front of other employees. Consequently, the company was upheld in ordering his discharge and the Board's petition to enforce its order was denied.

In our view, the above-cited authorities control the disposition of this case, where Boyle's complaint about Sullair's new gas policy was not even "a motivating factor" in his discharge. See Mt. Healthy City Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 287, 97 S.Ct. 568, 576, 50 L.Ed.2d 471, Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150 (August 27, 1980). Since Boyle's offensive conduct on June 1st was found by the Labor Board to be "the overriding reason" for his discharge,[4] Sullair did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, enforcement will be denied.

[4] Our own decisions hold a discharge to be illegal if a "bad" motive contributes in a significant way to the discharge. E. g., National Labor Relations Board v. Pfizer, Inc., 629 F.2d 1272, 1275, 1277 (7th Cir. 1980) (per curiam). Here there was no substantial evidence to support a finding of a bad motive.

TRW–United Greenfield Division v. NLRB

637 F.2d 410 (5th Cir.), February 20, 1981; rehearing granted in part September 24, 1981—245 NLRB 1158

On petition to review Board Order

Before HENDERSON, POLITZ and WILLIAMS, Circuit Judges

412

JERRE S. WILLIAMS, Circuit Judge: TRW-United Greenfield Division ("the Company") petitions for review, and the National Labor Relations Board cross-petitions for enforcement, of an order of the Board, 245 N.L.R.B. No. 147, adopting the findings and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge that TRW-United violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (1976), during unionization efforts among TRW-United's employees at its Evans, Georgia plant. The Board found that the Company committed unfair labor practices by coercively interrogating certain employees concerning the own and other employees' union activities, soliciting an employee to report on the union activities of other employees, and threatening employees with loss of jobs, loss of promotions, plant closure, and a regressive bargaining posture if they unionized. The International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW ("the Union") has intervened to seek denial of the Company's petition and enforcement of the Board's order.

The question presented for review is whether the Board's finding that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act through coercive interrogation, solicitation, and the making of certain threats is supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole.

I.

The Facts

The Company is an Ohio corporation engaged in diversified manufacturing, with plants located throughout the country. This case involves its plants at Evans, Georgia, which is engaged in the manufacturing of high speed cutting tools. The Evans plant commenced operations in 1974, and at times material herein employed in excess of 600 employees.

In January, 1977, the Union began organizational activities among the Company's employees by conducting a meeting and obtaining signatures on a number of authorization cards. After a temporary suspension of overt activity, the Union resumed its organization drive in May of 1977, and, on October 18, 1977, petitioned the Board for a representation election. The election was held on December 16, 1977, and the employees voted 354 to 198 against union representation.

During the three months prior to the election, both the Company and the Union bombarded the employees with campaign propaganda. The Company engaged in a number of instances of conduct which the Administrative Law Judge and the Board found constituted unfair labor practices and which are the subject of the petition and cross-petition before this Court.

In describing these activities chronologically, we are eliminating some instances of interrogation which the Board found coercive but which may not meet the substantial evidence test. There are two instances, however, which clearly meet the test in our view, and we shall describe them and other events related to them in our chronological report.

Around the first of October, Supervisor Archie Burke approached employee Milton Andrews at Andrews' work station and asked him what he thought about the Union and what his reasons were for supporting it. Andrews replied by alluding to job security, access to management regarding employee problems, and better fringe benefits.[1]

On October 7, the Company sent a letter to all of its employees which stated in part:

> As all of you know, out plant in Plymouth, Michigan was closed and shut down permanently for economic reasons. The UAW Union was in that plant and took money from the paychecks of the employees in due, fees and other charges.
> The Union is attempting to get authorization cards signed which could commit you to obligations and liabilities that could interfere with your job, your pay, and your home life and your future. We, therefore, ask you not to sign a Union > card or anything else until and unless you know exactly what your obligations and liabilities will be if you do.

Around the first part of November, employee Milton Andrews was in the office of Safety and Training Director Sam Wyse in the personnel section on a personal matter. With no one else present, Wyse asked Andrews what the employees in the plant thought about him (Wyse). Andrews replied that he "could not tell" Wyse. Wyse then asked Andrews what Andrews thought about the Union. Andrews again responded that there was "nothing [he] could tell" Wyse. Finally, Wyse asked Andrews if he would sit in on union meetings and report back to him what "was going on." Andrews replied that he could not do anything like that.

At some time before Thanksgiving, Director Wyse instructed employee Willie Sutton, a known Union organizer, to clock in and tell his foreman that he would be in Wyse's office for a while. When Sutton came to Wyse's office, Wyse told him that he wanted to talk about the Union. Wyse then asked, "What do you know about the Union, what's happening, * * * [T]ell me something." Sutton replied, "[I]t's not for me to tell you what's going on." When Wyse assured Sutton that any reply would be confidential and personal, Sutton asked what he wanted to know. Wyse again asked, "What's happening?" Sutton replied that all he knew was that the employees wanted a union, and that they felt they were not being treated properly. He also alluded to a need for more pay and better sick leave. Wyse responded by saying that the Company was losing money and could not pay more at that time, but that "things are going to get better." Wyse then commented that "there's quite a few people been to the union meetings," to which Sutton replied, "I do not count heads."

On about December 1, Supervisor Louis Eldridge approached employee Andrews at his job when no one else was present and asked him if he had signed a union card. When Andrews replied that he was considering such an act, Eldridge told him that the Union could be of "no significant value" to the employees.

During the two weeks immediately preceding the December 16 election, Operations Manager Roland Springstroh, who was chief operations officer of the Evans plant as well as of two other Company plants, conducted a series of approximately twenty meetings with the employees in which he attempted to dissuade them from unionization. At these meetings, Springstroh made comments from a prepared text and then entertained questions from the employees. At each of these meetings some employee would ask what would be the starting point of contract negotiations in the event of unionization. At this point Springstroch would hold up a blank sheet of paper, which always would be conveniently available, and tell the employees:

When an employee asked Springstroh if "you're going to take my benefits away from me" if the Union came in, Springstroh replied, "No, I did not say that;" "[w]hen we sit down at the bargaining table we start from scratch, nothing." At another meeting, Springstroh said, "I'm not saying you will lose any benefits, I'm just saying when we, me and the negotiators, sit down at the negotiating table, we will start off with a blank sheet of paper." Springstroh also told the employees at these meetings that bargaining could go on for months or indefinitely, and gave no assurance that the Company would bargain in good faith.

[1] Pursuant to instructions from Employee Relations Manager Jim Bailey, each Company supervisor maintained throughout the fall campaign a weekly roster of the employees under his supervision which indicated each employees's position in the campaign for that week. A plus indicated support for the Company, and a minus indicated support for the Union.

During the week of the election, Employee Relations Manager Jim Bailey engaged employee Willie Sutton in a lengthy conversation about the Union. In the course of that discussion, Bailey spoke at length about the closings of two other Company plants, one in Detroit, Michigan, which had been represented by the Union, and one in Chicago, which had been unrepresented.

Bailey told Sutton that the Detroit plant had been closed for economic reasons in that "they couldn't afford it, they (the Union) was driving 'em out of the business through higher wages, you know, it was outrageous, they was asking for outrageous things." Referring to the Evans, Georgia plant, Bailey then stated, "[W]ell, if they sold us out and didn't want to pay those wages, they could just close down and write it off as a tax loss."

On December 14, Supervisor Tony Leitner engaged in an informal discussion about the Union with a group of employees. When one employee asked Leitner what would happen to their present benefits if the Union came in, Leitner replied, "[W]e would start with a blank sheet of paper." After a commnet from the employee, Leitner continued by saying that "they would sit down at the table with a blank piece of paper and would negotiate a contract. These are the benefits you get, maybe the union would want to give up some of these and here are some more of these or whatever."

Finally, about two days before the election, Director Wyse approached employee Sutton at Sutton's machine and told him that he would like to have him on the Company's side. Wyse then said, "[Y]ou can go places with the Company, you've got the ability to go places, you know, we are in the process of making things better and you've got the ability to go places."

After losing the December 16 election, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges and elections objections.[2] Agreeing with the Administrative Law Judge, with a few minor exceptions not relevant here, the Board found that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by (1) engaging in coercive interrogation in the above described encounter between Company personnel and employees Andrews, Sutton, and others; (2) soliciting employee Andrews to attend Union meetings and report the activities of the Union to management; (3) threatening employee Sutton with plant closure if the employees unionized and also with loss of promotion for supporting the Union; (4) threatening the employees as a whole with plant closure and loss of jobs in its October 7 letter; and (5) threatening, at the Springstroh and the Leitner meetings, to take a regressive bargaining stance which would jeopardize existing benefits if the employees unionized.

The Board's order directs the Company to cease and desist from coercively interrogating employees; threatening loss of existing benefits, closing of the plant, loss of jobs, loss of promotion, or other reprisals; and soliciting employees to report on the union activities of other employees. The order also includes the usual proscription in general terms forbidding the Company from interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in any like or related manner in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by § 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). Affirmatively, the Board's order directs the Company to post appropriate notices.

II.

The Unfair Labor Practice

Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), prohibits employers from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their right of, inter alia, self-organization under § 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). The test for determining whether an employer has violated § 8(a)(1) is whether the employer's questions, threats, or statements tend to be coercive, not whether the employees are in fact coerced. Sturgis Newport Bus.

[2] The Union's election objections were consolidated with the unfair labor practice charges for purpose of hearing and determination. The Board's election objection rulings did not result in a final order and thus are not before this court. See Hendrix Manufacturing Co., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 321 F.2d 100, 106 (5th Cir. 1963).

of the circumstances in which that particular instance of conduct occurred. N.L.R.B. v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d 1338, 1342 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 246, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980); N.L.R.B. v. Varo, Inc., 425 F.2d 293, 298 (5th Cir. 1970). "Remarks that may not appear coercive when considered in isolation may take on a different meaning when evaluated with respect to the totality of the circumstances." N.L.R.B. v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d at 1341 (quoting N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals, Div. of Kaiser A. & C. Corp., 473 F.2d 374, 381 (5th Cir. 1973)).

A. Coercive Interrogation

Employer interrogation into union activities is not per se illegal. N.L.R.B. v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d at 1342; Ridgewood Management Co. v. N.L.R.B., 410 F.2d 738, 740 (5th Cir. 1969), cert denied, 396 U.S. 832, S.Ct. 87, 24 L.Ed.2d 83 (1969). However, any interrogation of employees by an employer "presents an ever present danger of coercing employees in violation of their § 7 rights." N.L.R.B. v. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co., 613 F.2d at 1342; Texas Industries, Inc. v. N.L.R.B. 336 F.2d 128, 133 (5th Cir. 1964). In determining whether certain interrogation tends to be coercive in the totality of the circumstances, the following factors are to be considered: (1) the history of the employer's attitude toward its employees; (2) the nature of the information sought; (3) the rank of the official of the employer in the employer's hierarchy; (4) the place and manner of the conversation; (5) the truthfulness of the employees' reply; (6) whether the employer has a valid purpose in obtaining information concerning the union; (7) whether this valid purpose, if existent, is communicated to the employees; and (8) whether the employer assures the employees that no reprisals will be taken if the support they union. Sturgis Newport Bus. Forms, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 563 F.2d at 1256; Florida Steel Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 529 F.2d 1225, 1229 (5th Cir. 1976); N.L.R.B. v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d 803, 804 (5th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 926, 86 S.Ct. 313, 15 L.Ed.2d 339 (1965). This list is not exhaustive, however, and coercion may occur even if all of these factors operate in favor of the employer. Sturgis Newport Bus. Forms, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 563 F.2d at 1256; N.L.R.B. v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d at 804.

In this case, the Board found that the Company engaged in eight instances of coercive interrogation of its employees. Applying the substantial evidence standard, it is questionable whether the Board's finding of coercive interrogation as to all of them is supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole.

It is unnecessary, however, to search for substantial evidence in all the instances, since substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's finding of coercive interrogation in the encounters between Wyse and Andrews around the first part of November, and between Wyse and Sutton at some time before Thanksgiving. These instances are related in the facts, supra.

The conversation between Safety and Training Director Wyse and employee Andrews in the former's office around the first part of November constituted coercive interrogation on the Company's part, applying the above criteria for determining whether certain interrogation tends to be coercive. First, although there is no history of unfair practices at the Company's Evans, Georgia plant, the Company engaged in a systematic effort to ascertain the union sympathies of its employees throughout the campaign. This effort was accomplished by having each Company supervisor talk to and observe the employees under his supervision and maintain, pursuant to instructions from Employee Relations Manager Jim Bailey, a weekly roster of his particular employees that indicated which employees supported the Company and which supported the Union for that week. Additionally, by this time the Company had implicitly indicated its opposition to the Union in the October 7 letter which it sent to all of its employees. Repeated efforts by an employer to determine who supports the union, coupled with employer opposition to the union, may be considered as background when determining whether a conversation tends to be coercive, Sturgis Newport Bus. Forms, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 563 F.2d at 1257.

Second, the information sought by Wyse was of a coercive nature. Wyse asked Andrews what the employees thought of him and also what Andrews thought of the Union. Although this information sought by Wyse was more innocuous than would have been information concerning the identities of the union leaders, it was more potentially harmful to the employees in terms of possible Company retaliation than would have been casual information regarding how the Union was doing. See N.L.R.B. v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d at 807.

Third, as a Director, Wyse held a relatively high rank in the Company. Fourth, the conversation took place in Wyse's office, a place of authority or "unnatural formality," N.L.R.B. v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d at 804, rather than at Andrews' work station or at some "neutral" location. Additionally, Wyse conducted his interrogation at a time when Andrews was seeking assistance from Wyse on a personal matter and was therefore potentially more susceptible to responding to such questioning.

Fifth, Andrews gave evasive answers to Wyse's questions, indicating he feared possible retaliation against himself or other employees by Wyse or other Company officials if he were to give honest and direct answers. "If an employee refuses to give a truthful answer even to an innocuous question, the inference of coercion is as strong as if he refused to answer a pointed question." Id. 807.

Sixth, there is no indication in the evidence that Wyse or the Company had a valid purpose for inquiring into the employee's feelings about Wyse or Andrews' attitude toward the Union. Seventh, even if such a purpose existed, Wyse did not communicate it to Andrews. Finally, Wyse gave Andrews no assurance that there would be no reprisals against either Andrews or the other employees. "Questioning is much more likely to have a coercive effect if the purpose of the interrogation is not explained and if there are no assurances against retaliation." N.L.R.B. v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d at 807 (citing Martin Sprocket & Gear Co. v. N.L.R.B., 329 F.2d 417 (5th Cir. 1964)).

The conversation between Wyse and employee Sutton at some time before Thanksgiving similarly sustained a finding of coercive interrogation. Again, the encounter occurred in the context of the Company's opposition to the Union and its systematic effort throughout the campaign to ascertain the union sympathies of its employees. The questions, although general on their face, sought specific responses, including possibly the identities of the employees who had attended Union meetings. The questioner, Director Wyse, was again a high ranking Company official; and the questioning took place in the authoritative setting of the official's office, a fact attributable to the official's explicit request that the employee come to his office.

Moreover, Sutton refused to answer Wyse's probing questions about the Union's activities until receiving assurances of confidentiality; and, although he then began to discuss the Union with Wyse, he still gave an evasive response to Wyse's leading comment regarding employee attendance at the Union meetings. Thus, even Wyse's implicit assurance that no reprisals would be taken did not dispel Sutton's apparent concern over discussing the Union too extensively with a Company official. Finally, there is no indication that either Wyse or the Company had a valid purpose for questioning Sutton, or that, if such a purpose existed, it was communicated to Sutton.

That Sutton publically exhibited his support of and leadership in the Union does not alter the suggestion of coercion. Although an employee has openly declared his support for the union, the employer is not thereby free to probe directly or indirectly into his reason for supporting the union. ITT Automotive Electrical Products Division, 231 N.L.R.B. 878 (1977). "[S]uch probing tends to have a coercive effect upon employees, whether or not the employees have openly declared their support for a union." Id.; see also Paceco, A Division of Freuhauf Corp., 273 N.L.R.B. 399, 400 (1978), vacated on other grounds, 601 F.2d 180 (5th Cir. 1979). Sutton was knowledgeable and may well not have been coerced in this confrontation, which maintained a facade of friendliness. However, if an interrogation is coercive in nature it makes no difference that actual coercion was not achieved in the particular instance. See Sturgis Newport Bus. Forms, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 563 F.2d at 1256.

The Company relies on Federal-Mogul Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 566 F.2d 1245 (5th Cir. 1978), and Delco-Remy Division v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1979), in support of its contention that the Board's finding of instances of coercive interrogation was erroneous. These cases are inapposite, however. In Federal-Mogul, the Court found that there was no systematic campaign of monitoring union sentiments; that the employer's official and the employees were longstanding friends; that the questions were asked by low-echelon supervisors; that the employees were interrogated informally and casually at their work stations or during their break periods; and that the employees' replies were truthful and without fear. 566 F.2d at 1250–51. Similarly, in Delco-Remy, the questioning was not systematic; most of the interrogators were low-level supervisors; the conversations took place at the employees' work stations; and the employees questioned gave candid and bold answers. 596 F.2d at 1310.

Accordingly, we find that there is sufficient evidence to uphold a Board finding of at least two instances of coercive interrogation.

B. Solicitation to Report on Union Activities

During their conversation in Wyse's office around the first part of November, Director Wyse solicited employee Andrews to attend Union meetings and report to management the activities of the Union. Although unsuccessful, this request constituted an impermissible interference with the employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. See, e.g., N.L.R.B. v. Citizens Hotel Co., 313 F.2d 708, 709 (5th Cir. 1963) (instructing employee to engage in surveillance of union meeting); N.L.R.B. v. Duval Engineering & Contracting Co., 311 F.2d 291, 292 (5th Cir. 1962) (requesting employees to act as informers with respect to union activities); Independent, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 406 F.2d 203, 205 (5th Cir. 1969) (manager's request of two employees that they "let him know if they heard any union talk").

Therefore, we hold that the Board properly based its order in part on a finding of solicitation of an employee to report on union activities.

C. Threats of Plant Closure, Job Loss, and Loss of Promotion

It is well settled that employer threats of plant closure, job loss, and loss of promotion in the event of unionization or support for a union are violative of § 8(a)(1) of the Act. See e.g., N.L.R.B. v. Pope Maintenance Corp., 573 F.2d 898, 905 (5th Cir. 1978); N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals, Div. of Kaiser A. & C. Corp., 473 F.2d 374, 380–81 (5th Cir. 1973). Section 8(a)(1) is violated if, under the totality of the circumstances, "the employees could reasonably conclude that the employer is threatening economic reprisals if they support the Union." Hendrix Manufacturing Co. v. N.L.R.B., 321 F.2d 100, 105 (5th Cir. 1963); see also N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals, 473 F.2d at 381.

An employer may express to his employees his general view about unionism or any of his specific views about a particular union, as long as such expression does not contain a "threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." 29 U.S.C. § 158(c) (1976); N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547, 580 (1969). An employer may even make a prediction as to the economic consequences he believes unionization will have on his business. Gissel Packing, 395 U.S. at 618, 89 S.Ct. at 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d at 580.

> In such a case, however, the prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control. * * * (citation omitted). If there is any implication that an employer may or may not take action solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessities and known only to him, the statement is no longer a reasonable prediction based on available facts but a threat of retaliation based on misrepresentation and coersion * * *.

Id. at 618, 89 S.Ct. at 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d at 580–81. An employer's conveyance of his belief, however sincere, that the plant would or might close as a result of unionization is not a statement of fact unless the possibility of closing is capable of proof, a situation which is highly unlikely. Id. at 618–19, 89 S.Ct. at 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d at 581.

Substantial evidence supports the Board's findings that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) by twice theatening plant closure and loss of jobs in the event of unionization. The first instance was in the letter of October 7 to all employees. The second was in the conversation between Director Wyse and employee Sutton about two days before the election. In this conversation, Sutton also was threatened with loss of promotion for supporting the Union.

The Company's October 7 letter, sent to all of its employees, stated that the Company's Plymouth, Michigan plant, where the Union "took money from the paychecks of the employees," had been closed permanently "for economic reasons." It then admonished the employees "not to sign" a Union card until they knew exactly what their obligations and liabilities to the Union would be. The reference in the letter to the closing of the Company plant in Plymouth, Michigan, where collective bargaining was established, could be found reasonably to imply that the Company might take similar action at the Evans plant as a retaliatory measure in the event of unionization there. This result holds despite the letter's statement that the closing of the Plymouth plant had been "for economic reasons."

Contrary to the Company's contentions, the reference to the closing of the Plymouth plant did not serve merely to indicate the effect of high union dues and obligations on union employees, or to illustrate that the Union does not always help its members. While high employee wages may bear on the economic condition of a business, high union dues, which the letter addressed, have no direct relevance at all.

Further, the letter does not constitute a permissible prediction, under Gissel Packing, of the economic consequences of unionization at the Evans plant, since it makes no reference to possible economic consequences at the Evans plant, and since any such reference would not have been susceptible to the requisite proof. The coercive nature of the Company's reference to the Plymouth plant is particularly validated by the testimony of Employee Relations Manager Bailey that the Union at the Plymouth plant had offered to negotiate lower wages to keep that plant open, and that labor costs were not a significant factor underlying the Plymouth plant's poor economic condition. The implication in the letter to the employees does not accord with these facts established at the Board's hearing.

The Company similarly threatened plant closure and job loss in the conversation between Employee Relations Manager Bailey and employee Sutton during the week of the election. During that conversation, Bailey stated that the Company's plant in Detroit had been closed because the Union has demanded excessive wages and other benefits. Bailey then said that if similar demands were made at the Evans plant by a union, the Company could simply close down the Evans plant and write it off as a tax loss. Bailey's comments constitued an explicit threat that the Company might close down the Evans plant in the event of excessive wage demands resulting from unionization. Further, this threat was strengthened by Bailey's linking unionization with excessive wage demands in his reference to the Detroit plant. There is some evidence that labor costs were not the decisive factor in the closing of the Detroit plant, but there is no indication that this fact was ever communicated to Sutton.

The Company also threatened employee Sutton with loss of promotion if he supported the Union. During the conversation between Diretor Wyse and employee Sutton two days before the election, Wyse told Sutton that he (Wyse) would like to have Sutton on the Company's side in the campaign. Wyse then told Sutton that Sutton "had the ability to go places" with the Company. The close association of these two statements, combined with the coercive interrogation Sutton had undergone in Wyse's office a few weeks earlier, could very likely lead Sutton reasonably to conclude that his ability to "go places" with the Company in terms of promotions was contingent upon his siding with the Company in the campaign and election. In realistic industrial terms, a possible future opportunity for promotion to supervisor was dangled before Sutton if he would side with the Company.

The Board's findings that the Company threatened its employees with plant closure, job loss, and loss of promotion in the event of unionization are supported by substantial evidence. We uphold them.

D. Threats of a Regressive Bargaining Posture

The Board found coercive and in violation of §(a)(1) the statements made by Operations Manager Springstroh throughout his 20 meetings with the employees, and by Supervisor Leitner during his informal discussion with a few employees two days before the election. These statements were that bargaining would begin "from scratch" or with a "blank sheet of paper" if the Union were to win the election. In our view, these findings are supported by substantial evidence.

" 'Bargaining from scratch' is a dangerous phrase which carries with it the seed of a threat that the employer will become punitively intransigent in the event the union wins the election." Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., 228 N.L.R.B. 440 (1977). Whether such a statement is coercive depends upon the context in which it is uttered. If the "clearly articulated thrust of the bargaining-from-scratch statement is that the mere designation of a union will not automatically secure increases in wages and benefits, and that all such items are subject to bargaining," id. at 441, no coercion will be found. If, however, the statement > can reasonably be read in context as a threat by the employer either to unilaterally discontinue existing benefits prior to negotiations, or to adopt a regressive bargaining posture designed to force a reduction of existing benefits for the purpose of penalizing the employee for choosing collective representation, id., a violation will be found. "[Bargaining-from-scratch] statements are objectionable when, in context, they effectively threaten employees with a loss of existing benefits and leave them with the impression that what they may ultimately receive depends in large measure upon what the union can induce the Employer to restore." Plastronics, Inc., 233 N.L.R.B. 155, 156 (1977). When a close question exists, "[t]he presence of contemporaneous threats or unfair labor practices is often a critical factor in determining whether there is a threatening color to the employer's remarks." Coach & Equipment Sales Corp., 228 N.L.R.B. at 441.

Springstroh's statement did not explicitly threaten that the Company would discontinue existing benefits prior to negotiations. They did however, implicitly threaten that the Company would adopt a regressive bargaining posture designed to force a reduction of existing benefits as a penalty for a Union victory in the election, Springstroh's remarks likely left the employees with the impression that the benefits they ultimately would receive in the event of unionization would depend largely upon what the Union could induce the Company to restore. This conclusion is especially true in light of the high rank of Springstroh in the Company and against the background of the other unfair labor practices committed by the Company prior to and contemporaneously with these meetings. Even occasional assurances that all benefits would be negotiable and could either go up, down, or remain the same do not alter this result, considering Springstroh's high rank, his constant emphasis of bargaining "from a blank sheet of paper," his statements that bargaining could go on for months, the Company's other unfair labor practices, and Springstroh's continuous graphic use of a blank sheet of paper to illustrate his point. See Plastronics, Inc., 233 N.L.R.B. 155 (1977) (even though company official stated at meetings that all benefits were negotiable and "could go up or down," bargain-from-scratch statements were coercive due largely to contemporaneous use of transparenices projected on screen which indicated that bargaining would begin without any existing benefits). These factors gave Springstroh's statements a much more significant character than that attributed to them by the Company, which contends without merit that these statements were merely replies to Union misrepresentations that the employees could not lose anything as a result of bargaining.

Supervisor Leitner's "blank-piece-of-paper" statements, made during his informal discussion with a few employees two days before the election, implied a similar threat of a regressive bargaining posture in the event of unionization. Leitner's statements were made contemporaneously with the statements made by Springstroh, and were merely reiterations of the threats implied in Springstroh's statements.

Accordingly, we uphold the Board's findings that the Company, in violation of § 8(a)(1), threatened its employees with the assumption of a regressive bargaining posture in the event of a Union victory in the election.

III.

Conclusion

We conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's findings that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) by engaging in coercive interrogation and solicitation, and by threatening plant closure, job loss, promotion loss, and a regressive bargaining posture. We therefore uphold the order of the Board and order its enforcement.

ENFORCED.

POLITZ, Circuit Judge, dissenting: Respectfully, I dissent from the majority's conclusion that the acts of the petitioner-employer (TRW) justify the heavy hand laid upon it by the Board. Although recognizing that ours is a limited scope of review with only substantial evidence necessary to support the Board's findings, my review of this record results in findings and conclusions which differ markedly from that of the majority. I find the credible evidence fails to justify the setting aside of the election results and the other relief ordered by the Board. For purposes of clarity, the headings in the majority opinion are used in the notation of my principal objections.

A. Coercive Interrogation

The ALJ, Board and majority found coercive interrogation. The ALJ and Board found eight instances; the majority found two, noting that it was questionable whether the others were supported by substantial evidence. I do not share the majority's hesitance or uncertainty; the instances glossed over are not supported by substantial evidence. For example, a new supervisor, Gisela Wilson, called an employee, George Thomas, into her office to inquire how he felt about the union. According to Thomas, he told her that he had not made up his mind. Wilson responded that it was his decision to make and she apologized for asking. Incredibly, the ALJ concluded: "I find that her interrogation of Thomas was coercive."

Other equally "compelling" examples of coercive interrogation found by the Board include two instances of a supervisor asking an employee what he thought about the union, one instance of a supervisor asking an employee what he thought about the company, a supervisor asking an employee if he was going to a union meeting, and a supervisor telling an employee who had been wearing a union badge: "I see you don't have your badge on today."

The majority opinion focuses on conversations between Safety and Training Director Sam Wyse and employees Milton Andrews and Willie Sutton. None of these three were employed by TRW at the time of the hearing before the ALJ. Wyse did not testify, and the testimony of Andrews and Sutton is singularly unimpressive. I conclude that they in fact were not coerced by their conversations with Wyse, nor were these conversations reasonably likely to coerce or intimidate these men. Wyse tried to pump Sutton about union activities; he got nowhere. If anyone were intimidated in that discussion, it obviously was not Sutton.

The conversation with Andrews is equally insipid with one minor exception, a mote which became a beam in the eye of the ALJ and Board. Wyse inquired of Andrews of the attitude of the employees. Wyse wanted to know what the employees thought of him. I admit to a total failure of comprehension how this could possibly constitute coercive interrogation. Wyse was not circumspect, he asked Andrews to go to union meetings and brief him on what "was going on." Andrews refused and that was the end of that episode. Wyse should not have asked, but he got an unqualified answer which concluded the matter. This does not rise to the level of misconduct sufficient to set aside an election.

The conversation detailed in the ALJ findings, more particularly the whole of the conversations as contained in the transcript, are representative of the hyperbole and rhetoric neither foreign nor uncommon to an election contest. There were things which should not have been said on both sides, but these instances of excesses did not so permeate the election atmosphere as likely to lead to an impermissibly distorted result.

B. Solicitation to Report on Union Activities

This incident has already been alluded to. Wyse asked Andrews to attend union meetings and, in the language of the majority, "report to management the activities of the Union." Wyse should not have done this. As noted, Wyse did not testify. It is impossible to know with certainty his purpose, motivation or intent from this record. Regardless, this impropriety does not justify today's ruling.

C. Threats of Plant Closure, Job Loss and Loss of Promotion

Much is made about these allegations, but as I view the evidence, it merely points to the rhetoric and semantic excesses of a moderately heated election campaign. I conclude that the record does not support the finding that anything said or written by TRW representatives could reasonably be interpreted as (1) a threat to close the plant, (2) a threat of job loss, or (3) a threat to loss of promotion if the employees voted union. Spectres were raised by both sides. As the ALJ correctly concluded regarding a number of other allegations, this was all part of the election campaign and the employees could sort it out, just as is done in other election matters. Much is also made of the October 7, 1977 letter which TRW sent to its employees in response to a letter dated September 30, 1977 which the Union had sent to the employees. That letter ended with the exhortation: "We, therefore, ask you not to sign a Union Card or anything else until and unless you know exactly what your obligations and liabilities will be if you do." It strains credulity that this statement is found to be evidence of an unfair labor practice. I find it to be sound advice to be offered in any situation: know what you are signing, and its effects, before you sign.

D. Threats of a Regressive Bargaining Posture

Finally, TRW is faulted because its manager, Roland Springstroh, and a supervisor made statements in which they purportedly threatened to take a regressive or intransigent bargaining position if the Union were successful in the election. I am in total disagreement with this finding. It is correct that these men informed the employees that bargaining sessions would begin "from scratch" and that the negotiators would start with a "blank sheet of paper," the latter statement being graphically demonstrated by holding up a blank sheet of paper. This plain vanilla bit of dramatics somehow becomes unclean and then illegal. I believe it to be neither.

Critical evidence in this aspect of the dispute was noted by the ALJ, who referred to the testimony of Springstroh telling the employees that "during negotiations, wages and benefits could go up, remain the same, or go down." An editorial in the company newspaper contained the same statement and testimony of employees corroborated Springstroh.

I differ with my colleagues in the majority when they conclude that the "blank paper" and "bargain from scratch" scenario constitutes an unfair labor practice which warrants the Board's order.

Conclusion

The ALJ's findings of coercive interrogation are purely conclusory. He failed to follow the test first enunciated in Bourne v. N.L.R.B., 332 F.2d 47 (2d Cir. 1964), and subsequently adopted by this circuit and underscored on several occasions. See Federal-Mogul Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 566 F.2d 1245, 1250 (5th Cir. 1978), and cases there cited. The majority opinion attempts to fill this void in a careful and scholarly manner. I remain unconvinced.

Today's holding is inconsistent with our prior decisions, particularly the holdings in Paceco v. N.L.R.B., 601 F.2d 180 (5th Cir. 1979), Delco-Remy Div., General Motors Corp. V. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1979), and Federal-Mogul, supra. In Federal-Mogul we refused to enforce an order of the Board which was based, inter alia, on alleged coercive interrogation and statements. The Federal-Mogul court noted the ALJ's failure (actually refusal) to apply the Bourne test. In Delco-Remy we denied enforcement of an order ostensibly based on coercive interrogation, soliciting aid against the union, and threatening discharge. The Delco-Remy court did not find these charges supported by substantial evidence. In Paceco we vacated an order of the Board and remanded for failure of the Board to set forth the legal standards by which it determined that the interrogation was coercive. The Paceco court again underscored the viability of the Bourne standards which the Board had failed to apply, just as the ALJ and Board failed in the case at bar.

Based on my appreciation of the credible evidence in this record and my understanding of the teachings of our prior jurisprudence, particularly the trilogy cited in the foregoing paragraph which I find controlling and dispositive, I would deny enforcement of the Board's order. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

NLRB v. Flite Chief, Inc.; Richard Miller and Karen Miller; M & M Truckadero Coffee Shop, Inc.; James Miller and Paul Minder

640 F.2d 989 (9th Cir.), February 23, 1981—246 NLRB 407

On petition to enforce Board order

Before CHAMBERS and GOODWIN, Circuit Judges, and MURPHY,[*] District Judge

MURPHY, District Judge: Prior to this backpay proceeding, the Board had found that Flite Chief violated the Act by discharging all of its coffee shop employees because of their union activities. This Court ordered enforcement of the Board's order. N.L.R.B. v. Flite Chief, 566 F.2d 1182 (9th Cir., 1974).

The parties being unable to agree upon the amount of backpay due the discriminatees, the Regional Director instituted the instant proceeding by the issuance of a backpay specification. Flite Chief denied any liability as to discriminatee Johnson, and claimed that it owed Templeton only a fraction of what was claimed in the specification. Although other discriminatees were involved, this appeal does not concern them.

After a 3-day hearing, the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) issued detailed findings recommending $1,080 for Johnson and $5,856 for Templeton. A panel of the Board affirmed the award to Johnson, and increased Templeton's to $23,803. This appeal followed.

Johnson

The only issue in Johnson was whether he was an employee at the time of the discharge, July 22, 1974. The General Counsel and Flite Chief agreed that a payroll journal did not reflect that Johnson was an employee during the week ending July 22, but Johnson offered a check stub indicating payment to him for the pay period ending July 22. In addition, there was in evidence a letter that Flite Chief had sent Johnson, as it did to all discharged employees, offering reinstatement.

We agree with the ALJ and the panel that Johnson was so employed and entitled to the backpay award of $1,080.

Templeton

The principal issues in Templeton are (1) whether the panel was legally justified in increasing Templeton's award by 400%, and (2) whether the Regional Director's denial of Flite Chief's application for leave to take depositions of the discriminatees and their interim employers was a denial of due process.

Templeton was employed in Flite Chief's coffee shop as a cook at $4.00 an hour. He was unlawfully discharged for union activities with the other employees of the coffee shop on July 22, 1974.

On October 18, 1978, the Regional Director issued the backpay specification and notice of hearing in the present proceeding. It alleged in part that Flite Chief's net backpay liability from July 22, 1974 to September 30, 1978 in Templeton's case totaled over $32,000.[*] This specification was amended and reduced by counsel for the General Counsel on the morning of January 16, 1979, the first day of the scheduled backpay hearing after Templeton advised counsel that morning of additional interim earnings from four separate employers of some $8,000.

Since Flite Chief had the burden of proof, it called Templeton and examined him at length on his seven different jobs after July 1974, including the last four at Vikings Table, Ontario Gold Club, Mountain View Country Club, and Your Host Restaurant which he had not reported to the Board's compliance officer until that morning, January 16, 1979.

The ALJ, who alone saw and heard Templeton testify (100 pages of stenographic transcript), found:

"His testimony in response to these questions [why he failed to report these four interim earnings] was inconsistent and implausible and his demeanor was unfavorable. Based upon his failure to credibly and convinctly explain why he failed to inform a representative of the Board about his interim earnings with the four employers above, I find that Templeton's intent was to willfully conceal these earnings in order to obtain more backpay than he was entitled to receive.

It is my opinion that, where a backpay claimant willfully conceals interim employment from the Board's compliance officer with an intent to fraudulently increase issuance of a backpay specification, the claimant should be penalized by disallowing all backpay from the date the claimant was first employed by an interim employer who earnings have been concealed until the claimant discloses these earnings to a representative of the Board. Accordingly, I shall recommend that Templeton's backpay be disallowed in its entirety from June 4, 1975, the approximate date when he began working for Vikings Table, until January 16, 1979, the date he disclosed his concealed interim earnings to a representative of the Board."

To fully understand this characterization of a witness in a judicial proceeding, it is important to recall that three of these four jobs were the last three jobs Templeton had before testifying on January 16, 1979, and covered the period of the first two quarters of 1975, the second, third and fourth quarters of 1977, and the third quarter of 1978.

The panel's rejection of such findings is phrased in the most polite language. It stated that it "has decided to affirm the rulings, findings and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge and to adopt his recommended order as modified herein."

Adopting the arguments and exceptions of the General Counsel that since Templeton voluntarily submitted the additional information in issue [the concealed earnings of some $8,000, from four interim employers], the panel concludes, "the fact remains that Templeton came forth voluntarily and supplied the General Counsel, albeit at the 11th hour, with the information necessary to present a more accurate picture of his interim employment status." (Emphasis ours)

Although the panel did not condone Templeton's method of furnishing the Board with requisite interim employer data or his decision to forego the Board's quarterly reports procedure, it concluded "we do not equate his conduct with an attempt to 'pervert a remedial order of the Board * * * into an instrument of * * * personal gain.' The fact that Templeton voluntarily submitted the missing information convinces us that he was not seeking to obtain more than his due." (Emphasis ours)

The phrases "voluntarily submitted" and "additional information," "missing information," "more accurate picture," "his decision to forego," etc. are truly words of art, particularly in the face of the finding by the ALJ that Templeton had willfully understated interim earnings to a representative of the Board for the purpose of receiving an amount of backpay in excess of the claimed actual loss, and that Templeton's testimony in explanation of his concealment of his interim employment from the Board's compliance officer until the morning of the hearing "was inconsistent and implausible and his demeanor was unfavorable."

What the panel didn't appreciate or explore, in our opinion, was the cause of Templeton's newly found religion or why, like Saul on his way to Damascus, he changed his way of life.

Like others before him, it was a simple thing. In this case it was a subpoena duces tecum served on Templeton shortly before the hearing date. In Hamlet, it was "the play's the thing wherein I'll catch the conscience of the King."

At p. 201 of the transcript, in Templeton's direct examination immediately after he had given his name and his address, these questions and answers are recorded:

> "Q Were you served with a subpoena by my office to bring certain documents and records here today to this hearing?
> A Yes, sir.
> Q Did you bring those documents and records pursuant to that subpoena?

992

> A Those that I have.
> Q And what did you have, and would you describe what is available for my inspection, sir; just briefly.
> A Paycheck stubs, W-2 forms.
> Q Are some of those paycheck stubs, W-2 forms, and what have you, the materials that have been reproduced by Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Prough that are now in evidence?
> A Yes, sir." [Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Prough were attorneys with the General Counsel and present at the hearing.]

In addition, Flite Chief's counsel had present in the hearing room witnesses from some of these employers, whom Templeton admitted that he knew.

It seems prefectly clear to us, as it did to the ALJ, that Templeton realized that the jig was up and the subpoena so jolted him that he was forced to reveal the true nature of his interim employment, sacrificing the windfall he had planned and possibly avoiding jail.

It is interesting to note, also, that the ALJ accepted the testimony of the various employers who testified, and rejected Templeton's as being unworthy of belief even on such simple matters as to whether he was fired or quit.

The panel also relied on the rankest hearsay from the mouth of Templeton to state, in its opinion: "We disagree with the Administrative Law Judge's assessment of Templeton's conduct in these circumstances." [Failing to file quarterly reports with the Board's regional Office], and supports that statement by a fn.3: "Templeton claimed that he was being harassed by Respondents, who he believed had learned of his whereabouts through the quarterly employment reports submitted to the Regional Office. The Administrative Law Judge discredited Templeton's testimony in this regard."

A reading of the hearing transcript for January 16, 1979 (pp. 236, 1. 24 to 240, 1. 4) would indicate to the least sophisticated person that Templeton was lying.

We reject, too, the panel's adoption of the General Counsel's argument that an affirmation of the ALJ's determination would be at odds with the overriding public policy implicit in the Act, that unlawful conduct, as committed by respondent, must be fully remedied. The major and minor premises of this syllogism are that no matter how egregious respondent's misconduct was, it may only be compelled to undo its wrong and not be penalized, because the Act is remedial and not punitive. The conclusion, however, that the ALJ has in effect imposed a penalty on Templeton which contravenes the intent of the statute is a non sequitur.

We find nothing in the Act which prohibits such recommendation of the ALJ, nor does it imply that the ALJ was in error in denying backpay for the period of Templeton's fraud, even though he called such denial a penalty. Calling it a penalty, or a remedy, or a diminution, or a set-off, or an abatement is not the test. The test is, does it effectuate the policies of the Act. The Supreme Court explained the breadth of that provision in Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 177, 198, 61 S.Ct. 845, 854, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941), when it said:

> "[W]e must avoid the rigidities of an either-or rule. The remedy of back pay, it must be remembered, is entrusted to the Board's discretion; it is not mechanically compelled by the Act. And in applying its authority over back pay orders, the Board has not used stereotyped formulas but has availed itself of the freedom given it by Congress to attain just results in diverse, complicated situations."

We agree, and adopt the ALJ's explanation and reasoning for his action disallowing any back pay for the period June 4, 1979 to January 16, 1979. Namely, that it was a salutary step in the administration of Board compliance proceedings.

Under § 10(c) of the Act, after a finding of an unfair labor practice the Board is empowered "to take such affirmative action, including reinstatement of employees with or without backpay, as will effectuate the policies of the Act." (Emphasis ours)

The key words in the power entrusted to the Board are "as will effectuate the policies of the Act." Compare, the Supreme Court's analysis of backpay awards under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended by the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1972, which was modeled on the N.L.R.A. backpay provision, in Albemarle Paper Co., et al. v. Moody, et al., 422 U.S. 405, 421–25, 95 S.Ct. 2362, 2373–75, 45 L.Ed.2d 280 (1975), together with Mr. Justice Rehnquist's analysis at 443–47, 95 S.Ct. at 2385–87.

We are statisfied that the panel's quadrupling of the award to Templeton from $5,856. to $23,803. is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those that can be fairly said to effectuate the policies of the Act. It rewards a discriminatee for his perfidy as opposed to discouraging such claimants from perverting an order issued in their and the public interest into a scheme for unjustifiable personal gain.

Due Process

It is not contested that Flite Chief appplied to the Regional Director for leave to take depositions of the discriminatees and the interim employers. The parties seem to agree that the Act does not specifically authorize or require the Board to adopt discovery proceedings. Whether the same applies to a backpay proceeding, we leave to another day, cf., Deering Milliken, Inc. v. Nash, Lab. Cas. 1976, ¶11,182-20,047 (D.C. S.C.1975).

We are satisfied that Flite Chief suffered no prejudice by the denial, since the backpay hearing was adjourned for three weeks to permit Flite Chief to interview all of the previously undisclosed interim employers and call them as witnesses.

The order of the Board will be enforced as rendered, except Templeton's award will be for only $5,856.

NLRB v. Goodsell & Vocke, Inc.

645 F.2d 680 (9th Cir.), February 23, 1981

On action to hold in civil contempt

Before TRASK and FARRIS,* Circuit Judges, and BURNS, District Judge

TRASK, Circuit Judge: Pursuant to a motion by the National Labor Relations Board (the Board), we hereby determine Goodsell & Vocke, Inc., Charles R. Vocke, and Glenara Vocke (the Respondents) to be in civil contempt of this court because of their failure to comply with our judgment and order of August 25, 1977, published at 559 F.2d 1141. The Respondents, therefore, are ordered to discharge themselves of this contempt by taking the following measures:

1. Signing the 1974–77 collective bargaining contract between the Painting and Decorating Contractors Association of Central Coast Counties, Inc. (the Association) and the District Counsel of Painters No. 33, Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL–CIO (the Union), and, within 15 days of the entry of this order, delivering an executed copy of the contract to the Union and a conforming copy to the Board.

2. Preserving all records relevant to determination of the amount of backpay and fringe benefits due to employees as a result of this court's 1977 judgment and order. Such records shall include: payroll records, timecards, and other records showing hours worked by, and wages and benefits paid to, each employee; records detailing employee job classifications and social security payments; personnel records and reports; and tax returns. Such records shall be made available to the Board for inspection and copying within fifteen days of any request.

3. Where existing records are incomplete, reconstructing to the extent possible records of employee wages, hours, and job classifications for the relevant period. Such reconstructed records and the information on which they are based shall be made available to the Board for inspection and copying within fifteen days of any request.

4. Immediately signing and posting at their place of business in Mountain View, California, copies of the Board's remedial "Notice to Employees" (the Notice). In the event that the Defendants have lost their copy of the Notice, one shall be provided them by the Board.

5. Reproducing and posting in conspicuous places at their place of business, including places where employee notices are customarily posted, copies of this order and an accompanying statement signed by the Respondents that they have undertaken to comply therewith. These copies shall remain posted for a period of 60 days. The Respondents shall ensure that the copies are legible throughout the posting period, and that they are not altered or covered during that period.

6. Mailing to each of the Respondents' current employees and to each of their former employees employed between July 1, 1974 and June 30, 1977, copies of the Notice. A list of all employees to whom the Notice was sent shall be provided to the Board.

7. Filing a sworn statement with the Clerk of this court within 60 days of the entry of this order showing what steps have been taken to comply with the provisions of this order. A copy of this statement shall be sent to the Board.

To assure compliance with the foregoing provisions, it is further ordered that the Respondents pay a fine of $250 for each violation of this order, and an additional fine of $250 for each day that each such violation continues. This court reserves jurisdiction to issue, pursuant to application by the Board, a writ of body attachment against Charles R. Vocke, Glenara Vocke, and any officer or agent of Goodsell & Vocke, Inc. responsible for default in complying with this order.

American Diversified Foods, Inc., d/b/a Arby's v. NLRB

640 F.2d 893 (7th Cir.), February 24, 1981—245 NLRB 33

On petition to review Board Order

Before PELL and CUDAHY, Circuit Judges, and DUMBAULD, Senior District Judge*

PELL, Circuit Judge. American Diversified (American or Company) has petitioned this court to review, and the Board has cross-petitioned this court to enforce, a Board order finding that American violated § 8(a)(1), and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3), by discharging two "shift managers" employed at one of the company's "ARBY" restaurants in Bloomington, Indiana. The two shift managers, John Fry and Carl Steffes, were admittedly fired for engaging in union organizational activity. The company claims, however, that it did not violate the Act by discharging Fry and Steffes because shift managers are "supervisors" as defined in § 2(11) of the Act, and thus excluded from the Act's definition of "employee" contained in § 2(3). 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), (3). After a hearing, Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) Karl H. Bushman disagreed and held that Fry and Steffes were not supervisory employees. This finding was adopted by the Board when it held that the company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3) in the discharges, 247 N.L.R.B. No. 9 (1980), which holding is the subject of the petition to this court.

Section 2(11) defines "supervisor" as any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

29 U.S.C. § 152(11). As in most cases involving definitional sections, the exact boundaries of the definition are not precise with the gaps to be filled by subsequent case law. In filling these gaps, the Board is given a substantial amount of discretion and it is well established that the Board shall be affirmed in its determinations if they are supported by substantial evidence. NLRB v. Adam & Eve Cosmetics, Inc., 567 F.2d 723 (7th Cir. 1977).

> In applying the "substantial evidence" test, however, we are not empowered to rubber-stamp the Board's decision simply because the supporting evidence may be "substantial" when considered by itself and in isolation from the evidence that fairly detracts from the Board's conclusion. *Universal Camera Corp. v. If, when so viewed in its entirety, the record contains "such evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion," we must accept the Board's findings. Id. at 477, 71 S.Ct. 456, [at 459]. On the other hand, if the record as a whole "clearly precludes the Board's decision from being justified by a fair estimate of the worth of the testimony of the witnesses or its informed judgment on matters within its special competence," we must set aside the Board's findings. Id. at 490, 71 S.Ct. at 466.

The facts in this case reveal that the shift managers, usually three or four in each restaurant, are third in the ARBY hierarchy behind the store manager and one or two assistant managers, but ahead of approximately 25 counter employees. The unit manager is a salaried managerial employee hired by corporate management and is primarily responsible for the restaurant unit and overseees all aspects of the unit's operation. The assistant manager is also a salaried employee hired by the corporation who aids the manager in carrying out his responsibilities. The shift managers, on the other hand, are hourly-paid employees who are usually promoted by the unit management from the rank of counter employee.

A typical ARBY's restaurant is open seven days a week for two eight-hours shifts each day. Each shift is headed by a "duty manager." Of these 14 shifts, the store manager is the duty manager for four shifts, the assistant manager is the duty manager for four shifts, and the shift managers act as duty managers for the remaining six shifts, usually in the evenings or on weekends. The shift managers spend 40 to 60 percent of their working time as duty managers with the remainder spent as regular counter employees. When the shift managers are serving as duty managers, they are, with the exception of a one-hour overlap period between shifts, the highest ranking employee in the restaurant.

The duty managers' responsibilities include maintaining the inventory and cash receipt records, controlling the cash resources, and the opening or closing of the restaurant at the beginning or end of the business day, depending upon the shift they manage. The duty managers use the restaurant manager's desk for their paperwork which includes the maintaining of a daily log of activities and occurrences at the restaurant and personnel information. They are responsible for assigning counter employees to specific jobs, replacing absent employees, and sending employees home when they are sick or when work is slow. They are also responsible for enforcing the company's dress and behavior rules and allocating work breaks. On at least one occasion, the duty manager, in this case a shift manager, orally reprimanded a counter employee for misbehavior. In short, during those times that the shift managers serve as duty managers, they are in charge of the restaurant's operation.

Shift managers are paid on an hourly basis at a rate of thirty-five cents an hour greater than counter employees when the shift managers served as duty managers, and twenty cents an hour greater at other times. Other benefits the shift managers receive beyond those given counter employees include paid work breaks and one week's paid vacation after one year's employment. They are also eligible for monthly performance bonuses.

In his opinion holding that shift managers were not "supervisors," the ALJ relied upon the fact that shift managers were without independent authority to hire, fire, transfer, or discipline counter employees. Although the ALJ acknowledged that shift managers did occasionally effectively recommend that certain employees should be fired or other persons hired, he noted that counter employees also did so, or could have done so. The Judge further held that the instance of the shift manager issuing an oral reprimand was an isolated example, and that the duties regarding work assignments and opening and closing responsibilities were routine and did not require the exercise of independent judgment.[1] The ALJ finally held that neither the company nor the shift managers themselves considered the shift managers to be supervisors, and that the evidence of the counter employees' perceptions was "ambiguous."

When viewed as a whole, we do not believe that substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusions. It is well established that only one of the criteria mentioned in § 2(11) need be present to justify a finding that the questioned occupation is supervisory. NLRB v. Brown Specialty Co., 436 F.2d 372, 375 (7th Cir. 1971). Furthermore, although the ALJ was correct in holding that supervisory jobs require the exercise of some degree of independent judgment, NLRB v. Sayers Printing Co., 453 F.2d 810, 814 (8th Cir. 1971), the fact that the exercise is infrequent does not lessen the supervisory status. In Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers, Int'l Union v. NLRB, 445 F.2d 237, 244 (D.C. Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 1039, 92 S.Ct. 713, 30 L.Ed.2d 730 (1972), for example, the court stated, "once the existence of supervisory authority is established, the degree or frequency of its exercise is of little consequence." Similarly, in Ohio Power Co. v. NLRB, 176 F.2d 385 (6th Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 899, 70 S.Ct. 249, 94 L.Ed. 553, the court stated that § 2(11) "* * * does not require the exercise of the power described for all or any definite part of the employee's time." The Board has also agreed with these statements in the past. See Graves Trucking, Inc., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 52 (1979). In this case, shift managers, at least for a substantial portion of the time they are acting as duty managers, exercise independent judgment.

[1] The ALJ found, for example, that the assignment to the meat slicer station was restricted by a minimum age requirement of the state law, and noted that the length of the employee's shift "appeared to have been the determining factor in an employee's work position."

Initially, we are impressed with the fact that for the great majority of the time shift managers are acting as duty managers, they are the highest ranking employees present in the restaurant. At these times, they have sole responsibility for the compliance with all company rules by the counter employees, for cash receipts and resulting records, and for the following of proper closing and opening procedures. The company employee manual states, in fact:

> All shift managers (non-salaried duty managers) are directly responsible to unit management and Company, American Diversified Foods, for following and enforcing all unit and Company rules and procedural policies on the shifts which they manage.

The fact that the questioned employees are the ranking employees present at the worksite has led the Board to a finding of supervisory status. E.g., Graves Trucking, supra; Mid-Continent Refrigerated Service Co., 228 N.L.R.B. 917, 920 (1977), and see Colorflow Decorator Products, Inc., 228 N.L.R.B. 408, 410 (1977).

The record also establishes that shift managers are responsible for assigning work to the counter employees during their shifts. Although the ALJ was correct in findings that this responsibility operated only within certain legal boundaries and common sense limitations, the discretion is not restricted by any written company policy or directive. The record shows that the shift managers exercise sufficient independent judgment when making these decisions. Although external considerations clearly affect the shift manager's discretion when making these assignments, nothing prevents the shift manager from basing his decision, at least in part, on the requirements of the specific job and his opinion of the counter employee's individual capabilities. This is a sufficient exercise of his independent judgment. NLRB v. Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc., 558 F.2d 205, 209 (4th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1011, 98

S.Ct. 723, 54 L.Ed.2d 754 (1978); Dynamic Machine Co. v. NLRB, 552 F.2d 1195, 1201 (7th Cir. 1977), cert, denied, 434 U.S. 827, 98 S.Ct. 103, 54 L.Ed.2d 85; and see NLRB v. Big Ben Dept. Stores, Inc., 396 F.2d 78, 82 (2d Cir.1968). The fact that the work the shift manager supervises is not complex and does not require close attention does not weaken a finding of supervisory status. Sourdough Sales, Inc., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 20 (1979); Colorflow Decorator Products, Inc., supra at 411. In Adam and Eve Cosmetics, supra, this court specifically held, for example, that the supervision of menial work in that case "did not call for the exercise of sophisticated judgment." 567 F.2d at 728. However, the court went on to find that this fact did not mean that the employee "was not called upon the use his own judgment in the course of his job." Id. As in that case, we are satisfied that the shift managers here exercised sufficient independent judgment in assigning particular tasks to particular employees.

Additionally, the shift managers meet twice a month with the unit management to discuss personnel problems and store procedures. At these meetings, and by the entries and comments made in the daily logs kept by the duty managers, the shift managers can effectively recommend promotions, hirings, and firings. Importantly, the counter employees know of these meetings and the logs and, perhaps unnecessarily therefore, the company manual states:

> All personnel are to give shift managers the same respect that they give the assistant manager and the store manager.

It is also interesting to note that one counter employee testified that although she did not think shift managers were supervisors in what she believes was the "legal sense," "in the dictionary sense, a supervisor would be one who supervises and I would have to say that [the shift managers] did supervise."

These factors, when viewed with the facts that shift managers have the responsibility to replace absent employees, decide which employees are to leave early, and allocate work breaks, indicate to us that they are supervisors as that term is defined in § 2(11). They possess "independent judgment" because they exercise discretion in assigning work, work breaks and early leave privileges. Furthermore, there is a substantial possibility that fraternal feelings arising from the unionization of these shift managers might interfere with the proper exercise of the duty manager's responsibility in carrying out the employer's policies. NLRB v. Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc., supra at 207. There is also the possibility that the counter employees might be pressured into union membership, or that the shift managers might be able wrongly to maintain a senior union position, due to the potential misuse of the shift manager's supervisory powers. C&W Supermarkets, Inc. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 618,620-21 (7th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 405 F.2d 1169, 1178 (2d Cir. 1968).

In short, shift managers exercise the type of powers described in § 2(11) and finding them to be "supervisors" within the meaning of the Act complies with the policies behind the exclusion of supervisors from the Act's prescriptions. Cases based upon similar factual circumstances are in accord. See Ohio Power Co., supra; Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc., supra; Dynamic Machine Co., supra; Fredericks Foodland, Inc., 247 N.L.R.B. No. 38 (1980); and Colorflow Decorator Products, Inc., supra. The Board's order, therefore, is denied enforcement.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB

Florida Steel Corporation v. NLRB

646 F.2d 616 (D.C. Cir.), February 25, 1981—244 NLRB 395

On petitions to review Board Order

Before Senior Circuit Judge BAZELON and Circuit Judges WALD and EDWARDS

Opinion for the court filed by Circuit Judge HARRY T. EDWARDS

HARRY T. EDWARDS, Circuit Judge: This case raises significant questions concerning the remedial authority of the National Labor Relations Board (the "Board" or "NLRB"). In this action the Board found, and it is not here disputed, that Florida Steel Corporation violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151-69 (the "Act"), by unilaterally changing the pay rate of two employees recalled from layoff. Given the company's "proclivity to disregard the statutory rights of its employees and their chosen bargaining representatives," the Board ordered extraordinary affirmative relief beyond the traditional "cease and desist" and "make whole" orders imposed for violations of this type. Most significantly, the Board's remedial order includes provisions requiring Florida Steel to grant the United Steelworkers of America certain forms of access to all company plants, including unorganized plants that have not been the site of any union activity.

Both the employer and the union have filed petitions for review of this order of the Board. The union here contends that, in light of numerous prior instances in which Florida Steel has been found to have violated the Act, certain additional remedies requested by the union should have been ordered by the Board. The employer, on the other hand, argues that the extraordinary remedies imposed by the Board are not warranted by the facts of this case. The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order.

To resolve the questions raised in these petitions, we are forced to consider several fundamental, yet potentially conflicting, principles of labor law. In particular, this case presents troublesome questions concerning the authority of the Board to take affirmative action to remedy violations of the Act, as opposed to the right of an employer to deny a union access to company property during an organizational compaign. For reasons set forth below, we hold that, in appropriate circumstances, the Board has broad authority to grant a union access to company property as part of a remedial order. However, in part due to principles set forth in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct, 679, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956), we hold that the Board must make clear that such access is necessary to offset the adverse effects of unlawful employer conduct. Since the Board in this case has not made certain findings that are necessary to justify a corporatewide grant of access in a remedial order, we remand this case to the Board for further consideration and clarification.

I. BACKGROUND

We begin with a brief presentation of the facts of this case. In light of the arguments advanced by the parties, we also review the history of past violations of the National Labor Relations Act by Florida Steel.

A. The Unfair Labor Practice In This Case

The facts underlying this action are not in dispute. The incidents involved here occurred at the Indiantown, Florida plant of Florida Steel. As a result of a representation election conducted in May 1974, the United Steelworkers of America was certified by the Board to represent the production and maintenance workers at the Indiantown plant. In January 1975, Florida Steel effected a cutback in operations that resulted in a layoff of approximately 55 employees at the Indiantown plant. Three months later, Florida Steel recalled 24 of those employees. The finding of an unfair labor practice in the case resulted from the fact that the company recalled two employees to perform work similar to that done before the layoff but at a rate of pay lower than that held prior to layoff; the company effected this change in the employees' rate without first bargaining with the union.[1]

Before their layoff, employees McCammon and McDonald performed the duties of "yard helper," a job classification that normally paid $3.50 per hour. Due to problems in recruiting individuals to perform the work of that job classification, McCammon and McDonald were classified before layoff as "billet yard helpers" and paid $3.80 per hour. After their layoff, McCammon and McDonald were recalled and paid as yard helpers, not as billet yard helpers. This post-layoff change in the employees' classification and pay, which resulted from the implementation of a new policy by the company, was made without any negotiation with the union.

Upon the filing of charges by the union and the issuance of a complaint by the Regional Director of the Board, an Administrative Law Judge concluded that Florida Steel had an obligation to consult with the union concerning its classification decision with respect to yard helper work.[2] The ALJ concluded, however, that the unfair labor practice charge had not been timely filed by the union, and accordingly recommended that the complaint be dismissed.[3]

The Board reversed this decision of the Administrative Law Judge,[4] ruling that the unfair labor practice charge had been timely filed, and that the unilateral change in the pay rate of McCammon and McDonald violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act.[5] Pursuant to this ruling, the Board remanded the case to the Administrative Law Judge for consideration of the appropriate remedy.

On remand, both the union and the General Counsel requested that "the broadest remedy possible" be imposed against the company. These requests were made in light of the numerous instances in which Florida Steel had been found previously to have violated the Act. The ALJ denied the requests for extraordinary relief.[6] The Administrative Law Judge stated:

> The violation found by the Board was an isolated one and hardly egregious in the context of the total layoffs and recalls, and, as stated in the original Decision herein, was not accompanied by even an allegation of animus.

244 N.L.R.B. No. 61, decision of Administrative Law Judge at 3. The ALJ recommended only the conventional "cease and desist" and "make whole" orders.

Exceptions were again filed from the recommended decision of the Administrative Law Judge. In rejecting the limited remedial order proposed by the ALJ,[7] the Board stated that:

> While the 8(a)(5) violation involved here would not, under ordinary circumstances, appear to justify extraordinary remedies, we have decided to grant certain additional remedies here for the reasons fully explicated in our decision in Florida Steel Corporation, 242 NLRB No. 195 (1979). We indicated there that Respondent's "pattern of unlawful conduct in recent years" had evidenced a "rejection of the principles of collective bargain-

Although the union was not certified by the Board as bargaining representative until June 1975, the Board held that Florida Steel had "a precertification obligation to bargain with the Union over its decision to effect a post layoff change in McCammon's and McDonald's pay for performing the same work." > ing." We view this case as a continuation of that rejection. Moreover, in reaching our conclusion, we note that Respondent's unlawful conduct here does not constitute its initial transgression of employee rights at the Indiantown, Florida, facility involved. In a prior Board decision, 220 NLRB 1201 (1975), enfd. 538 F.2d 324 (4th Cir. 1976), the Board found that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by withholding a wage increase in retaliation for its employees' union activities. Accordingly, we believe that extra remedial relief is necessitated by Respondent's proclivity to disregard the statutory rights of its employees and their chosen bargaining representatives.

244 N.L.R.B. No. 61 at 2 (footnote omitted).

The Board entered an order providing for the following "extra remedial relief": (1) issuance for corporatewide cease and desist order; (2) corporatewide posting of the Board's notice; (3) mailing of the notice to all employees of Florida Steel; (4) reading of the notice to all employees of Florida Steel; and (5) publication of the notice in all appropriate company publications. The Board decision further provided:

> In addition, if, within 2 years of the date of this Decision, a Board-conducted election is scheduled at any of Respondent's plants involving the Charging Party [United Steelworkers of America], we will require Respondent to provide access to at least two union representatives for a 30-minute speech during worktime, the date thereof to be not more than 10 working days, but not less than 48 hours, prior to any such election. If within the same 2-year period, any agent of Respondent convenes and addresses employees at any of Respondent's plants concerning union representation, we will require Respondent to provide the Union with equal time to respond to such speeches.

The Board refused to grant two additional remedies requested by the union. Believing that the above measures would remedy adequately the unfair labor practice found, the Board denied requests for: (1) union access for one year to plant bulletin boards companywide; and (2) a list of the names and addresses of the employees of Florida Steel on a companywide basis.

B. Prior Violations of the Act by Florida Steel

The remedial order of the Board at issue in this case was based upon Florida Steel's "pattern of unlawful conduct in recent years." We review briefly, therefore, the history of prior cases involving Florida Steel that have arisen before the National Labor Relations Board.

Florida Steel Corporation operates 22 divisions in 11 cities throughout the southeastern United States. By its own admission, Florida Steel is "an enterprise waging a tough, prolonged campaign" against the United Steelworkers. Brief for Petitioner Florida Steel, p. 10. Union organizational activity has been conducted at only four different Florida Steel locations.[8] At each of those locations, the company's "tough, prolonged campaign" against the union has included the commission of several unfair labor practices. In 17 separate cases the Board has found violations of the Act by Florida Steel.[9] Moreover, in most of those cases several unfair labor practices were found.

These cases may be placed roughly in several different categories. At each of the four plants where organizational campaigns were conducted, the company violated the Act by withholding wage and fringe benefit improvements from those plants that were granted companywide.[10] The Board found in these cases that, during the course of a union campaign, Florida Steel deliberately withheld customarily granted benefits in order to discriminate against employees at those plants. In addition, the withholding of benefits at one plant (Croft) was widely publicized at another plant (Indiantown) in an attempt to discourage employees at the latter plant from voting for the union.[11] After an unlawful withholding of benefits was found at a fourth plant, the Board ordered the company to cease and desist from the unlawful activity on a corporate wide basis.[12] [8] There has been organizational activity at the Charlotte plant in Croft, North Carolina, and at plants in Tampa, Jacksonville, and Indiantown, Florida.

[9] In 10 of the 12 cases that have been reviewed by an appellate court, the court has granted enforcement of the Board orders in full or with minor modification. In two cases enforcement has been denied. See Florida Steel Corporation: 214 N.L.R.B. 264 (1974) (Croft), supplemented, 221 N.L.R.B. 1008 (1975), enforced in part, 551 F.2d 306, 94 L.R.R.M. 2589 (4th Cir. 1977); 215 N.L.R.B. 97 (1974) (Tampa), enforced in part, 529 F.2d 1225 (5th Cir. 1976), supplemented, 234 N.L.R.B. 1089, enforced, 586 F.2d 840 (5th Cir. 1978) (table); 220 N.L.R.B. 225 (1975) (Tampa), enforced in part, 544 F.2d 896 (5th Cir. 1977); 220 N.L.R.B. 260 (1975) (Croft), enforced, 543 F.2d 1389 (D.C. 622

In another series of cases, Florida Steel violated the Act by threatening, discharging, and conducting unlawful surveillance of known union adherents. In Florida Steel Corp., 214 N.L.R.B. 264 (1974) (Croft), supplemented, 221 N.L.R.B. 1008 (1975), enforced in relevant part, 551 F.2d 306, 94 L.R.R.M., 2589 (4th Cir. 1977), the Board found the following unfair labor practices: the company had made appeals to racial prejudice in an attempt to defeat the union; the company had threatened employees with loss of jobs, plant closure, reduction of overtime, reduction of benefits, and deterioration of working conditions if the union was accepted; the company had unlawfully interrogated employees concerning union sympathies, and spied on union adherents; and the company had unlawfully discharged 11 employees, and suspended one employee, as a result of their support for the union. In Florida Steel Corp., 215 N.L.R.B. 97 (1974) (Tampa), enforced in relevant part, 529 F.2d 1225 (5th Cir. 1976), supplemented, 234 N.L.R.B. 1089, enforced, 586 F.2d 840 (5th Cir. 1978) (table), the Board found that the company had violated the Act by maintaining and enforcing an invalid no-solicitation rule, by interrogating employees with regard to their union memberships and activities, by harassing known union supporters through extensive surveillance, and by discharging two employees because of their union activities. Similar violations were found in four additional cases.[13]

In addition, at all four locations where employees attempted to organize and an election was held, the conduct of Florida Steel caused the first election to be set aside or the ballots to be seized.[14] In two re-run elections conducted by the Board, the union was successful in obtaining the support of a majority of the employees and was certified as bargaining representative (Croft and Indiantown).

The selection of the union by employees of Florida Steel, however, has not stopped the company's "tough, prolonged campaign" against the union. In a more recent series of cases, the company has attempted to undercut the standing of the union as exclusive bargaining agent by refusing to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5). In Florida Steel Corp., 231 N.L.R.B. 923 (1977) (Croft), the Board found that the company unilaterally changed wages, hours, and conditions of employment in violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) in prohibiting the continued use of company credit cards, reducing reimbursement rates for meal and lodging expenses, and stating that it would deduct one-half hour pay when meal compensation was provided, all without negotiation with the union. The Board further found a violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) when those actions were considered against increases in benefits granted to nonunionized employees at other plants. The Board again noted that the company used the plight of its unionized employees as a warning to employees at an unorganized plant not to select the union.[15] As a result of this use of employees in one plant as an example to employees in another plant, the company was ordered to post a remedial notice at all of its plants and locations.[16]

In Florida Steel Corp., 235 N.L.R.B. 941 (1978) (Croft), enforced in relevant part, 601 F.2d 125 (4th Cir. 1979), the Board again found that the company violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) at the Croft plant by making a unilateral change in working conditions, and, in addition, by failing to provide the union with information necessary for collective bargaining. As in the previous case, the company was ordered to cease and desist the unlawful conduct, and to post the remedial order, on a corporatewide basis.

One final case in this series deserves special attention, for the Board order in that case closely parallels the order at issue here. In Florida Steel Corp., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 195 (June 20, 1979) (Croft), enforced in part, 620 F.2d 79 (5th Cir. 1980), the Board found that Florida Steel violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to give the union information concerning the reinstatement of several employees previously found to have been unlawfully discharged. To remedy this violation, the Board granted a request for extraordinary remedies, stating that such remedies were necessary "in order to fully remedy Respondent's rejection of the principles of collective bargaining as evidenced by its pattern of unlawful conduct in recent years" 242 N.L.R.B. No. 195 at 2. The Board entered a remedial order virtually identical to that at issue in this case.

Since the Board in the present case relied heavily on the findings of this earlier decision, it is important to state those findings with some care. After reviewing the many instances of misconduct cited above, including the use by Florida Steel of its unlawful conduct at one plant as a warning to employees at other plants, the Board explained the broad remedial order as follows:

> Thus, the pattern is clear. Respondent has used unlawful means to oppose employee organizational activity at its Croft, Tampa, Indiantown, and Jacksonville plants. Having failed in its efforts to stifle employee free choice at the Croft and Indiantown plants, Respondent next made the union's victory a hollow one by refusing to bargain concerning basic decisions affecting the working conditions of unit employees. The instant violation is yet another step in what can only be characterized as a corporate campaign to chill employee organizational activity throughout its facilities through unlawful conduct. We therefore deem it essential to grant the Charging Party's request for extraordinay remedies in order to counteract the effects of this campaign of lawlessness.

242 N.L.R.B. No. 195 at 4. The Board further noted that "although these remedies might be considered punitive if applied to an isolated instance of misconduct, they are essential to neutralize the effects of Respondent's continuing pattern of unlawful conduct in recent years." Id at 5.

On petition for review, the Fifth Circuit modified the remedial order of the Board. The court held that the Board acted within permissible limits in ordering Florida Steel to give notice—by letter, by posting, and by reading—that it would not interfere with employee rights protected by Section 7 of the Act. 620 F.2d at 82. In addition, in part because of the company's use of past violations elsewhere in the corporate structure as part of its anti-union campaigns, the court agreed that the notice should be provided to employees at all plants of Florida Steel. Id. Given these broad notice provisions, however, the court held that the additional requirement that notice be placed in appropriate company publications could not be sustained as a remedial measure. Id. at 83.

The court also struck down certain portions of the order granting the union access to all plants of Florida Steel. The court held that the provisions for access to the two unionized plants, Croft and Indiantown, could be justified "as a means for deterring any repetition of the conduct before the Board and for preventing other efforts by the company to impair the effectiveness of the union as a bargaining representative." 620 F.2d at 83. With respect to all other plants, the court stated:

---

> In requiring this access to be provided at plants where the Steelworkers union is not a bargaining representative, however, the Board's order cannot be viewed as remedial with respect to the charge before it, one involving interference with the union's performance of its role as a bargaining representative.

Id. The court thus held that the portion of the order providing access at these other plants, imposed perhaps from the "understandable frustration and impatience" of the Board, could not be sustained. Id.

C. Issues Presented

From the above, it is clear that we are dealing with a relatively minor violation of the Act, committed, however, by an employer apparently dedicated to defeating the union at all costs. As stated at the outset, only the propriety of the Board's remedial order is at issue in this case.

The union contends that the Board did not go far enough in its grant of extraordinary remedies, and should have (1) granted the union access to plant bulletin boards companywide for one year and (2) ordered the company to furnish the union with a list of the names and addresses of the employees of Florida Steel on a companywide basis. In support of this request, the union notes an earlier finding of the Board that "it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to require Respondent to provide the Union with companywide access for 1 year to bulletin boards, and furnish the Union with a list of the names and addresses of all employees on a companywide basis." Florida Steel Corp., 233 N.L.R.B. 491 at 491 (1977).[17] The union argues that these remedies are necessary "to insure that all Florida Steel employees are informed of the protection afforded them in order to expunge the coercive effect of earlier company communications to employees concerning various unfair labor practices." Brief of Petitioner United Steelworkers, p. 20 (emphasis in original).

In contrast, the company argues that the Board went too far; the company contends that the order of the Board is not supported by substantial evidence in the record and should not be enforced by this court. Florida Steel asserts that the remedies imposed by the Board far exceed that which is appropriate based on an objective examination of the company's record, and are punitive in nature and therefore improper.[18] In particular, the company argues that the access requirements, like the employee name and address list, are essentially organizational tools for the union, appropriate only if "consistent with the principles set forth in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956) which require a showing of special need for increased access in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act." Brief of Petitioner Florida Steel, p. 8.

The resolution of these competing claims requires a careful examination of general principles governing the purpose and proper scope of remedial action taken by the National Labor Relations Board. We agree with Florida Steel that certain aspects of the Board order at issue here raise important questions concerning the proper relationship between remedial action that may be taken by the Board and other principles that normally govern the conduct of an organizational campaign. In particular, we must consider whether the principles announced in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956), have any effect on a remedial grant of access to a union on a corporatewide basis at unorganized plants.

We turn then to consider these potentially conflicting areas of the law. First, in part II of the opinion, we examine restrictions placed by the Supreme Court on union access to company property during an organizational campaign. Second, in part III, we set forth principles governing remedies under the National Labor Relations Act, including a survey of recent developments with respect to the use of union access as a remedial measure. In part IV of the opinion, we set forth the appropriate principles to be applied in cases involving "union access" as a remedial measure. Finally, in part V, we apply these principles to the remedial order at issue in this case.

[17] The order of the Board in 233 N.L.R.B. 491 was denied enforcement, on substantive grounds, by the Fifth Circuit. Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 735 (5th Cir. 1979).

[18] The company contends in this regard that "it was neither alleged nor shown that the Company's actions in this case affected employees outside the Indiantown plant, were ever calculated to do so, or ever practically prevented the Union from adequately representing the Indiantown unit." Brief for Petitioner Florida Steel, p. 11.

II. PERMISSIBLE RESTRICTIONS ON UNION ACCESS TO COMPANY PROPERTY DURING AN ORGANIZATIONAL CAMPAIGN

The principles governing union rights of access to company property are among the most fundamental of labor law. Access can be an extremely valuable organizational tool. One empirical study has found that those employees who switch from a pro-company to a pro-union position during an organizational drive are more likely to be familiar with the content of a union campaign than those employees who do not switch. Getman and Goldberg, The Behavioral Assumptions Underlying NLRB Regulation of Campaign Misrepresentations: An Empirical Evaluation, 28 Stan.L.Rev. 263, 281 (1976). Thus, a union organizational drive may be facilitated by access to a company plant during the course of an election campaign.

At the same time, union access by definition impacts on the private property rights of an employer. In NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed. 975 (1956), the Supreme Court recognized these competing forces and established rules governing rights of access of nonemployee union organizers to the private property of an employer.

At issue in Babcock was the legality of a rule promulgated by an employer that prohibited the distribution of literature by nonemployee union organizers on company-owned parking lots. The plant in Babcock was located in a community of 21,000 people. Approximately 40% of the employees lived within the community, with the remainder located within a 30-mile radius. The only public area in the immediate vicinity of the plant was an area where the driveway to the plant met a public right-of-way; because of traffic conditions, however, union solicitation could not be conducted safely at that spot.

Concerning the right to solicit union support on company property, the Supreme Court noted that a distinction "of substance" existed between rules applicable to employees and those applicable to nonemployees. The Court recognized, as earlier established in Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945), that no restriction could be placed on the right of employees to discuss unionization among themselves on company property, unless the employer could demonstrate that a restriction was necessary to maintain production or discipline in the plant. Unlike employees, however, outside union organizers have no preexisting right to be present on the property of the employer. As a result, the Court held in Babcock that an accommodation was required to be made between the organizational interests of employees and the private property interests of an employer. As described by the Supreme Court:

> Organization rights are granted to workers by the same authority, the National Government, that preserves property rights. Accommodation between the two must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other.

351 U.S. at 112, 76 S.Ct. at 684.

The Supreme Court in Babcock set forth specifically the manner in which the accommodation between organizational rights and property rights was to be made. The Court held:

> It is our judgment * * * that an employer may validly post his property against nonemployee distribution of union literature if reasonable efforts by the union through other available channels of communication will enable it to reach the employees with its message and if the employer's notice or order does not discriminate against the union by allowing other distribution.

351 U.S. at 112, 76 S.Ct. at 684. Stated alternatively, "if the location of a plant and the living quarters of the employees place the employees beyond the reach of reasonable union efforts to communicate with them, the employer must allow the union to approach his employees on his property." Id. at 113, 76 S.Ct. at 685.

Applying this standard, the Court in Babcock denied the union access to company property, finding that other means of communication were readily available by which the union could deliver its message to employees. 351 U.S. at 113–14, 76 S.Ct. at 684–85. Since the issuance of the decision in Babcock, unions rarely have been granted access to company property during organizational campaigns.[19] Indeed, the Supreme Court itself has recently recognized that "the balance struck by the Board and the courts under the Babcock accommodation principle has rarely been in favor of trespassory organizational activity." Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego County District Council of Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180, 205, 98 S.Ct. 1745, 1761, 56 L.Ed.2d 209 (1978).[20]

The restrictions against union access during organizational drives announced in Babcock have held firm in a number of different contexts. One of the most important applications of Babcock occurred just two years later in NLRB v. United Steelworkers (NuTone), 357 U.S. 357, 78 S.Ct. 1268, 2 L.Ed.2d 1383 (1958). In NuTone, two cases were consolidated. In the first case, the employer enforced a no-solicitation rule against employee solicitation valid under Republic Aviation (because necessary to maintain plant production or discipline), but at the same time engaged in noncoercive, anti-union solicitation while committing other unfair labor practices. The facts of the second case were identical, except that the employer anti-union solicitation in that case was itself coercive and thus a violation of the Act. The issue presented in NuTone was whether the existence of anti-union solicitation by an employer—particularly if coercive or accompanied by other unfair labor practices—had any effect on employee rights of solicitation or union rights of access as set forth in Republic Aviation and Babcock.

The Supreme Court ruled in NuTone that the existence of anti-union solicitation by an employer or other unfair labor practices did not nulify the Republic Aviation and Babcock standards. As stated by the Supreme Court:

> No attempt was made in either of these cases to make a showing that the no-solicitation rules truly diminished the ability of the labor organizations involved to carry their messages to the employees. Just as that is a vital consideration in determining the validity of a no-solicitation rule, see Republic Aviation Corp. v. Labor Board, supra, at 797–798 [65 S.Ct. at 985]; Labor Board v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., supra, at 112 [76 S.Ct. at 684], it is highly relevant in determining whether a valid rule has been fairly applied.

> If, by virtue of the location of the plant and of the facilities and resources available to the union, the opportunities for effectively reaching the employees with a pro-union message, in spite of a no-solicitation rule, are at least as great as the employer's ability to promote the legally authorized expression of his anti-union views, there is no basis for invalidating these "otherwise valid" rules.

Id. at 364, 78 S.Ct. at 1272.[21]

Babcock also served as a basis for the resolution of a controversy concerning union rights to access to respond to a "captive audience" speech of an employer. In Bonwit Teller, Inc., 96 N.L.R.B. 608 (1951), the Board considered a case in which an employer had assembled workers on company premises during working time to deliver an anti-union message one week before an election. The company then refused to grant the union an opportunity to address the employees under similar conditions. The Board held that the employer's refusal to grant the union "equal time" violated Section

Kutsher's Hotel and Country Club, Inc.*, 427 F.2d 200 (2d Cir. 1970).

[20] The Court noted that in the absence of discrimination, "the union's asserted right of access for organizational activity has generally been denied except in cases involving unique obstacles to nontrespassory methods of communication with the employees." 436 U.S. at 205 n.41, 98 S.Ct. at 1761 n.41.

[21] While NuTone established the general relevance of the Babcock and Republic Aviation standards in the context of employer solicitation or unfair labor practices, it was not immediately clear whether those standards would be applied as rigorously in all instances of such conduct. The Court in NuTone stated that it was inappropriate to establish a per se rule that a union had a right of access to respond to an unlawful anti-union campaign, implying that such a per se rule was improper because it would apply whether or not "the employer's conduct to any considerable degree created an imbalance in the opportunities for organizational communication." 357 U.S. at 362, 78 S.Ct. at 1271. The Court thus left open the door for the possibility that some other standard might apply if the employer conduct created such an imbalance. The "organizational imbalance" language of NuTone seemingly has proved to have little effect in subsequent cases, however, on union rights of access to company property. As stated by one court, "[t]he determination of whether or not the • • • employer conduct produced an imbalance in opportunities for organizational communications is dependent upon the existence or non-existence of alternative methods of communication open to the Union." May Department Stores Co. v. NLRB, 316 F.2d 797, 799 (6th Cir. 1963).

8(a)(1) of the Act. Enforcement was denied by the Second Circuit, however, because the court found that the Board's order was overly broad. Bonwit Teller, Inc. v. NLRB, 197 F.2d 640 (2d Cir. 1952), cert. denied, 345 U.S. 905, 73 S.Ct. 644, 97 L.Ed. 1342 (1953). Two years later, in Livingston Shirt Corp., 107 N.L.R.B. 400 (1953), the Board appeared to modify its Bonwit Teller doctrine, and held that an employer does not commit an unfair labor practice in making a pre-election speech to employees on company property and denying a union request for an opportunity to reply. An exception to the Livingston Shirt rule was later announced, however, in May Department Stores Co., 136 N.L.R.B. 797 (1962), where the Board declared unlawful an employer "captive audience" speech made, without affording the union an opportunity to respond, in a department store context, where "broad but privileged" employee no-solicitation rules (prohibiting solicitation in working areas during nonworking time) had been enforced by the employer.

Relying on Babcock and NuTone, the Sixth Circuit denied enforcement of the Board order in May Department Stores. May Department Stores Co. v. NLRB, 316 F.2d 797 (6th Cir. 1963). The court held that the employer had not committed an unfair labor practice in delivering a captive audience speech, while enforcing a "broad but privileged" no-solicitation rule and denying the union equal time, since no showing had been made that employees could not be reached by the union through alternative means of communication. That critical standard from Babcock was again held to be determinative. 316 F.2d at 800–01.[22]

Despite the setbacks of NuTone and May Department Stores, unions did not abandon their fight to obtain greater access during organizational campaigns. Relying on language in NuTone suggesting that a "balance" should exist between the opportunities of unions and employers for organizational communication,[23] unions continued to press the Board for access to company property for solicitation purposes.

In Excelsior Underwear Inc., 156 N.L.R.B. 1236 (1966), the Board once again attempted to resolve this issue. The Board recognized in Excelsior that an employee can make an informed and reasoned choice in a representation election only if he has an effective opportunity to hear arguments concerning union representation from both labor and management. The Board also noted that an employer, through possession of employee names and addresses and the ability to communicate with employees on company premises, is virtually assured of a continuing opportunity to inform employees of management views.

Despite these facts, the Board in Excelsior was forced to recognize that union organizers have no right of access to company property except as narrowly established in Babcock. As a result, to reconcile the need for "full and fair communication" against the restraints imposed by Babcock, the Board set forth what has become known as the Excelsior rule. The Board held that within seven days after the Regional Director approves a consent-election agreement or directs the holding of an election, an employer must make available to the union a list of the names and addresses of all employees eligible to vote in the election.[24] In this way, unions are able to communicate with employees more easily off company property. In announcing the Excelsior doctrine, the Board decided to defer any reconsideration of union access rights until after the effects of Excelsior had become known. General Electric Co., 156 N.L.R.B. 1247, 1251 (1966).

Babcock has continued to be extended and reaffirmed in recent Supreme Court cases. In Central Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 407 U.S. 539, 92 S.Ct. 2238, 33 L.Ed.2d 122 (1972), the Supreme Court held that the Babcock analysis applies to questions of union access rights in an organizational campaign conducted in a large city, in which employees are scattered over a densely populated metropolitan area.[25] The Court in Central Hardware stated that Babcock set forth "the guiding principle" for adjusting conflicts between employee rights protected by Section 7 of the Act and private property rights. 407 U.S. at 544, 92 S.Ct. at 2241. In Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507, 96 S.Ct. 1029, 47 L.Ed.2d 196 (1976), the Supreme Court utilized this language and held that Babcock governs the rights of union members to engage in peaceful primary picketing within the confines of a privately owned shopping center.[26] See also Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego County District Council of Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180, 204, 98 S.Ct. 1745, 1761, 56 L.Ed.2d 209 (1978).[27]

[22] The Sixth Circuit later declared that, in a very specific situation, a union may be entitled to "equal time" to respond to a captive audience speech by an employer. In Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB, 339 F.2d 889 (6th Cir. 1965), the court enforced a decision of the Board that an employer violated the Act in denying a union equal time to address employees following an anti-union employer speech, since the employer in that case had unlawfully prohibited employee solicitation in nonworking areas of the store during nonworking time (a "broad" but "unprivileged" rule). Montgomery Ward is thus one of the few instances in which a refusal by an employer to grant a union access to company property has been held to violate the Act, absent a showing that alternative means of communication did not exist.

[24] This requirement was upheld by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Wyman-Gordon Co., 394 U.S. 759, 89 S.Ct. 1426, 22 L.Ed.2d 709 (1969).

The principles of Babcock were most recently reiterated by the Supreme Court in Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego County District Council of Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180, 98 S.Ct. 1745, 56 L.Ed.2d 209 (1978). The Court there stated:

629

> While Babcock indicates that an employer may not always bar nonemployee union organizers from his property, his right to do so remains the general rule. To gain access, the union has the burden of showing that no other reasonable means of communicating its organizational message to the employees exists or that the employer's access rules discriminate against union solicitation.

436 U.S. at 205, 98 S.Ct. at 1761.[28]

In summary, Babcock and its progeny reflect well-established and strict rules governing union access rights to company property during an organizational campaign. Babcock and related cases make clear that an employer may deny a union access to company property, unless the union meets a heavy burden of showing that no other reasonable means of communicating its organizational message to the employes exist.

III. UNION ACCESS AS A REMEDIAL MEASURE

In a separate series of cases, unions have been granted access to company property as a remedial measure for violations of the Act by an employer. We first consider general principles governing remedies under the National Labor Relations Act, and then turn to trace this development of union access as a remedial measure.

A. General Remedial Principles under the National Labor Relations Act

The authority of the Board to impose remedies for violations of the Act is granted by Section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976). That section provides in relevant part:

> If upon the preponderance of the testimony taken the Board shall be of the opinion that any person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaged in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of this subchapter.

The statute gives little guidance concerning the scope of this authority of the Board. Certain general principles, however, have been established by the courts.

First, it is firmly entrenched in the case law that the imposition of remedies is a matter of special administrative competence, subject to very limited judicial review. This principle is more than mere rhetoric or boilerplate; the administrative expertise of the Board in fashioning remedies, derived from its unique understanding of the complex relationship between labor and management in our industrial society and the policies incorporated in the labor laws, is not to be interfered with lightly by reviewing courts lacking that expertise.[29] As stated by the Supreme Court in Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943), the selection of remedies made by the Board must stand "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act."

Despite this broad and important principle, the authority of the Board has certain recognized bounds. A second and equal fundamental principle governing Board remedies is that the powers of the Board are remedial, not punitive, and the Board may not justify an order solely on the ground that it will deter future violations of the Act. Bell & Howell Co. v. NLRB, 598 F.2d 136, 147 n.36 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 942, 99 S.Ct. 2885, 61 L.Ed.2d 312 (1979). As stated by the Supreme Court in Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 7, 11, 61 S.Ct. 77, 79, 85 L.Ed. 6 (1940), "[w]e do not think that Congress intended to vest in the Board a virtually unlimited discretion to devise punitive measures, and thus to prescribe penalties or fines which the Board may think would effectuate the policies of the Act."[30]

These clean bounds of doctrine soon give way, however, to much hazier lines in application. While it is clear that Board remedies may not be punitive, the Supreme Court has also stated that Section 10(c) is a broad "command" that the Board order such affirmative action as is necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act. NLRB v. J. H. Rutter-Rex Manufacturing Co., 396 U.S. 258, 262, 90 S.Ct. 417, 419, 24 L.Ed.2d 405 (1969). See International Union of Electrical Workers v. NLRB, 426 F.2d 1243, 1249 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 950, 91 S.Ct. 239, 27 L.Ed.2d 256 (1970). Indeed, the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 73 S.Ct. 287, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953):

> It is the business of the Board to give coordinated effect to the policies of the Act. We prefer to deal with these realities and to avoid entering into the bog of logomachy, as we are invited to, by debate about what is "remedial" and what is "punitive." It seems more profitable to stick closely to the direction of the Act by considering what order does, as [the order in this case] does, and what order does not, bear appropriate relation to the policies of the Act.

We believe that it is wise to pay heed to this warning of the Supreme Court not to get caught up in a semantic debate between what is "remedial" and what is "punitive." Certainly the Board has no power to "punish" offending parties, as distinguished from "remedying" unfair labor practices. Such labels oversimplify the problem, however. There is a danger that purely "compensatory" remedies may fail in some cases to effectuate fully the purposes of the Act. For instance, it has been recognized that an order granting reinstatement with back pay in an unlawful discharge case may amount to no more than "a license fee for union busting." Staff of Subcommittee on NLRB, House Committee on Education and Labor, 87th Cong., 1st Sess., Administration of the Labor-Management Relations Act by the NLRB 2 (Comm. Print 1961).[31] An unlawful discharge may affect employees who are not themselves the subject of employer action; an atmosphere of fear and anxiety may be created that is very difficult to define or quantify and remedy. If the Act is to be effectuated fully, these effects are perhaps the most important to offset.

This problem is most acute in cases of parties who have demonstrated an unyielding disregard for the Act by repeatedly committing unfair labor practices and ignoring Board orders to cease and desist from unlawful conduct. It long has been evident to the Board and the courts that some "stronger medicine" is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act in cases of recidivist violators. As a result, it is now firmly established that the Board has the power—and indeed the obligation—to take into account a history of recalcitrance in designing a remedial order. Textile Workers Union v. NLRB, 475 F.2d 973, 976 (D.C. Cir. 1973).[32] As

> Without doubt the Board has a duty in a litigated case to employ broader and more stringent remedies against a recidivist than those usually invoked against a first offender, particularly where normal remedies have proved to be ineffective after earlier proceedings. Otherwise the Board might fail to carry out the mandates of § 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), which obligates it to order a proven violator "to take such affirmative action * * * as will effectuate the policies of this act."

It could be said that this attitude toward recidivists is irreconcilable with the notion that Board orders may not be punitive or designed to deter. If Section 10(c) commands the Board in every case to impose such affirmative remedial action as is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act, it is difficult to conceptualize what "more" can be imposed against a recidivist that is not in some way punitive. Courts thus far have rarely addressed this potential inconsistency.

In resolving this conflict, we are tempted simply to note again the statement of the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., supra, that rather than focus on what is remedial and what is punitive, "[i]t seems more profitable to stick closely to the direction of the Act by considering what order does, * * * and what order does not, bear appropriate relation to the policies of the Act." 344 U.S. at 348, 73 S.Ct. at 289. We believe that it is possible, however, to reconcile the need to impose more stringent remedies against recidivists with the incantation that Board orders not be punitive.

This reconciliation is based upon the fact, perhaps simply unspoken in earlier cases, that in the case of a recidivist violator "the whole may be greater than the sum of its parts." In other words, a series of violations may have a cumulative effect on employees that is greater than the combined effect of each violation viewed in isolation. Employees may be affected deeply by the mere fact that an employer has demonstrated a staunch willingness to violate the Act in open defiance of past Board orders. More "stringent" remedies are required to offset this additional effect that is not present in the case of a first-time offender. These remedies may appear "punitive" in the context of an individual case, but are clearly "remedial," and therefore proper, in the context of the total conduct of a recidivist violator.[34]

B. "Union Access" as a Remedial Measure at a Plant Where Unfair Labor Practices Occurred

Grants of union access to company property have been ordered by the Board to remedy violations of the Act by an employer. Generally, such access has been limited to the site at which unfair labor practices were committed. While the use of access as a remedial measure appears to be increasing, the development of this remedial tool has not been marked by any consistent standard or theory.

1. Union Access to Bulletin Boards

The most common form of access granted to a union as a remedial measure is a grant of access to bulletin boards of the plant. Access to bulletin boards is perhaps the least intrusive form of access to company property, yet provides the union an important means by which to communicate with employees. That communication is often essential to offset effects caused by the unlawful conduct of an employer.

Access to bulletin boards as a remedial measure has been imposed in a variety of cases. Most often, access to bulletin boards is ordered to remedy "flagrant violations," "outrageous conduct," or "a gross interference with employees' organizational rights."[35] Access to bulletin boards has also been

[33] The importance of deferring to the expertise of the Board in such a situation has also been emphasized. As stated by the court in Amalgamated Local 355 v. NLRB, 481 F.2d 996, 1007 (2d Cir. 1973), "[t]he problem of how drastic to mold the remedy in a particular proceeding concerned with the latest in a series of violations calls for the sensitive exercise of administrative judgment, and we cannot substitute our own opinion for the Board's reasoned explication."

[34] We endorse the suggestion of the Second Circuit in Amalgamated Local 355, supra note 33, that the imposition of remedies in the case of a recidivist violator particularly demands the sensitive exercise of administrative judgment and expertise.

granted in cases in which the employer had an extended history of unlawful conduct.[36]

In certain cases, the remedial nature of a grant of access to bulletin boards has been made clear. In John Singer, Inc., 197 N.L.R.B. 88, 90 (1972), the Board found that union access to bulletin boards was necessary because additional forms of communication were needed to allow the union to reclaim allegiance lost as a result of the company's frivolous refusal to bargain. See also Koval Press, Inc., 241 N.L.R.B. No. 189, at 10 (May 4, 1979), enforced, NLRB v. Koval Press, Inc., 622 F.2d 579 (3d Cir. 1980). In J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB (Stevens II), 388 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 836, 89 S.Ct. 112, 21 L.Ed.2d 107 (1968), the court upheld a grant of union access to bulletin boards in order to offset the company's use of bulletin boards in a coercive compaign against the union. The court in Stevens II noted that access to bulletin boards also was "appropriately designed to dissipate the fear in the atmosphere within the Company's plants generated by its anti-union campaign." 388 F.2d at 906.

This use of bulletin board access as a remedial measure designed to dissipate an atmosphere of fear was further explained by the Fifth Circuit in J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB (Stevens V), 417 F.2d 533 (5th Cir. 1969). The court in Stevens V noted that while reinstatement and back pay may remedy the direct consequences of an unlawful discharge, there is a substantial danger that these traditional remedies will do nothing to dissipate the fear and anxiety that may be caused by widespread unlawful conduct. The court thus upheld a grant of union access to bulletin boards, stating:

> Surely, the Board could conclude that this rather impersonal outlet for Union views was necessary to eliminate the employees' apprehension of incurring the risk of discharge or other retaliation if they engaged in personal solicitation either in or out of the plant.

417 F.2d at 540. The court upheld the grant of access while admitting that "[w]e do this even though there was no specific showing that the Union was unable to disseminate its lawful propaganda." Id.

In other cases, however, courts and the Board have take a different approach. Placing greater emphasis on the principles announced in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed 975 (1956), access to bulletin boards has been rejected as a remedial measure where alternative means existed for the union to bring its message to the employees. See Greenfield Manufacturing Co., 199 N.L.R.B. 756, 757 n.7 (1972). In the first J.P. Stevens case, J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 380 F.2d 292 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1005, 88 S.Ct. 564, 19 L.Ed.2d 600 (1967), the court refused to enforce a provision granting the union access to plant bulletin boards. Although the court upheld a finding of the Board that 71 employees had been discharged unlawfully for engaging in union activity, the court ruled that access to bulletin boards was not warranted, on the grounds that "[n]o unique problem of access has been shown," and that "the Board made virtually no findings concerning the issues relevant to solicitation, and made no adequate showing that the Company's bulletin boards are necessary to the Union in its organization campaign." 380 F.2d at 305.

2. Direct Plant Access for Union Organizers

A similarly inconsistent development has occurred in the use of direct plant access for union organizers as a remedial measure. It is clear that the use of this remedy by the Board is increasing, once again typically limited to the site of the unfair labor practice. As with access to bulletin boards, the general theory behind the use of this remedial tool is that greater communication between the union and employees is needed to dissipate the effects of fear and oppression that have been created by serious or repeated employer unfair labor practices. The effect of Babcock in this setting, however, has been felt more clearly.

In a series of cases, direct union access to company property as a remedial measure has been denied because alternative means existed by which the union could communicate with employees. Citing Babcock, the Board in Greenfield Manufacturing Co., 199 N.L.R.B. 756 (1972), denied a union request for access to property as a remedial measure, stating:

> In our view, the record does not justify the application of this species of extraordinary relief because viable alternative means for the Union's organizational access to employees appear to be at hand.

199 N.L.R.B. at 757 n.7. Similarly in Heck's Inc., 191 N.L.R.B. 886 (1971), enforced in relevant part, Food Store Employees Local 347 v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 546 (D.C. Cir. 1973), reversed in part on other grounds, 417 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974), the Board rejected a request for direct access as a remedial measure, stating that such a remedy is not warranted "unless, as is not established to be the case here, alternative means of access are clearly unavailable or have been tried and found wanting." 191 N.L.R.B. at 887 (citing Babcock).[37]

Similarly, in Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 224 N.L.R.B. 1418 (1976), enforced in relevant part, Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. v. NLRB, 567 F.2d 1343 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 985, 99 S.Ct. 576, 58 L.Ed.2d 656 (1978), the Board adopted a statement of an Administrative Law Judge concerning the relationship of Babcock to direct union access as a remedial measure. In denying a request that access be incorporated in a remedial order, the ALJ stated:

> I would find that an imbalance has been created by Respondent's unfair labor practices, which would tend to critically impair the Union's opportunities for effective communication among all but the most militant employee supporters of the Union at the Jacksonville warehouse. Yet as illogical as the law may appear in this regard, under the precedent no weight is accorded to a lack of access attributed to unfair labor practices; instead, only imbalances attributable to physical factors are regarded as relevant to the inquiry.

224 N.L.R.B. at 1459 n.17.

An opposite approach was taken by the court in Decaturville Sportswear Co. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 886 (6th Cir. 1969). In that case, the Sixth Circuit enforced a remedial provision that granted union organizers access to plant approaches and parking lots during nonworking time for a period of six months. The court completely rejected the applicability of Babcock in the remedial setting. As stated by the court:

> National Labor Relations Board v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105, 76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed 975 (1956), on which the company relies, is not inconsistent with > our decision on this point. There, the question was whether denial of access to company property in order to distribute union literature consitituted an unfair labor practice and the Supreme Court held it did not. Here, the question is whether reasonable access to company property for a limited time is an appropriate remedial measure after a finding of unfair labor practices. The two questions involve different considerations. We conclude therefore that this is a valid exercise of the Board's authority.

406 F.2d at 889. See also Teamsters Local 115 v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 984 at 992 (D.C.Cir. 1981).

Finally, a number of cases have approached the question of plant access as a remedial measure without any discussion of Babcock at all. In International Union of Electrical Workers v. NLRB, 383 F.2d 230, 232 n.4 (D.C.Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 904, 88 S.Ct. 818, 19 L.Ed.2d 871 (1968); this court enforced, due to "aggravated circumstances" present in the case, that portion of a Board order granting the union access for one hour, on company time and at company expense, to give a presentation of the union position.[38] In a recent series of cases, due to the presence of unfair labor practices so "outrageous" and "pervasive" that "conventional remedies will not suffice to dissipate them and are inadequate to give Respondent's employees sufficiently explicit reassurances and understanding of their rights under the Act," the Board has granted union (1) access to nonwork areas of the plant during nonworking time, (2) access to respond to any anti-union speech by the employer, and (3) access to the plant to make a 30-minute speech prior to any election in which the union is participant. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 179, at 10, 12 (June 12, 1979); Haddon House Food Products, Inc., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 180 (June 12, 1979), enforced in relevant part, Teamsters Local 115 v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 984 (D.C. [37] See also NLRB v. H. W. Elson Bottling Co., 379 F.2d 223 (6th Cir. 1967). The court in Elson refused to enforce that part of a remedial order that granted the union the right to hold two in-plant meetings on company time, in part because "this record shows no problem of union access to or communication with employees of this company." 379 F.2d at 227 (citing Babcock). The court modified the order, however, to grant the union equal time to respond to any speech made by the employer on the question of union representation.

In other cases, access has been denied without reference to Babcock. In C.W.F. Corp., 188 N.L.R.B. 554, 560 (1971), enforced, Retail Store Employees Local 400 v. NLRB, 458 F.2d 792 (D.C.Cir. 1972), access was denied simply because lesser remedies were deemed adequate.[39] In Malrite of Wisconsin, Inc., 213 N.L.R.B. 830 (1974), the Board denied a request for access as a remedial measure on entirely different grounds. The Board stated that to grant access in that case "would put the Board in the position of appearing to lend support to the unionization of Respondent's engineers by one particular union regardless of whatever interest another union might have. In such matters the Board must be and appear to be scrupulously neutral." 213 N.L.R.B. at 831. Similar concerns were expressed by a dissenting member in another Board case granting broad union access as a remedial measure. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 179, at 12 n.15 (June 12, 1979), See also Haddon House Food Products, Inc., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 180, at n.11 (June 12, 1979), *enforced in relevant part, Teamsters Local 115 v. C. Union Access as a Remedial Measure Beyond the Plant Where the Unfair Labor Practice Occurred

As set forth above, an extensive campaign of unfair labor practices can produce effects on employees in a plant that cannot be offset by reinstating discharged employees or setting aside a challenged election. Widespread unlawful practices may create an atmosphere of fear chilling the exercise of employee rights guaranteed by the Act. While such effects are often produced by a prolonged campaign in which an employer demonstrates a deliberate disregard of protected legal rights by repeatedly violating the Act and ignoring Board orders, an atmosphere of tension and apprehension may be created even without an extensive history of past violations. As Judge Mikva aptly recognized in Teamsters Local 115 v. NLRB, at 992 (D.C.Cir. 1981), "an employer who strikes the first blow hard enough may not need to strike another."

To offset the effects caused by such unfair labor practices, courts and the Board have recognized that more extensive remedies are at times needed. Employees must be assured that certain rights do exist and will be protected. In order to bring that critical message home to employees, it has been found necessary in some cases to grant the union access to company bulletin boards or even to the plant itself. Without utilizing these additional means of communication, there may be no way to dissipate lingering effects caused by an unlawful antiunion campaign and to allow employees to make a free, uncoerced choice concerning union representation.

In some cases, however, even this increased access at the site where unfair labor practices have been committed may not be enough to remedy the effects of a strong, unlawful employer campaign. As recognized by the Supreme Court in Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co., 380 U.S. 263, 85 S.Ct. 994, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965), employer practices at one plant may have a "chilling effect" on the employees at another plant. In Darlington, a company closed one of its 18 plants following a successful union campaign at that plant, an action the Board found to be an unfair labor practice.[40] In reviewing this finding, the Supreme Court noted that an employer has an absolute right to terminate its entire business at any time for any reason. The Court recognized, however, that a partial closing of only one plant could produce effects elsewhere in the company, and held that such action may violate the Act "if motivated by a purpose to chill unionism in any of the remaining plants." 380 U.S. at 275, 85 S.Ct. at 1002. Thus, an otherwise lawful act was held to become unlawful if accompanied by an intent to chill the exercise of protected employee rights at other company locations.

[40] While the immediate employer involved had only one plant, that employer was owned and controlled by a company with 17 other plants.

In the present context, the employer actions are themselves unlawful. The critical point recognized in Darlington, however, is that employer actions at one plant may produce a chilling effect on employees elsewhere in the company. It is inevitable that such chilling effects can and do occur. Employees do not live in a vacuum. Actions of their employer at another company location may reach them directly through intra-company communications, or through the outside media. Necessary business transactions may bring employees in one plant in contact with those in another. As this case illustrates, the company itself may publicize an unlawful response to unionism at one plant as a warning to employees at other company locations. In short, a well-coordinated unlawful campaign at one plant may produce chilling effects throughout a corporate structure.

To offset companywide effects caused by extensive unlawful conduct, courts and the Board have expanded remedial measures beyond the actual locations at which unfair labor practices were found.[41] In certain cases, remedies designed to facilitate union communication and dissipate harmful effects have been applied companywide. In rare instances, such remedies have included corporatewide grants of union access to company property.

The most extensive corporatewide access remedies have been imposed in cases involving J.P. Stevens Company. It will serve no good purpose here to describe J.P. Stevens' prolonged and unlawful campaign against the United Textile Workers and the relentless efforts of the Board to dissipate the effects caused by that campaign. From the very first Stevens case, the Board found that the company's practices were so extensive and so well-publicized as to have a coercive impact at plants other than those at which unfair labor practices were found. See J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 380 F.2d 292, 304 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 1005, 88 S.Ct. 564, 19 L.Ed.2d 600 (1967).

Two recent Stevens cases are of special relevance here. In both J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 881 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, ———U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 315, 66 L.Ed.2d 145 (1980), and J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 623 F.2d 322 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 856, 66 L.Ed.2d 800 (1981), Board orders were enforced that granted the union broad access to all of the company's plants.[42] The union was given the right, on a corporatewide basis, to respond to any employer speech concerning union representation, to address the employees before any election scheduled by the Board, and, most importantly, to have access to all nonwork areas of the plants to communicate with employees.

The company objected to the broad access provisions in each case. In the first case, reported at 612 F.2d 881, the company objected to the extraordinary corporatewide relief on the ground that the unfair labor practice found occurred only at its Tifton, Georgia plant. The Board had found that the corporatewide access remedy was needed "[i]n view of Respondent's history of serious and similar violations of the Act and its disregard of past Board Orders." 240 N.L.R.B. 33 at 33 (1979). The court enforced the Board's remedial order with little discussion. 612 F.2d at 882.

In the second case, reported at 623 F.2d 322, the company presented a more specific objection. Since the unfair labor practice found in that case was a refusal to bargain at an organized plant, the company argued that the imposition of remedies that would affect the union's organizational efforts at other unorganized plants was punitive and improper. The Fourth Circuit disagreed. As stated by the court:

> This provision of the Board's order is predicated on its finding that the company employed its unlawful bargaining strategy to chill the union's organization of other plants. 623 F.2d at 327. The broad access provisions were again upheld.

In addition to these two Stevens cases, we again note the recent decision of the Fifth Circuit in another Florida Steel case. Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 79 (5th Cir. 1980). In that case, as here, the Board ordered that the union be provided access to all plants of Florida Steel. As described at the outset, the Fifth Circuit enforced those provisions of the order granting union access to the two organized Florida Steel plants. However, the court did not enforce the grant of access to other unorganized plants; the court instead adopted the position urged by J.P. Stevens in the latter case described above. As stated by the court, "[i]n requiring this access to be provided at plants where the Steelworkers union is not a bargaining representative, however, the Board's order cannot be viewed as remedial with respect to the charge before it, one involving interference with the union's performance of its role as a bargaining representative." 620 F.2d at 83.

In none of these corporatewide access cases have the courts discussed the possible relevance of the principles of NLRB v Babcock & Wilcox Co. As demonstrated above, the effect of Babcock on the use of access as a remedial measure has varied tremendously. Even in cases ignoring Babcock, courts have differed with respect to the extent to which access may be used as a remedial measure. Having explored this background in some detail, we turn now to attempt to set forth some guiding principles concerning the proper use of union access to company property as a remedial tool.

IV. THE APPROPRIATE STANDARDS TO BE APPLIED IN CASES INVOLVING "UNION ACCESS" AS A REMEDIAL MEASURE

Remedial orders granting a union access to company plants necessarily affect private property rights, and often have an impact on organizational campaigns. Since the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. set forth principles governing conflicts between private property rights and organizational access rights, that case often has had an effect on the propriety of union access as a remedial measure.

As stated above, the impact of Babcock has varied tremedously. At one extreme, an Administrative Law Judge has suggested that "no weight is accorded to a lack of access attributed to unfair labor practices; instead, only imbalances attributable to physical factors are regarded as relevant to the inquiry." Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 224 N.L.R.B. 1418, 1459 n.17 (1976). Other decisions have applied Babcock literally to remedial situations and have granted access only when the union can show, perhaps as a result of the unfair labor practices involved, that no alternative means of communication exist. Yet another group of cases has considered the appropriateness of access as a remedial measure without any discussion of the relevance or impact of Babcock principles.

As more fully developed below, we believe that the principles announced in Babcock do not govern the priopriety of union access granted as a remedial measure. We agree with the position taken by the Sixth Circuit in Decaturville Sportswear Co. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 886 (6th Cir. 1969), that the propriety of access as an organizational tool and the propriety of access as a remedial measure are two separate questions, and that "[t]he two questions involve different considerations." 406 F.2d at 889. This approach has been endorsed very recently in this Circuit. In Teamsters Local 115 v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 984 (D.C.Cir. 1981), this court considered a broad grant of union access ordered by the Board as a remedial measure, and stated:

> The Employer next cites N.L.R.B. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 [76 S.Ct. 679, 100 L.Ed 975] (1956), and its progeny, as authority for the proposition that the Employer's property rights preclude union access to the property unless there are no other reasonable means of reaching the employees. But none of these cases deal with the remedial powers of the Board; they only seek to determine when an employer's denial of access to his property can itself be deemed an unfair labor practice, see Decaturville Sportswear

Id., at 993 (emphasis in original; footnote omitted). The court in Teamsters enforced an order of the Board granting the union access to bulletin boards, reasonable access to nonwork areas of the plant during nonwork time, equal time to respond to employer speeches, and the right to address employees on working time prior to any election in which the union was a participant.[43]

We agree that there is a critical difference between access as an organizational tool and access as a remedial measure. Absent unfair labor practices, private property rights entitle an employer to restrict the ability of union organizers to enter company property and solicit for the union. As long as important employee rights may be exercised through other means, equally important private property rights need not be sacrificed. When an employer directly interferes with those employee rights, however, different considerations come into play. The Act contains a broad command that the Board take such affirmative action as is necessary to safeguard employee rights and thus effectuate the policies of the Act. As illustrated above, certain employer conduct may be of such a nature that some form of union access is needed to dissipate an atmosphere of fear and helplessness that has been created and to assure employees that fundamental rights exist and will be protected. In such a case, an employer cannot avoid the direct consequences of its own actions by invoking the talisman of private property rights. As employee rights have been violated, so too may private property rights be compromised. Private property rights are easily safeguarded, as decreed by Babcock and its progeny, by simple adherence to the strictures of the Act.

We hold, therefore, that access may be imposed as a remedial measure without a finding that the union will be unable to reach the employees through other available channels of communication. Instead, the critical inquiry is whether the employer conduct is of such a nature that access is needed to offset harmful effects that have been produced by that conduct. If union access is needed to dissipate those effects, access may be granted even though the union has alternative means of communicating with employees.

We also acknowledge, as developed above, that certain employer conduct may produce effects beyond the plant in which the unfair labor practices were committed. This is particularly true in cases in which an employer publicizes its unlawful conduct in an attempt to warn employees at other plants. In such situations, if access is needed to dissipate effects produced beyond the site where the unfair labor practices were committed, access may be awarded as a remedial measure beyond that location. If an extensive anti-union campaign has produced coercive effects corporatewide, access as a remedial measure may be imposed corporatewide as well.

Furthermore, we hold that access as a remedial measure at unorganized plants may be predicated on a finding by the Board that a company's unlawful bargaining strategy at an organized plant has chilled employee rights at the unorganized plants. In Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 79 (5th Cir. 1980), the Fifth Circuit held that access in such a case could not be, by definition, "remedial." We disagree. As stated above, the critical inquiry in these cases is whether the unlawful conduct of the employer has produced coercive effects chilling the free exercise of employee rights. Those effects can be produced as easily by a repeated refusal to bargain with a certified union as by improper interrogation or unlawful discharges during an organizational campaign. As was found by the Fourth Circuit in J.P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 623 F.2d 322 (4th Cir. 1980), cert denied, ——— U.S.———, 101 S.Ct. 856, 66 L.Ed.2d 800 (1981), "the Board's order is predicated on its finding that the company employed its unlawful bargaining strategy to chill the union's organization of other plants." 623 F.2d at 327. We agree that access at unorganized plants may be necessary in an appropriate case to remedy a refusal to bargain at an organized plant, and that such access therefore would not be improper.

The hallmark principle in each of these applications of access as a remedial measure is the necessity to offset coercive effects caused by an employer's unlawful campaign. As those effects spread and become entrenched, so too may an access remedy. In this way, grants of access are designed fully to effectuate the policies of the Act; access is ordered to remedy the effects of unlawful behavior and not to punish or deter an employer. It is clear that the principles of Babcock have no direct application in this setting.

[43] The remedial order in Teamsters involved only one plant.

At the same time, we recognize that the presence of Babcock cannot be totally ignored. Access may be awarded as a remedial measure if necessary to offset the direct consequences or effects of an employer's unlawful conduct. Having produced such effects, an employer cannot hide behind the protection of Babcock or private property rights. If those effects are not present, however, the above analysis fails. Absent the necessity to counter these harmful consequences, access cannot be justified as a remedial measure and instead may directly affront the principles announced in Babcock. As a result, before access may be imposed, it is critical that a clear showing be made that access is needed to reassure employees of the existence and vitality of protected legal rights.

In granting access as a remedial measure, therefore, a burden lies upon the Board to substantiate its conclusion that access is necessary to offset the consequences of unlawful employer conduct. In articulating the standard that the Board must meet, we are sensitive to the difficulty the Board faces in establishing that the exercise of employee rights has been chilled. Coercive effects are difficult to prove, yet at the same time the most important to dissipate. Certainly in this setting even more so than in other areas, the Board possesses an unmatched expertise in distilling and identifying the effects of unlawful employer conduct. We believe that the Board may rely on that expertise, and on the cumulative experience of past cases, to presume that certain employer conduct will inevitably produce certain effects on employees.

Given the amount at stake in this setting, however, a conclusory statement by the Board that access is needed to neutralize effects is not sufficient to justify a grant of access. Assumptions must be supported by evidence in the record. The seriousness of the violations at issue must be weighed. Where access is awarded beyond the locations at which unfair labor practices are found, the extent to which employees located in other plants know, or have reason to know, of unlawful conduct must be considered. The distance between the employer's operations may be relevant. The presence or absence of union activity at various company locations is an important factor that should be considered.[44] In the case of a recidivist violator, the effect of the passage of time between violations must be evaluated.[45] In short, we hold that the Board must find that it is reasonably foreseeable that the employees at those plants where access is imposed have suffered coercive effects from the employer's unlawful conduct and that an access remedy is necessary to cure those effects.

In summary, the Board has a broad authority to use access as a remedial measure if such a remedy is necessary to offset coercive effects caused by unlawful employer action. We endorse that principle as rigorously as we require the Board to demonstrate that such access is necessary and therefore remedial. We do not impose here an impossible burden on the Board; we simply believe that given the existence of constraints bordering the use of access as a remedial measure, the Board must not be conclusory in the use of this remedial tool. In requiring the Board to substantiate its action in this area, the authority of the Board to use access as a remedial measure will not be weakened.

V. THE DISPOSITION OF THIS PROCEEDING

The Board order in this case granted the union broad rights of access at every plant of Florida Steel. Access was ordered at the plant at which the unfair labor practice was found, at an additional organized plant of Florida Steel, at two plants where organizational activity had been conducted, and at all other company locations where no organizational drives had yet begun. In addition to this broad access remedy, the Board ordered that various forms of corporatewide notice be issued by the company. The Board denied, however, union requests for access to bulletin boards and for a list of the names and addresses of all Florida Steel employees.

[44] It is possible that employees at an organized plant, represented by an established union and protected by a collective bargaining agreement, are less likely to be coerced by employer conduct at another company location than employees at an unorganized plant.

[45] Too often the Board has invoked a history of past violations as justification in itself for extraordinary access remedies. It is not a history of unlawful conduct that justifies access as a remedial measure, but rather it is the effects that such a history may produce. The Board must demonstrate, through evidence and carefully articulated presumptions, that such effects have occurred or are likely to occur. In doing so, the Board must consider, for example, the seriousness of the violations involved, the amount of time between violations and the extent to which employees know or may have reason to know of past incidents of unlawful conduct. We do not suggest that the Board has failed in all cases to consider these factors. For instance, in Wolverine World Wide, Inc., 243 N.L.R.B. No. 72 (July 12, 1979), the Board held that three instances of misconduct committed during a period of time of six to fourteen years were too remote in time from the instant proceeding to support a finding that the employer had a proclivity to violate the Act.

We believe that each of the remedies imposed in this proceeding is within the authority of the Board to impose in an appropriate case. As developed above, each of these remedies may be ordered if necessary to offset the effects of unlawful employer conduct. Furthermore, the Board was clearly entitled, in shaping its remedial order in this case, to consider the extensive record of past unlawful activity of Florida Steel.

We are unable, however, to enforce the order of the Board. The Board has failed to make the findings described above that these corporatewide remedies are necessary to offset coercive or chilling effects caused by the employer conduct at issue, even as that conduct is magnified by the existence of previous violations of the Act. The Board has not yet demonstrated that it is reasonably foreseeable that such effects have been produced on a corporatewide basis.

The Administrative Law Judge in this action found that the violation at issue here could be remedied adequately through the use of traditional cease and desist and affirmative remedial orders. The Board disagreed, and concluded that "extra remedial relief is necessitated by Respondent's proclivity to disregard the statutory rights of its employees and their chosen bargaining representatives." 244 N.L.R.B. No. 61 at 2 (Aug. 20, 1979). The Board supported this conclusion by reference to "reasons fully explicated" in an earlier Florida Steel case, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 195 (June 20, 1979). The Board also noted that the present action was not the initial transgression of employee rights at the Florida Steel plant involved; the Board cited an earlier case in which the Board had found that Florida Steel violated the Act at the Indiantown plant by withholding a wage increase in retaliation for union activities of the employees. The Board made no findings in this case concerning effects caused by the unlawful employer conduct, either at the immediate plant involved or at any other facility of Florida Steel.

In the earlier decision relied upon by the Board, 242 N.L.R.B. No. 195, the Board reviewed at length "the repetitive and flagrant nature" of violations of the Act by Florida Steel. 242 N.L.R.B. No. 195 at 2. The Board stated in that case that extraordinary remedies were needed "to fully remedy Respondent's rejection of the principles of collective bargaining as evidenced by its pattern of unlawful conduct in recent years." Id. The Board also found that "[t]he instant violation is yet another step in what can only be characterized as a corporate campaign to chill employee organizational activity throughout its facilities through unlawful conduct." Id. at 4. The only statement made by the Board concerning the effects produced by this unlawful campaign, however, was a conclusory assertion in a footnote that extraordinary remedies were "essential to neutralize the effects of Respondent's continuing pattern of unlawful conduct in recent years." Id. at 5 n.10.

These statements are insufficient to substantiate the conclusion that corpo-

ratewide access is needed to offset coercive or chilling effects produced corporatewide by the unlawful conduct of Florida Steel. We are no less disturbed than the Board by the extensive history of unlawful conduct of the employer. However, that history alone cannot justify the relief ordered in this case. We have already noted the factors that the Board must weigh before granting union access as a remedial measure. We repeat, for emphasis, that with respect to locations other than the plant where the unfair labor practice has occurred, the Board must find that it is reasonably foreseeable that the employees at these other locations have suffered coercive effects from the employer's unlawful conduct and that an access remedy is necessary to cure those effects. Absent these findings, the Board order at issue here cannot be justified as remedial action, and can only be explained as containing punitive measures designed to deter future violations of the Act.

There is evidence in two earlier Florida Steel proceedings that the company used statutory violations committed at one plant as a "warning" to employees at another plant.[46] On our examination of the record, however, no such evidence has been uncovered since 1977. Moreover, there appears to be no evidence that the company has ever publicized its unlawful conduct corporatewide, or indeed at any of the plants at which there has not yet been union activity. We simply cannot assume from the evidence in this record that the conduct of Florida Steel has had a corporatewide chilling effect upon employees. Given the critical need for coercive effects to be present before access is awarded at the unorganized plants of Florida Steel, we are unable at this time to enforce the order of the Board.

We recognize that chilling effects are sometimes difficult to prove. Moreover it has not been clear previously what the Board must find to justify a broad grant of access imposed as a remedial measure. We have decided, therefore, to remand this case to the Board for further consideration. This decision is consistent with previous cases in this Circuit that have remanded cases to the Board for a more complete explanation of a remedial order. See Textile Workers Union v. NLRB, 475 F.2d 973, 976 (D.C.Cir. 1973); UAW v. NLRB, 455 F.2d 1357, 1369–70 (D.C.Cir. 1971).

It is possible that as a result of the guidelines set forth in this opinion, the Board may decide on remand that some remedies included in this order are not appropriate. Such a decision may lead the Board to impose other remedies, not here ordered, to offset the effects of the unlawful employer conduct. As a result, we do not here address the propriety or impropriety of each remedial measure granted or requested in this case. An entire restructuring of the remedial order may be necessary; we express no opinion on the course such restructuring, if at all necessary, should take. We emphasize again that all of the remedies included in this order fall within the scope of authority of the Board; certain remedies may be imposed, however, only in an appropriate case after necessary findings are made.

There is one additional aspect of the order at issue in this case that we call attention to the Board to consider more fully on remand. Certain provisions of the Board order grant advantages to the Steelworkers Union that competing unions, if any exist, do not similarly receive. We have some reservations concerning the propriety of such an order, particularly at plants in which the Steelworkers have not yet engaged in organizational activity. We reserve judgment on this issue, however, pending further consideration and explanation by the Board on remand.

We recognize that this is a difficult case. Although we have expressed some concerns about certain aspects of the Board's order, we do not in any way suggest that the Board should act less aggressively in enforcing the Act. We simply require that the Board act more deliberatively. We therefore remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

Fugazy Continental Corp. of Connecticut v. NLRB

NLRB v. Shortway Lines, Inc.

Fugazy Continental Corp. of Connecticut v. NLRB

514 F. Supp. 718 (E.D. N.Y.), February 26, 1981

On motion to require compliance with Bd.

COSTANTINO, District Judge: The above captioned actions arise out of proceedings presently before the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB"). Multiple claims have been raised by both the NLRB and Fugazy Continental Corporation of Connecticut ("Fugazy"). Specifically, the NLRB has requested that an order by this Court be issued which requires Shortway Lines, Inc. ("Shortway"), Holland Industries, Inc. ("Holland"), Dell Bus Co., Inc. ("Dell"), and Michael Margolies, an individual ("Margolies"), to comply with certain NLRB subpoenas; Fugazy, Shortway and Holland have opposed this motion, and in addition, Fugazy has moved for the following additional relief: (1) that the NLRB hearings be permanently stayed to the extent they affect or will affect Fugazy's alleged liability under the federal labor act; (2) that Fugazy's motion to intervene as a respondent in the NLRB application for subpoena enforcement be granted; and (3) that the NLRB's request for subpoena enforcement be stayed so that Fugazy may have an opportunity to argue and receive rulings on the sufficiency of service and the relevancy of materials sought in said subpoenas. For the reasons stated herein, the Court grants the NLRB's request for subpoena enforcement and must deny all of Fugazy's requests.

Two related unfair labor practice cases are presently before the NLRB. The purpose of one such proceeding is to determine the liability of various enterprises under an unfair labor practice order issued by the NLRB and enforced by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals.[1] These enterprise are alleged to be the successors and alter egos of the predecessor corporation, Airport Bus Services, Inc. ("Airport"). In that capacity, the enterprises are alleged to be jointly and severally liable for the prior unfair labor claims.

The second proceeding is to determine the merits of certain additional and continuing unfair labor practice allegations made by the NLRB against Airport and its alleged successors and alter egos.[2] A hearing in this latter case is presently in progress. The two proceedings represent a forum in which to resolve, inter alia, the allegations of successorship and alter ego status, continuing unfair labor practices, and joint and several liability for unfair labor practices of the predecessor corporation.

In the first action filed before this Court, Fugazy seeks to stay the presently pending NLRB hearings in Case Nos. 29-CA-5134, 5148, 6185, 6251, 7154. To this end, Fugazy interposes two defenses, to wit, (1) that the untimely submission of a proof of claim by the Board, as a matter of federal bankruptcy law, bars a claim against Airport Bus, and thus, Fugazy, and (2) the Bankruptcy Court's Order regarding the sale of assets by Holland to Fugazy effectively absolved Fugazy of liability with regard to any backpay claims of the NLRB.

It is well established that interlocutory rulings of the NLRB in the course of proceedings involving unfair labor practices may not be considered by federal District Courts. Myers v. Bethlehem, 303 U.S. 41 58 S.Ct. 459, 82 L.Ed. 638 (1938); United Aircraft Corp. v. McCulloch, 365 F.2d 960 (D.C. Cir. 1966). Here, Fugazy's attempt to enjoin the NLRB proceedings regarding unfair labor claims and to obtain federal District Court review is foreclosed under the National Labor Relations Act. 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. See Board of Trustees of Memorial Hospital of Fremont County v. NLRB, 523 F.2d 845 (10th Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Scenic Sportswear, 475 F.2d 1226 (6th Cir. 1973); Bokat v. Tidewater Equipment Co., 363 F.2d 667 (5th Cir. 1966). Fugazy's claims do not establish jurisdiction in the federal District Court. The instant case does not fall within the exceptions to the general principle of non-reviewability of NLRB proceedings by district courts. See Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958).

In the second action before this court, the NLRB seeks a court order requiring Shortway, Holland, Dell, and Margolies, an individual, to comply with certain subpoenas pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 161(1). This court finds that the subpoenaed material is neither painly incompetent nor irrelevant to the NLRB hearings. See NLRB v. Cowan and Co., Inc., 522 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1975).

Fugazy, however, has moved this court for leave to intervene as a respondent in the subpoena enforcement proceeding. In addition, it has filed a separate action, CV-80-2968, in which it requests that the order for subpoena enforcement be stayed until Fugazy has had the opportunity to argue and receive rulings by the ALJ on the sufficiency of service, and the relevancy of materials sought in the subpoenas.

Fugazy argues that as the alleged alter ego of the Respondents named in the NLRB subpoenas, it should enjoy the same standing and right to argue subpoena revocation before the ALJ. Moreover, Fugazy maintains that it was entitled to be served with all subpoenas issued to the alter ego and/or successor co-Respondents, and finally, that it had an absolute right to argue the question of relevancy relative to any subpoena served upon such co-Respondents.

[1] This case is a supplemental proceeding to determine whether certain named respondents are jointly and severally liable to remedy the unfair labor practices of the predecessor corporation. See NLRB Consolidated Case Nos. 29-CA-5134 and 29-CA-5148: Airport Bus Service, Inc., and its Successors and Alter Egos Shortway Lines, Inc., Cross County Coach Corp., Dell Transportation Service, Manpower and Maintenance, Inc., Holland Industries, Inc., Fugazy Continental Corporation of Connecticut, and Albert Altesman, Trustee in Bankruptcy. An Administrative Law Judge found that certain unfair labor practices had been committed; the findings were sustained and reduced to an Order by the NLRB; a Judgment Enforcing the Order was issued by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals on September 15, 1978.

[2] This case is entitled Airport Bus Service, Inc. and its Successors and Alter Ego Shortway Lines, Inc., Cross County Corp., Dell Transportation Service, Manpower and Maintenance, Inc., Holland Industries, Inc., and Fugazy Continental Corp. of Connecticut, Case Nos: 29-CA-6185, 6251, and 7174.

A district court must be reticent to examine alleged procedural irregularities in the underlying administrative proceedings insofar as piecemeal appeals will disrupt the resolution of labor disputes. NLRB v. Dutch Boy, Inc., Glow Lite Div., 606 F. 2d 929, 933 (10th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Cowan and Co., Inc., 522 F.2d 26, 28 (2d Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Williams, 396 F.2d 247, 249 (7th Cir. 1968); NLRB v. C.C.C. Associates, Inc., 306 F.2d 534, 538 (2d Cir. 1962); Storkline v. NLRB, 298 F.2d 276, 277 (5th Cir. 1962).

Here, Fugazy has not been named or served with the subpoenas in question. Indeed, during oral argument in court, Fugazy stated that it neither owned nor possessed the subpoenaed materials. Yet Fugazy argues that insofar as an alter ego employer is the same employer under a new name, it enjoys, or should enjoy, the same standing as its co-Respondents. Fugazy further asserts that its rights will be unalterably prejudiced if the opportunity to argue the relevancy of the co-Respondent's subpoenas is foreclosed.

This court finds, that at this stage of the proceeding, judicial intervention is unwarranted. Fugazy will have the opportunity to demonstrate prejudicial error in the administrative proceedings upon appeal from the final order of the Board. See NLRB v. Dutch Boy, Inc., Glow Lite Div., supra at 933; NLRB v. C.C.C. Associates, Inc., supra at 538. Further, Fugazy will have the right to argue the relevancy of any subpoenaed materials which are introduced as evidence during the course of the labor hearings. This court finds that, under the standards of District Court inquiry in subpoena enforcement, the requirements of the National Labor Relations Act have been satisfied, 29 U.S.C. § 161(1), and accordingly, the subpoenas must be enforced.

The Court is also cognizant that there is no provision in the National Labor Relations Act for parties not under subpoena to petition to revoke subpoenas served on others. Indeed, it is well settled that a person has no Fourth Amendment basis for challenging subpoenas directed at the business records of a third party. See, e. g., United States v. Miller 425 U.S. 435, 96 S.Ct. 1619, 48 L.Ed.2d 71 (1976); Donaldson v. United States, 400 U.S. 517, 91 S.Ct. 534, 27 L.Ed.2d 580 (1971); First National Bank v. United States, 267 U.S. 576, 45 S.Ct. 231, 69 L.Ed. 796 (1925); Reporters Committee For Freedom of the Press v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 593 F.2d 1030 (D.C. Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 949, 99 S.Ct. 1431, 59 L.Ed.2d 639 (1979); United States v. Schutterle, 586 F.2d 1201 (8th Cir. 1978); United States v. House, 524 F.2d 1035 (3d Cir. 1975); United States v. Continental Bank & Trust Co., 503 F.2d 45 (10th Cir. 1974); Application of Cole v. Franklin National Bank, 342 F.2d 5 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 950, 85 S.Ct. 1803, 14 L.Ed.2d 723 (1965). Cf. California Bankers Ass'n v. Schultz, 416 U.S. 21, 94 S.Ct. 1494, 39 L.Ed.2d 812 (1974); Wilson v. United States, 221 U.S. 361, 31 S.Ct. 538, 55 L.Ed. 771 (1911).

In point of fact, the courts have not taken an expansive view of standing; instead, they have located its boundaries within a personal and introspective setting. See generally United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 100 S.Ct. 2547, 65 L.Ed.2d 619 (1980); United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727, 100 S.Ct. 2439, 65 L.Ed.2d 468 (June 23, 1980); Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128, 99 S.Ct. 421, 58 L.Ed.2d 387 (1978); Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 89 S.Ct., 961, 22 L.Ed.2d 176 (1969). Thus, it is submitted that it is now for the legislature, and not for the courts, to broaden the scope of standing in the context of the National Labor Relations Act. See, e. g., 26 U.S.C. § 7609.

Finally, the Court is unconvinced that Fugazy has established the grounds for intervention as of right or for permissive intervention. Fed.R.Civ.P. 24(a), (b). As admitted in court, Fugazy has neither ownership nor possession of the subpoenaed materials. The subpoenas direct specific entities to produce documents in their possession which are allegedly relevant to the issues involved in a pending unfair labor practice proceeding.

Fugazy has established neither a claim of privilege nor a proprietary interest in the subpoenaed records. Instead, it asserts a right to intervene in the subpoena enforcement proceeding, merely by virtue of its status as a co-Respondent and alleged alter ego in the administrative proceeding. With this proposition, the Court cannot agree. See generally United States Postal Service v. Brennan, 579 F.2d 188 (2d Cir. 1978); Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Train, 71 F.R.D. 391 (N.D.Ill.1976). A putative intervenor must demonstrate an interest relating to the property which is the subject of the action; the mere assertion that the examination of third party records may unearth incriminating evidence is not sufficient to invoke Rule 24. See Donaldson v. United States, 400 U.S. 517, 91 S.Ct. 534, 27 L.Ed.2d 580) 1971).

The Court also is not convinced that the enforcement of the sub-poenas will impair Fugazy's ability to protect its interest or that Fugazy, in this matter, will be inadequately represented by the supoenaed parties. See generally United States Postal Service v. Brennan, supra; Commonwealth Edison Co. v. Train, supra. Fugazy will have ample opportunity to inspect and oppose the admission of any document into evidence during the course of the pending administrative hearing.

Accordingly, the Court must deny Fugazy's motion to intervene pursuant to either Rule 24(a) or (b). Fed.R.Civ.P.24. Finally, this Court will enforce the subpoenas in light of the fact that (1) they are seeking information neither irrelevant nor plainly incompetent and (2) the information relates to matters under investigation.

In addition, this Court will not remand the subpoena enforcement proceeding to the administrative forum and will not stay the administrative hearings on the unfair labor claims.

So Ordered.

NLRB v. Anchorage Times Publishing Co.

637 F.2d 1359 (9th Cir.), February 27, 1981;
certiorari denied October 5, 1981—237 NLRB 544

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before ANDERSON & SKOPIL, Circuit Judges, and BYRNE,* District Judge

WM. MATTHEW BYRNE, Jr., District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board ("the Board") petitions for enforcement of its order against the Anchorage Times Publishing Co. ("the Company" or "the Times"), reported at 237 N.L.R.B. No. 78 (1978). We hold that substantial evidence supports all of the Board's unfair labor practice findings and, accordingly, enforce the Board's chosen remedies, including a bargaining order.

I. BACKGROUND

The Times is Alaska's largest newspaper publishing company, with its primary offices located in a single building in downtown Anchorage. During the relevant period, the Times employed approximately 280 employees in five departments.

During the late summer of 1976, several employees in the editorial department (the newsroom) initiated meetings between high level management officials and newsroom employees to discuss wages and working conditions.[1] Dissatisfied with the results of these meetings, a group of employees sought to find a union willing to represent the Times employees in the accounting, advertising, circulation, and editorial departments. To this end they met with William Coleman, a representative of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 1547 AFL-CIO ("the Union"), who agreed to help organize a campaign among Times employees in the four departments.

Coleman conducted four meetings with the employees between October 24 and November 5, 1976. At these meetings he solicited employees to sign cards authorizing the Union to represent them for the purpose of collective bargaining with Times management.[2] Coleman explained to the employees that if thirty percent of the employees in the bargaining unit signed such cards, a petition could be filed for a Board-conducted election. He further explained that if fifty-one percent of the employees in the bargaining unit signed authorization cards, the Union could request the Company to recognize the Union voluntarily as the employees' exclusive bargaining representative, although he cautioned that it was unlikely that the Company would extend such recognition. The employees were advised by Coleman that by signing the cards they were authorizing the Union to represent them in collective bargaining. Some of the cards were signed by employees at the meeting; others were signed at other locations and returned to the Union.

---

*The Honorable Wm. Matthew Byrne, Jr., United States District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

[1] The first meeting was held in early August 1976, the second on September 22, and the third in early October. At these meetings topics included the phasing out of pressroom jobs because of the installation of new electronic equipment, inadequacies of salaries, and the existence of newly-established wage scales and promotion guidelines.

"AUTHORIZATION FOR REPRESENTATION

I authorize the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers to represent me in collective bargaining with my employer."

The other card, which was mailed to employees, read:

"I REQUEST A GOVERNMENT ELECTION I, the undersigned of my own free will, hereby authorize and designate the National Brotherhood of Electrical Workers of the AFL-CIO and CLC to represent me in collective bargaining with my employer in all matters pertaining to rates of pay, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment. This card is also for the purpose of requesting the N.L.R.B. for an election."

[2] The Union distributed two different cards to employees. The card handed out at meetings read:

On November 15, 1976, the Union filed with the Board a petition requesting a representation election. After a hearing, the Regional Director determined that the appropriate bargaining unit contained 181 employees and that 97 valid authorization cards had been signed on or before November 13, 1976.[3] He ordered the election to be held in early January, 1977.

The election was held on January 20, 1977, and the employees voted seventy-seven to seventy-three against the Union, with sixteen ballots challenged.[4] The Union filed separate unfair labor practice charges against the Company on January 17, 1977, and on January 24, 1977. The Union contended that, during the course of the campaign, both before and after the Union filed the petition requesting an election, the Company engaged in a course of conduct that included interrogating employees about union sympathies; conducting surveillance of Union-related employee activities; threatening job losses in the event of a vote in favor of the Union; terminating an employee for discriminatory reasons; and granting wage increases immediately prior to the election in order to influence the employees' votes. These charges were consolidated for hearing before the Board's Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ"). After extensive hearings, he determined that the Company had violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) & 158(a)(3) (1976). The ALJ found that the Union represented a majority of the employees and that the unfair labor practices prevented the holding of a fair "rerun" election. He therefore recommended that the Board set aside the results of the January 20 election and order the Company to bargain with the Union. The ALJ also recommended that one employee, who had been dismissed in violation of the Act, be reinstated and made whole, and that the customary notices be posted. The Board adopted the ALJ's recommendations with minor variations, not here relevant.[5] Now the Board petitions for enforcement of its order.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The Board found that the Company had engaged in a pervasive scheme of unfair labor practices, both before and after the filing of the election petition. In reviewing these findings, the Court cannot overturn decisions that are supported by substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487–88, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464–65, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Tischler, 615 F.2d 509, 511 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Bighorn Beverage, 614 F.2d 1238, 1240 (9th Cir. 1980). That is, if there are conflicting interpretations of the facts, and the one adopted by the Board is supported by substantial evidence, the Court may not substitute a different interpretation. See NLRB v. Adams Delivery Service, Inc., 623 F.2d 96, 99 (9th Cir. 1980).

A. INTERROGATIONS

The largest number of unfair labor practice incidents found by the Board consisted of unlawful interrogations of employees about their union sympathies. These interrogations were conducted over a period of several months by various high-ranking Company officials including General Manager William Tobin (who oversaw all five departments),

---

[3] Three additional valid authorization cards were signed by employees on November 14, 1976, making a total of one hundred.

[4] The Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board issued a supplemental decision on the challenged ballots, overruling twelve challenges, sustaining one and leaving three undetermined. The revised tally showed a vote of eighty-eight to seventy-four against the Union.

[5] The Board corrected certain computational errors made by the ALJ in determining total valid authorization cards and determined that the obligation to bargain arose on November 13, 1976. (Chairman Fanning disagreed on the issue as to when the duty to bargain arose.)

Managing Editor Clint Andrews (who supervised the editorial department), City Editor Michael Todd, and Director of Circulation Jules Molenda.[6]

The Company raises three objections to the Board's findings that these interrogations constituted unfair labor practices: first, that substantial evidence does not support the factual findings of the Board; second, that the Board erred in finding the interrogations unlawful because there was no evidence that the questioning actually 1364 intimidated any employees in the exercise of their guaranteed rights; and third, that under the Board's "critical period" doctrine the interrogations conducted before the filing of the election petition should not be considered unfair labor practices or, at least, should not be relied upon in justifying a bargaining order.

1. Substantial Evidence

After a careful review of the extensive testimony at the hearings before the ALJ, the Court concludes that the Board's determination of facts in each incident is supported by substantial, although not uncontradicted, evidence. The Company points to testimony in the record that would tend to undermine the particular factual findings. In each instance, however, the conflict in testimony resolves to a question of evaluating the credibility of the witnesses. The ALJ is in the best position to evaluate which witness is recalling the facts most accurately, and the Court cannot conduct a de novo review of the testimony to make different credibility determinations. NLRB v. Adams Delivery Service, Inc., 623 F.2d at 99.

2. Intimidation

The Company argues that the Board's findings should be overturned because there was no evidence that the interrogations actually had a coercive effect on the employees. Indeed, in two instances the interrogators indicated that the employees did not have to answer the questions.[7] Thus, it argues, the interrogations did not affect the outcome of the election and should not be considered unfair labor practices.

The short answer to this argument is that interrogation violates the Act if it has a tendency to intimidate employees in the exercise of their protected rights, even if there is no evidence of actual intimidation. See Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Bell Manufacturing Division, DiGiorgio Leisure Products, Inc., 483 F.2d 150, 151–53 (9th Cir. 1973). As this Court explained in Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, Local No. 364 v. NLRB, 435 F.2d 668, 669 (9th Cir. 1970),

> [i]n order for an employer's interogation of employees to constitute unfair labor practices under section 8(a)(1) it must be associated with express or implied threats or promises, or form part of an overall pattern tending to restrain or coerce employees with regard to their protected activi-

[6] In early October 1976, reporter Mary Kay Brown approached General Manager Tobin regarding management's failure to reveal wage scales assigned to employee job levels. Tobin asked Brown what kind of conspiracy the newsroom employees were plotting. He advised her that the Times did not expect employees to stay with the newspaper forever and that if she was unsatisfied she could go elsewhere. He also said that if the employees had a union movement going on, it would not be proper for him to talk to her. The ALJ credited Brown's testimony, finding Tobin's remarks to be a "veiled threat that if the employee persisted in her activities, her job status would be in jeopardy."

The Board found that Managing Editor Andrews had interrogated employees in violation of the Act in three instances. In mid-October he called reporter Mary Day Brown into his office and stated he knew she was involved with the Union. She told him he did not have the right to question her and he answered that he could question her but she did not have to answer. Thereafter the Union organizing committee drafted a note to Andrews warning him not to interrogate employees about Union activities. Andrews also called reporter Frank Gerjevic into his office to inform him of a raise and to state that he appreciated Gerjevic's work because he was quiet and did not want to vote. Finally Andrews asked another reporter, John Matthews, if he had made up his mind about the Union, noting that it might not be legal for him to ask. Matthews gave an evasive answer.

The Board also found that the City Editor, Michael Todd, had unlawfully interrogated three Times employees, reporter Carl Sampson, reporter William Wilson and his wife Sarah Wilson. These instances were found to violate the Act partially because the Company's animus against the unionization was well known and because no legitimate purpose was served by the questioning.

In late December, Director of Circulation Jules Molenda divided the duties of the departing office manager in the circulation department among three "group leaders," Elaine Craft, Elaine Moore, and Betty Broste. According to testimony credited by the ALJ, he told them their jobs were probationary. At the same time he inquired if the three employees were pro-Union, cautioning them that they did not have to answer that question. The Board determined that the question contained an implied threat that the permanence of the promotion depended upon their refusal to support the Union.

The last incident of interrogation occurred when an employee, Lynn Symonds, inquired of the Personnel Manager, Martha Lloyd, if there was a job opening at the Times for her brother. Lloyd asked her if her brother was pro-Union. The Board found that this question carried the implication that the Times considered the Union sympathies of an applicant for employment, despite its official policy to the contrary.

> ties * * *. When the inquires are not undertaken in a threatening manner but are only isolated instances free of coercion and without any systematic intimidation in the background, they are not unlawful.

The burden rests on the General Counsel to prove that the interrogations violated the Act. See Hughes & Hatcher, Inc. v. NLRB, 393 F.2d 557, 563 (9th Cir. 1968).

In this case, the Board found that each interrogation incident was associated with an implied threat. Moreover, it found that the interrogrations were part of an overall systematic pattern of intimidation of employees. These findings are supported by substantial evidence and, therefore, justify the conclusion that the interrogations were unfair labor practices even though there was no evidence that employees were actually intimidated by the interrogations.

3. The "Critical Period" Doctrine

Finally, the company argues that under the Board's "critical period" doctrine, interrogations occurring before the filing of the election petition should not be considered unfair labor practices and should not be considered in determining if the results of the election should be set aside and the Company ordered to bargain. It relies upon Ideal Electric and Manufacturing Co., 134 N.L.R.B. 1275, 1278 (1961), wherein the Board > concludes, in all the circumstances, that the date of filing of the petition * * * should be the cutoff time in considering alleged objectionable conduct in contested cases. From that time, when the Board's processes have been invoked and a prompt election may be anticipated pursuant to present procedures, we believe that conduct thereafter which tends to prevent a free election should appropriately be considered as a postelection objection.

To the extent that the Company is arguing that the "critical period" doctrine is a variety of statute of limitations imposed by the Board on unfair labor practices, it is clearly wrong. The only statute of limitations upon unfair labor practice charges is that found in Section 10(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b), which provides that the Board cannot issue a complaint "based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made * * *." See Local Lodge No. 1424 v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411, 80 S.Ct. 822 4 L.Ed.2d 832 (1960). As long as this requirement is satisfied, the Board is free to find that unfair labor practices have been committed regardless of the date of the filing of an election petition. Indeed, an employer can commit an unfair labor practice in some instances even if there is never an election petition filed.

To the extent that the Company is arguing that the "critical period" doctrine prevents these "prefiling" interrogations from being considered in issuing a bargaining order, it is also incorrect. It is not clear whether the Board considers the "critical period" doctrine expressed in Ideal Electric to be a rule of evidence or a rule of substantive law. See Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn and Queens, Inc. v. NLRB, 589 F.2d 1166, 1170–74 (2d Cir. 1978). This Court, however, has considered the Ideal Electric "critical period" doctrine and found that it > is simply an evidentiary device calculated to render irrelevant upon a post election contest, conduct "too remote" to have interfered with the employees' exercise of the free choice guaranteed by Sec. 7 of the Act.

NLRB v. R. Dakin & Co., 477 F.2d 492, 494 (9th Cir. 1973). The Court concluded that we were > not prepared to give our approval to a rule which flatly bars the consideration of all pre-petition misconduct, particularly where, as here, the Regional Director concluded, and the Board affirmed, that such alleged misconduct "raised a substantial and material issue of fact" regarding the validity of the election.

Id. Accord, NLRB v. Lawrence Typographical Union No. 570, 376 F.2d 643, 652 (10th Cir. 1967).[8] Here, the Board considered that the events that occurred before the petition was filed were relevant to the fairness of the election. All of the incidents found to be unfair labor practices by the Board were within a month and a half of the filing of the petition, and all arose out of the Company's concern about the organization drive that led to the petition and, ultimately, to the election. This Court cannot say, as a matter of law, that these events were too remote to have had an effect on the election outcome. Nor will the Court require the Board to enforce an inflexible per se rule to disregard incidents before the filing of the election petition. Therefore, the Company's objections based upon the "critical period" doctrine are rejected.

[8] The Board itself has not invariably followed the Ideal Electric rule when it felt circumstances warranted considering pre-petition conduct. See, e.g., Baker Machine & Gear, Inc., 220 N.L.R.B. 194, 207 (1975); Servomoton of Columbus, Inc., 219 N.L.R.B. 504, 505 (1975); Willis Shaw Frozen Express, 209 N.L.R.B. 267 (1974); Weather Seals Inc., 161 N.L.R.B. 1226 (1966).

The Court has considered the other objections raised to the Board's finding that these interrogations constituted unfair labor practices and finds them without merit.

B. SURVEILLANCE AND THREATS

Director of Circulation Jules Molenda urged Yvette Hamilton, then office manager of the circulation department, to have some employees attend a Union meeting and report back. She persuaded two employees to attend the meeting and Molenda, on his own, persuaded two others to attend as well. The Board's conclusion that this activity constituted an unfair labor practice is supported by substantial evidence. Cf.

NLRB v. Randall P. Kane, Inc., 581 F.2d 215, 218 (9th Cir. 1978).

City Editor Michael Todd told Sarah and William Wilson, both Times employees, that management was watching who attended NLRB hearings on the representation petition. He told them he did not think Sarah Wilson should attend, although it would be all right for William Wilson to attend, because his job was covering labor news. Creating the impression of surveillance of union activities can be as coercive as actual surveillance and, therefore, constitute an unfair labor practice. See NLRB v. Miller Redwood Co., 407 F.2d 1366, 1368 (9th Cir. 1969). Substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that Todd committed an unfair labor practice.

The Board also found that Director of Circulation Molenda, at a group meeting of the circulation department, threatened employees that if the Union won the election it would be cheaper to replace the composing room employees with a computer. Larry King, a lower-level mailroom supervisor, threatened two mailroom drivers that, if the Union won the election, at least one of them would be laid off because the company could not afford both. The Board has the primary responsibility to distinguish between a threat, which is an unfair labor practice, and a prediction of the probable consequence of unionization, which is not. See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969); NLRB v. General Telephone Directory Co., 602 F.2d 912, 915 (9th Cir. 1979). Prior anti-union policies or sentiments by the Company can be considered in determining if the particular statement is a prediction or a threat. See e.g., NLRB v. Lenkurt Electric Co., 438 F.2d 1102, 1107 (9th Cir. 1971). In both of these instances, ample evidence supports the Board's conclusion that unfair labor practices were committed.

C. THE TERMINATION OF ANN GABLER

Ann Gabler was an education reporter with the Times. During the Union election campaign she decided to return to school to become a paramedic. On several occasions in December 1976, she asked Times managers if she could continue as a part-time worker after beginning school in mid-January. On December 6, 1976, Managing Editor Andrews told her that he thought something could be worked out. On the next day, City Editor Todd indicated that he could use her on Saturdays. According to testimony credited by the ALJ, on the same day, General Manager Tobin told her that her plan to work part-time would be "fine." Gabler again discussed the question with Andrews in early January and received an indication that it could be worked out.

Sunday Editor Michael Doogan testified that shortly before Gabler was due to stop working full-time he asked Andrews if she could work for him on Saturday nights. Andrews replied, "We don't know where she is on this union business. She tells [Tobin] one thing and other people something else." He instructed Doogan to find out what her Union sentiments were. Thereafter Andrews told Gabler that she could not work part-time, although he indicated that there might be a position after the election. She replied that if she were still working she would vote for the Union and, according to Gabler's testimony, Andrews replied that "elections are won or lost by a single vote." Finally, the Personnel Manager testified that the Times management had placed Gabler's name on the "undecided" list regarding her Union sentiments.

The pendency of a union representation election does not prevent management from carrying on its business in the normal fashion. A company may continue to make business decisions for good reasons, for bad reasons, or for no reasons at all, so long as the decisions are not motivated by anti-union discrimination or a desire to punish activities protected by the Act. L'Eggs Products, Inc., 619 F.2d at 1341. An employer is free to terminate [9] an employee unless anti-union animus is the moving or "but for" cause. See NLRB v. Adams Delivery Service, Inc., 623 F.2d at 99; Stephenson v. NLRB, 614 F.2d (1210, 1213 (9th Cir. 1980); Western Exterminator Co. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1114, 1118 (9th Cir. 1977). The General Counsel bears the burden of proving that the discharge was in violation of the Act. See NLRB v. Adams Delivery Service, Inc., 623 F.2d at 99. The Board must base the finding on more than a mere circumstantial inference drawn from a general history of anti-union activities by the company. NLRB v. Best Products Co., Inc., 618 F.2d 70, 74 (9th Cir. 1980).

In this case the ALJ credited the testimony of Gabler and Doogan and found that "the employee's position regarding the Union was a critical factor in management's decision not to honor her request for part-time employment." He found that she would have been offered the part-time job if management had been certain that she took an anti-Union stance. Thus, the ALJ concluded and the Board agreed, that the Company impermissibly based the employment decision upon Gabler's failure to express an anti-union preference, in violation of § 8(a)(3) of the Act. This finding is supported by substantial evidence and will not be overturned.

D. GRANTING BENEFITS PRIOR TO THE ELECTION

On July 26, 1976, well before the unionization drive began, the Company formulated a new program of wage reviews, which was to take effect in September of that year. The program called for regular reviews of all employees at various intervals, depending upon the length of employment and job description. The Board did not find that this program violated the Act. However, the Board found that the Company deviated from the plan in such a way as to grant an inordinate number of wage increases and promotions in the two days immediately preceding the election. Twenty-eight employees, or fifteen percent of the bargaining unit, received wage increases on January 18 or 19, 1977. Eleven of the wage increases were granted three or more weeks later than the time prescribed in the wage review plan timetable. Six of the increases were granted two or more weeks earlier than called for in the timetable. The Board found that these wage increases were "saved" to have the maximum impact on the election results and that, therefore, they constituted unfair labor practices.

Granting a regularly scheduled wage increase does not become an unfair labor practice merely because a union representation election is pending. Oshman's Sporting Goods, Inc. v. NLRB, 586 F.2d 699, 705 (9th Cir. 1978); Allen v. NLRB, 561 F.2d 976, 981 (D.C. Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Styletek, Division of Pandel-Bradford, Inc., 520 F.2d 275, 280 (1st Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Gruber's Super Market, Inc., 501 F.2d 697, 701 (7th Cir. 1974). However, § 8(a)(1) prohibits "conduct immediately favorable to employees which is undertaken with the express purpose of impinging upon their freedom of choice for or against unionization and is reasonably calculated to have that effect." NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409, 84 S.Ct. 457, 460, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964). Accord, NLRB v. Olympic Medical Corp., 608 F.2d 762, 764 (9th Cir. 1979). The motive of the employer is critical in determining whether the granting of a wage increase prior to an election is an unfair labor practice. An important indicator of that motive is whether there has been a change from the status quo. See Free-Flow Packaging Corp. v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1124, 1129 (9th Cir. 1978). Moreover, the law is well established that there is a presumption of illegal motive adhering to wage increases granted prior to an election.

[9] Both parties discuss this issue as a termination question, even though Gabler voluntarily left her full-time employment with the Company. The Board's remedy for the unfair labor practice requires that the Company reinstate her in a job on a part-time basis, or the equivalent.

Id.; NLRB v. Newman-Green, Inc., 401 F.2d 1, 3 (7th Cir. 1968). As one court has observed:

> The Board has long required employers to justify the timing of benefits conferred while an election is actually pending. Justifying the timing is different from merely justifying the benefits generally.
> 1368
> Wage increases and associated benefits may be well warranted for business reasons; still the Board is under no duty to permit them to be husbanded until right before an election and sprung on the employees in a manner calculated to influence the employees' choice.

NLRB v. Styletek, Division of Pandel-Bradford, Inc., 520 F.2d at 280.

In this case the large percentage of the bargaining unit that received wage increases, coupled with the several weeks variation from the Company's own schedule for those increases, coupled with the extremely close proximity to the election provides ample evidence to support the Board's conclusion that the Company intended the wage increases to influence voting in the election. The Company's explanation that the fact the wage increases occurred in the two days prior to the election was merely coincidental is incredible. Therefore, the Court affirms the determination of the Board that these wage increases constituted unfair labor practices.

III. THE BARGAINING ORDER

Relying on NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Board set aside the election and ordered the Company to bargain with the Union. Such an extreme remedy is authorized where an employer's conduct during an election campaign is so disruptive as to taint any "re-run" election. In Gissel the Court identified two categories of cases in which such an order is warranted. In the first category the employer's unfair labor practices are so "outrageous" and "pervasive" that a bargaining order is almost always warranted. Id. at 613–14, 89 S.Ct. at 1939–40. In the second category the employer's conduct is less flagrant but still bad enough to tend to undermine the free election process. In this latter category the Board can issue a bargaining order if the Union demonstrates that it represented a majority of the unit employees who signed valid union authorization cards. The Court also identified a third category in which the employer's practices will not merit a bargaining order because of their minimal effect on the election process. Id. at 614–15, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. See NLRB v. Chatfield-Anderson Co., Inc., 606 F.2d 266, 268 (9th Cir. 1979) (delineating the three Gissel categories); NLRB v. Pacific Southwest Airlines, 550 F.2d 1148, 1151 (9th Cir. 1977) (same).

The Company's activities in this case were not outrageous enough to fit into the first Gissel category. Therefore, the bargaining order will be enforced only if there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the conclusion that the Union enjoyed majority status at some time prior to the election and that the employer's unfair labor practices were sufficiently pervasive and outrageous to undermine the opportunity for a fair "re-run" election.

A. THE UNION'S MAJORITY STATUS

The Board found that by November 15, 1976, the Union had obtained 97 valid authorization cards in a unit of 181 employees As a majority would consist of 91 employees, at least seven of the authorization cards would have to be invalidated to destroy the Union's majority. The Company's primary argument is that some fourteen of the authorization cards were invalid because the employees who signed them believed that the cards only requested an election and did not authorize the Union to represent them in collective bargaining with the Company.

The Union used two different authorization card forms, one of which was "single purpose" and the other of which was "double purpose."[10] Both cards clearly and unambiguously indicate the signer's intent to be represented by the Union in collective bargaining. In Gissel the Supreme Court noted:

> employees should be bound by the clear language of what they sign unless that language is deliberately and clearly cancelled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disre> gard and forget the language above his signature.

[10] See note 2 supra.

395 U.S. at 606, 89 S.Ct. at 1936. The Company argues that Union organizer William Coleman created a false impression about the purpose of the cards at group meetings, that individual Union adherents told particular employees that the only purpose for the card was to secure an election and that several employees believed that the only purpose of the card was to gain an election, although they could not remember exactly what was told to them.

As to William Coleman, a review of the record reveals ample evidence to support the Board's finding that he fully and fairly explained the representation function of the authorization cards. The fact that several employees who attended group meetings could not recall such explanation is not sufficient to require this Court to overturn the Board's factual determination.

As to the individual solicitations, the rule is that where an employee is told that his card will be used only to obtain an election the card is not valid, but where he is not actually told that, but his only intent is to obtain an election, the card is valid. See NLRB v. Randall P. Kane, Inc., 581 F.2d 215, 219–20 (9th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. South Bay Daily Preeze, 415 F.2d 360, 365–67 (9th Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915, 90 S.Ct. 919, 25 L.Ed.2d 96 (1970). A careful reading of the record reveals that only four employees (Kathleen Digel, Patricia Kieferly, Beverly Gearhart and Joseph Maguire) testified that they were actually told that the only purpose was to obtain an election. If the ALJ and Board had credited the testimony of these four employees, their authorization cards would be invalid. However, the ALJ and Board did not credit their testimony and their findings are entitled to great weight by this Court. Moreover, even if all four cards had been excluded, the remaining cards would have been sufficient to constitute a Union majority.

Seven other employees (Kathleen Ann Bibler, Lynn Conway, Betty Mead, John Spahr, Beth McCullough, Linda Goodson and Patricia Lindsey) recall being told that the cards would be used to obtain an election but fail to recall if they were told that it was the only purpose of the cards. In the absence of direct testimony that the employees were improperly solicited, it would be impossible for this Court to overturn the Board's factual findings and substitute a finding that Union adherents had "deliberately and clearly" cancelled the card's Union authorization purpose. Therefore, the Board's finding that the authorization cards of these seven employees were valid will not be changed.

The remaining objections of the Company, that the Union's majority status is tainted by the efforts of supervisors on the behalf of the Union, that the Board improperly refused to allow the Company to see affidavits and questionnaries given to it by employee-signers who did not testify, and that one of the unit members, Ray Tyson, should have been considered a manager and, therefore, not eligible to participate as an employee in the election, are not well founded. Therefore, we find that the Union did enjoy majority status as of November 13, 1976.

B. PERVASIVE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

In Gissel the Court emphasized that the determination of when to issue a bargaining order is within the discretion of the Board. 395 U.S. at 612, n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32; NLRB v. Peninsula Ass'n for Retarded Children and Adults, 627 F.2d 202, 204 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Pacific Southwest Airlines, 550 F.2d at 1150–51. Although that discretion is not unbounded, the Court should enforce a bargaining order where the unfair labor practices are pervasive and severe enough to fit in either the first or second Gissel category.

In this case, the Board explained its decision to issue a bargaining order, based on the range of unfair labor practices that it had found, as follows:

> The numerous and presistent acts of unlawful interrogation by higher level management, the selective hiring policy based upon unlawful questioning of job applicants or employees seeking to arrange > employment interviews for job applicants, the use of employees to engage in surveillance, and the creating of an impression among employees that management was engaging in surveillance of their union and protected activities, as well as the threats of loss of employment are collectively sufficient to warrant a determination that a fair rerun election could not be held. Equally pernicious * * * is management's manipulative use of the wage review program to grant pay increases to groups of employees in all departments in an effort to undermine their support for the Union and influence the outcome of the election. It is reasonable to conclude that the total cumulative effect of these unfair labor practices, coupled with the additional unlawful refusal to employ Gabler on a part-time basis, will be a lasting one, and the conditions necessary for providing a fair expression of employee sentiment in a rerun election will not be achieved by a traditional cease and desist order.

The total number, severity, and immediacy of the unfair labor practices in this case far exceeds those in NLRB v. Peninsula Ass'n for Retarded Children and Adults, 627 F.2d at 204, (where the violations were characterized as "relatively mild"), and in NLRB v. Chatfield-Anderson Co., Inc., 606 F.2d at 269, (where the most severe violations were "mitigated" and others were "almost trivial"), two recent cases in which we refused to enforce Board bargaining orders.

The wage increases, which were granted immediately prior to the election, are the most significant among the many unfair labor practices cited by the Board. It is unlikely that those who received such benefits, or who heard of them, will forget that it is the Company that has the final word on wage increases—and decreases.

In addition, we are not persuaded that the harmful effect of the Company's unfair labor practices has been dissipated by the fact that two of the Company's representatives who committed some of the unfair labor practices (supervisors King and Molenda) have left its employ. Several of the unfair labor practices were committed by high level management personnel who did not, as did the management personnel in Chatfield-Anderson Co., Inc., choose to disavow their coercive conduct before the election. Moreover, the unlawful wage increases were granted by management, not by the departed supervisors. Cf. NLRB v. Peninsula Ass'n for Retarded Children and Adults, 627 F.2d at 205 (solicitation manager "directly responsible" for violations no longer with employer). Therefore, it appears unlikely that the effect on the employees of the unfair labor practices of management has been softened by the departure of two supervisors.

The Board's findings that a fair rerun election would not be possible is, therefore, supported by substantial evidence.

The Board's entire order, including the bargaining order, is enforced.

Caterpillar Tractor Co. v. NLRB

638 F.2d 140 (9th Cir.), March 2, 1981; rehearing denied October 7, 1981—250 NLRB 527

On petition to review Board Order

Before Duniway, Tang and Canby, Circuit Judges

141

Tang, Circuit Judge: The question presented is whether substantial evidence supports the finding that Caterpillar Tractor Company violated the National Labor Relations Act on two occasions when it disciplined union steward Everett Cleveland. We find that there is substantial evidence, and therefore, deny Caterpillar's petition for review, and grant the Board's cross-application for enforcement of its order.

I.

The Board found that Caterpillar violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the Act when Caterpillar issued a warning to Cleveland for his communication with employees in a department other than his own, because Caterpillar's action was a discriminatory application of a plant rule that was motivated by Cleveland's status as chief steward. We agree that § 8(a)(1) was violated. We therefore need not consider whether § 8(a)(3) was also violated.

Caterpillar's discriminatory enforcement of plant rules against Cleveland because he was a union steward interfered with the exercise of Cleveland's Section 7 rights. Caterpillar defends its disparate treatment of Cleveland on the ground that the presence of a union steward is "inherently disruptive." This reason, however, does not constitute a legitimate business justification under the facts of this case. The record shows that the brief visits and communications by Cleveland which precipitated his discipline were either just before or near the end of the work day and did not disrupt the plant's work activity. "In such a situation there is no need to inquire into motive and no need to balance competing rights." National Cash Register Co. v. NLRB, 466 F.2d 945, 936 (6th Cir. 1972), cert. denied 410 U.S. 966, 93 S.Ct 1442, 35 L.Ed.2d 700 (1973); see also Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co., 380 U.S. 263, 268-69, 85 S.Ct. 994, 998, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965).

II.

The Board also found that Caterpillar violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act when it suspended Cleveland for 60 days because he assisted an employee with the filing of her grievance.

Cleveland, as the chief union steward, was authorized under the bargaining contract to write up employee grievances. He was engaged in protected activity when he went to assist employee McPherson in department 94cc. See Keokuk Gas Service So. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 328, 333 (8th Cir. 1978); Inter-Polymer Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 631, 633 (9th Cir. 1973). Supervisor Simi's order that Cleveland write the grievance outside on a dirty table where a truck was unloading was a restraint on that activity. With little contradiction, the record shows that the indoor lunch room, not the picnic table, was the area where grievances were usually written up. Simi's arbitrary decision to restrict access to the lunch room, in addition to other evidence showing that Simi was trying to discourage resort to the grievance procedure, provided a substantial basis for the Board's conclusion that Caterpillar had violated § 8(a)(1). In view of the fact that even a past supervisor had designated the lunch room as a proper place to write up grievances Caterpillar's purported business justification for Simi's improvised rule—to prevent disruption—appears to be a pretext.

In light of the above, the fact that Cleveland reacted to Simi's action with an outburst of profanity does not provide good cause for his suspension. Although such conduct cannot be condoned, the Board reasonably found here that it was a response to Simi's interference with protected activity. See NLRB v. Max Factor & Co., ——— F.2d ———, No. 79-7118 (9th Cir. 1980); Trustees of Boston University v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 391 (1st Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Mueller Brass Co., 501 F.2d 680 (5th Cir. 1974).

Caterpillar's petition for review is denied and the Board's cross-application for enforcement is granted.

NLRB v. Consolidated Freightways Corporation of Delaware

651 F.2d 436 (6th Cir.), March 2, 1981—242 NLRB 770

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before MERRITT and KENNEDY, Circuit Judges, ANNA DIGGS TAYLOR, District Judge*

The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of an order issued by the Board on June 4, 1979, finding that the defendant violated Sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158, by discriminatorily refusing to hire John Mitchell because he had engaged in protected union activity, and by informing O.D. Lofton, a job applicant later hired, that it would not hire John Mitchell because of Mitchell's protected union activities. The Board's decision is reported at 242 NLRB No. 119. After a full hearing on these matters, the administrative law judge filed an opinion containing his findings of fact and conclusions of law. The Board adopted his findings and conclusions.

The ALJ found that while acting as president of the local, Mr. Mitchell engaged in a heated conversation with Bob Kirksey, manager of defendant's Memphis terminal, during which he threatened to break both of Kirksey's arms and legs. The ALJ further found that although Mitchell's threat was made in the context of a labor relations discussion it was not protected under the Act, that these threats were, in fact, a matter of genuine concern to Kirksey and that Kirksey's reliance on Mitchell's threats were well-founded and legitimate reasons for not hiring him. In his opinion, the ALJ commented that "Mitchell's conduct and statements [were] so flagrant, opprobrious and egregious at [sic] to have exceeded the bounds of the protection afforded by the Act. Indeed, a punch in the nose pales in comparision to Mitchell's admitted statements to Kirksey." Finally, the ALJ found that neither the company in general, nor Kirksey in particular, entertained a general union animus, and had hired former union officials. Despite these findings which were supported by substantial evidence on the record, the ALJ concluded that there was at least a mixed motive for not hiring Mitchell based upon his view of certain statements attributed to Kirksey concerning Mitchell's past handling of a particular labor dispute.

*Honorable Anna Diggs Taylor, District Judge, United States District Court, Eastern District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

The proper test in determining whether the discharge or failure to hire an employee is an unfair labor practice is whether the anti-union animus was a dominant motive. Thus when both a "good and bad" reason for discharge or failing to hire exist, the burden is upon the General Counsel to establish that in the absence of protected activities, the discharge would not have taken place. Coletti's Furniture, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 550 F.2d 1292, 1294 (1st Cir. 1977). In Wright Line, 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRRM 1169 (1980), the Board, using an analysis akin to that used by the Supreme Court in Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977), set forth a test of causation for cases alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Initially, the General Counsel must make a prima facie showing that an illegal purpose was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once the General Counsel has established a prima facie case, the employer then has the burden of demonstrating that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the illegal reason.

In the instant case the ALJ found that Kirksey's reliance on Mitchell's threats were well-founded and legitimate reasons for not hiring him. There was no evidence that Mitchell's threats were merely a pretext used as an excuse for not hiring him because of his union activity. N.L.R.B. v. Howell Automatic Machine Company, 454

F.2d 1077 (6th Cir. 1972). The ALJ's conclusion that defendant violated 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act cannot withstand scrutiny under Coletti and Wright Line.

Furthermore, there was no evidence that Kirksey's explanation to O. D. Lofton, a former union officer hired by defendant as a driver, as to why he would not hire Mitchell tended to interfere with Lofton's free exercise of his employee rights under the Act.

For the reasons outlined above, enforcement of the order of the National Labor Relations Board in this case is denied.

American Safety Equipment Corporation v. NLRB

643 F.2d 693 (10th Cir.), March 3, 1981—241 NLRB 115

On petition to review and cross petition to enforce Board Order

Before DOYLE, MCKAY and SEYMOUR, Circuit Judges

SEYMOUR, Circuit Judge: American Safety Equipment Corporation (Company) engages in the manufacture, nonretail sale and distribution of automotive restraint systems. The International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, sought to organize production and maintenance employees at the Company's Palmyra, Missouri facility. A National Labor Relations Board representation election was held October 29, 1976. The Union lost, and it filed several objections to the Company's conduct during the preelection period. After an investigation, the Regional Director overruled all the Union objections, but nonetheless set aside the election.

The Regional Director based his decision upon two rules in the Company's employee handbook. One rule prohibited "distribution of unauthorized leaflets, papers, or other materials during working hours on Company property." Rec., vol. II, at 301. The other stated that "only the recognized solicitations for charitable organizations and similar activities specifically approved by the Company will be permitted during working hours."[1] Id. The Regional Director held that the no-solicitation, no-distribution rules constituted an interference with the employees' organization rights.

The Company's request for NLRB review of the Regional Director's decision was telegraphically denied, and a second election was held January 14, 1977. The Union won. The Company objected, claiming section 9(c)(3 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159(c)(3), barred a second election because a valid election had been held in the preceding twelve-month period. The Regional Director overruled the company's objection

[1] The Company promulgated the rules in 1968 to regulate solicitations concerning highly controversial political issues at its already unionized California facility. These rules were adopted without modification when the Company began operation of the Palmyra plant in 1976.

and certified the Union as the employees' bargaining agent. The Board denied the Company's request for review of this decision in a written opinion [2] on January 26, 1978, approximately one year after the Union was certified.

No negotiations took place between the Union and the Company during the Union's certification year. Shortly after review was denied by the Board, the Union sent a letter to the Company requesting negotiations. A second Union letter again sought a bargaining meeting and requested pertinent information about Company employees. The Company did not respond to either communication. Subsequently, the Union filed the unfair labor practice charge that is the basis of this appeal, alleging the Company had refused to bargain and to supply requested information. The Board found violations of sections 8(a)(5) and (1)[3] of the Act and directed the Company to bargain with the Union. The Company petitioned this court for review of the Board's order. The Board cross-applied for enforcement.

The Company raises three issues on appeal. It argues 1) that the Board erred in setting aside the first election; 2) that even assuming the Company had an obligation to bargain after the second election, the Company did not illegally refuse to do so during the certification year; and 3) that after the year had expired, its refusal to bargain was based on a reasonable, good faith doubt as to the Union's majority status. We find the first issue dispositive and, therefore, need not reach the other two questions.

The Company is charged with an unfair labor practice for refusing to bargain with the Union. The Company claims that it had no duty to bargain because the Union was defeated in what it contends was a valid first election. Thus, in determining whether the Company committed an unfair labor practice, we must decide if the Regional Director was justified in setting aside the first election.

Congress has given the Board wide discretion in supervising representation elections. NLRB v. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946). This includes the right to set aside an election in which a party's preelection conduct "reasonably tends to interfere with the voter's free choice," Independent, Inc. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 203, 206 (5th Cir. 1969) (quoting NLRB v. Laney & Duke Storage Warehouse Co., 369 F.2d 859, 864 (5th Cir. 1966)), or unduly influences the election result. NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 12, 180 (6th Cir. 1967). Our review of such a Board decision is limited to determining whether it is supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. Harlan #4 Coal Co. v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 117, 125 (6th Cir. 1974); Tennessee Packers, 406 F.2d at 180. Substantial evidence is "more than a mere scintilla and connotes such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind would accept as adequate to support a conclusion." Ann Lee Sportswear, Inc. v. NLRB, 543 F.2d 739, 742 (10th Cir. 1976).

In this case, the Regional Director conducted a full investigation of the objections made by the Union to the first election. Both the Union and the company were given ample opportunity to present evidence, including sworn statements from witnesses, on the conduct of the election. The only basis found by the Regional Director for setting aside the first election was the no-solicitation, no-distribution rules in the Company handbook, which was given to every new employee.

379 F.2d at 180 (quoting NLRB v. Blades Manufacturing Corp., 344 F.2d 998, 1003 (8th Cir. 1965)). In deciding whether such conditions have been disturbed, rules prohibiting solicitation or distribution during working hours, as opposed to working time, are presumed to interfere with employees' organizational rights. See Essex International, Inc., 211

---

[3] These sections provide:

"(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

"(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

"* * *

"(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title."

N.L.R.B. 749, 86 L.R.R.M. 1411, 1412 (1974). However, an "employer [may] show by extrinsic evidence that, in the context of the particular case, the 'working hours' rule was communicated or applied in such a way as to convey an intent clearly to permit solicitation during breaktime or other periods when employees are not actively at work." Id.

In setting aside the election on the basis of the two rules in the handbook, we conclude that the Regional Director erroneously applied the analysis in Essex to the facts before him. He recognized that under Essex an employer may rebut a prima facie presumption of invalidity by a showing that either the "working hours" rules were communicated or applied properly. But he failed to consider the evidence showing proper application in this case. To meet its burden the Company submitted four employee affidavits covering the solicitation issue. The industrial relations manager stated that employees were told their lunchtime and breaktime were their own to do with as they pleased and that employees were well aware the rules on solicitation and distribution applied only to actual working time. He also stated that employees openly engaged in Union activities, including the distribution of Union material during their nonwork time, and were not disciplined or prohibited from doing so. Two other employees stated that material for and against the Union was openly distributed at the plant during nonworking time and that no one was disciplined as a result. Although as noted by the dissent the Regional Director found only four instances in which employees were specifically informed that the rules only covered actual work time, the evidence clearly establishes that the rules were consistently applied properly by the Company. There is absolutely no evidence to the contrary. Furthermore, in overruling Union objections 2, 3 and 5, the Regional Director himself found that "in enforcing its no-solicitation, no-distribution rules, [the Company] did not engage in conduct which would provide a basis upon which the election may be set aside, inasmuch as the investigation failed to disclose that during the lengthy organizational campaign, the Employer enforced such rules disparately and took action only against employees who supported the [Union]." Rec., vol. II, at 298.

We agree with the dissent that we cannot choose between conflicting facts or inferences from facts. But here the evidence is uncontroverted that the rules were applied by the Company to permit proper Union solicitation. Consequently, the Company met the burden, imposed by Essex, of overcoming the prima facie invalidity of the rules.[4] The Regional Director refused to consider the affidavit evidence presented by the Company. His decision can stand only if the rules are to be considered a per se interference with a representation election. As Essex indicates, such rules do not create an irrebuttable presumption. See also House of Mosaics, Inc., 215 N.L.R.B. 704, 88 L.R.R.M. 1428, 1430 (1974). Nor has this court ever held, in reviewing solicitation and distribution rules in a non-election setting, that the mere promulgation of such rules is a per se violation of the Act. See Groendyke Transport, Inc. v. NLRB, 530 F.2d 137, 141 (10th Cir. 1976); NLRB, v. Shawnee Industries, Inc., 333 F.2d 221, 225 (10th Cir. 1964).[5]

The Regional Director's conclusion that the record evidence did not overcome the presumptively "coercive effect" of the rules stands absolutely unsupported. The substantial and uncontradicted evidence showed that the Company applied the rules lawfully, and that the employees understood them to permit dissemination of Union information during nonwork time. Therefore, we find the Board's decision affirming the Regional Director to be inexplicable and contrary to its own articulated policy. To the detriment of both parties, this error was aggravated by the Board's one-year delay in announcing its decision.

[4] Contrary to the assertion of the dissent, we are not placing the burden of proof on the employees or the Union. Rather, we are holding that the Company met its burden of producing sufficient evidence to rebut the prima facie invalidity.

[5] The Board has applied the Essex analysis in determining whether no-solicitation and no-distribution rules constitute a section 8(a)(1) violation. See House of Mosaics, Inc., 215 N.L.R.B. 704, 88 L.R.R.M. 1428 (1974). Therefore, our holding in Groendyke and Shawnee is relevant to the facts of this case.

The situation here is very close to the one in Shawnee, where we pointed out that:

> "The record contains no evidence that the rules were ever used to interfere with any union or any organizational activities; . . . or that the rules were adopted for a discriminatory purpose. We see nothing in the record to sustain an inference that these rules ever have been, or ever will be, used in a forbidden manner. It is presumed that a person obeys the law and discharges the obligations imposed on him by law. Imagined possibilities are not enough. A charge of an unfair labor practice must be based on something more than suspicion. Here the only showing is the existence of the rules. In our opinion the mere promulgation of the rules is not per se a violation of the Act."

333 F.2d at 225. In Groendyke the record showed that the rule was actively enforced in an unlawful manner to prevent any distribution or solicitation "on Company premises at any time." 530 F.2d at 142. We therefore held the rule a violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

Accordingly, we hold that the Board's decision to set aside the first election is arbitrary, unsupported by substantial evidence, and an abuse of discretion. The petition for review is granted, and the decision and order of the Board is set aside. The cross-petition for enforcement is denied.

WILLIAM E. DOYLE, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent:

The controversy here revolves around a handbook prepared by the Company and distributed to new employees. It was a twenty-one page pamphlet. Under the heading Personal Conduct the handbook set forth rules of employee conduct on Company property. It stated that violation of such rules could subject offenders to termination. One such rule prohibited "distribution of unauthorized leaflets, papers or other materials during working hours on Company property." Under the heading Solicitations another rule stated "solicitations, collections and circulation of petitions of any nature frequently result in misunderstanding. To avoid this possibility only the recognized solicitations for charitable organizations and similar activities specifically approved by the Company will be permitted during working hours." Still another rule prohibited "distribution of unauthorized leaflets, papers or other materials during working hours on Company property."

These rules made it clear that solicitations were not favored by the Company, and the term "working hours" tends to mean all of the period from eight to five, for example. This leaves no room for construction.

THE DECISION

The Regional Director concluded that in the circumstances described that the extrinsic evidence presented by management did not overcome the force or effect of such written rules. Notwithstanding the fact that the employer presented evidence that approximately four of the employers were advised that solicitation and distribution in violation of the written rules were permitted, such rules remained in the handbook and there was no notice given to all employees that such rules had in any way been modified or rescinded. Thus, the Regional Director concluded that such rules permitting only authorized approved solicitations and distributions during working hours constituted the basis upon which the election should be set aside. The solicitations authorized were those which pertain to charitable drives, etc.

The Board adopted the Regional Director's conclusion on the basis that it was supported on the record as a whole. The question is whether there is substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole to support the Board's finding.

We cannot, of course, consider issues of fact on a de novo basis and choose between conflicting inferences even though we might arrive at a different conclusion. Such a choice is not ours to exercise. Ann Lee Sportswear, Inc. v. NLRB 543 F.2d 739 (10th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., Frosty Morn Division, 379 F.2d 172, 180 (6th Cir. 1967).

The Board in this case determined that since both the no-distribution, no-solicitation rules of American Safety Equipment Corp. prohibited those activities during working hours, rather than working time, that the employees of the corporation had been denied the laboratory conditions essential to a fair representation election. American Safety Equipment Corp., 234 NLRB 501, 1978 CCH NLRB p. 31, 427–8. See also Tennessee Packers, supra, 379 F.2d at 180. The majority opinion would have this court hold that the Board's ruling constitutes an abuse of discretion, in that the Board's decision is not supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole.

WHAT IS THE EFFECT OF THE RULES ON THE ELECTION?

We must note at the outset that the standards for determining whether an employer has engaged in conduct which interferes with the employees' rights to a noncoercive electoral atmosphere are not as demanding as the standards for determining whether an employer has engaged in an unfair labor practice. As the court stated in NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., supra, "[i]t is not necessary that conduct which interferes with the freedom of choice in an election actually constitute an unfair labor practice." See in addition, Hedstrom Co. v.

NLRB, 558 F.2d 1137, 1151, n. 36 (3rd Cir. 1977) App. 629 F.2d 305 (3rd Cir. 1980); Independent, Inc. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 203, 207–8 (5th Cir. 1969); NLRB v. Shirlington Supermarket, 224 F.2d 649, 652–3 (4th Cir. 1955), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 914, 76 S.Ct. 198, 100 L.Ed. 801 (1955).

There are indeed a number of cases which hold that a presumptively invalid no-solicitation rule does not constitute an unfair labor practice in the absence of a showing that the rule was applied in an invalid manner. However, we do not have a question of unfair labor practice here. Here we are facing the issue of whether no-solicitation/no-distribution rules constituted a violation which was sufficient to void an election which the Union lost, and as a result of which the employees of American Safety Equipment Corp. were not represented by any Union. In order for the Board to find that the laboratory conditions necessary for a fair representation election were not present, it is not, we repeat, necessary that it be shown that the rules were definitely applied in an invalid manner, and thus that the employer committed an unfair labor practice.

It is the duty of the Board to draw the inferences from the facts presented and determine whether the employees' organizational rights had been interfered with so that laboratory conditions were not present at the time of the representation election. In this case the Board determined that since both rules were couched in the same terms, the logical conclusion which could have been reached by the employees of American Safety Equipment Corp. was that solicitation and distribution were banned at all times. In addition, although the Regional Director recognized that four of the company's employees had been advised that solicitation and distribution in violation of the written rules were permitted, the Director noted further that these rules remained the same, and that no notice was given to all of the employees-at-large that the rules had been modified or rescinded. The company had no general policy of discussing or explaining the rules in pre-hire interviews, and it did not, officially or otherwise, notify its large employee force as a whole that the rules were to be applied in a manner inconsistent with their language.

There was some evidence given by the Company that the new employees were told that the noon hour, for example, was theirs alone, but the Company didn't tell them that in relationship to whether or not there could be solicitation or as to whether or not the rules pertaining to solicitation applied. Those rules were written so that they were final and, indeed, the rules threatened termination in fact.

The four employees to whom the Company revealed that the no-solicitation rules were not applicable were actually management level employees. There is no evidence that they communicated this to employees interested in joining the Union. Therefore, I cannot see any basis for this court accepting their testimony over the strong inferences which are to be drawn from the circumstances surrounding the existence of these rules having to do with solicitation.

In the case of Allis Chalmers Corp., 224 NLRB 1199 (1976), the Board held that the Company's no-solicitation rule constituted an unfair labor practice. In that case there was evidence that no one had ever been replaced for soliciting, that the rule had never been enforced except against an isolated vendor, and the employees did engage in Union solicitation during their break and meal periods. However, the rule was posted during the Union's organization drive and management did not explain to the employees that the rule was not applicable to break and meal periods. The court held that the rule violated the National Labor Relations Act even though a later rule restricted the solicitation ban to working time, because the change was not explained to the employees. If the rule in Allis Chalmers is an unfair labor practice, it is clear that the Board did not abuse its discretion in holding in the case at bar that several rules constitutes sufficient grounds to set aside the election. See also, Bandag, Inc., v. NLRB, 583 F.2d 765 (5th Cir. 1978); L.O.F. Glass, Inc., 216 NLRB 845 (1975).

In the Board's decision in Flat River Glass Co., 234 NLRB 200, 1978 CCH NLRB p. 31, 651, its holding was that the mere existence of an invalid no-solicitation rule was not sufficient justification for overturning a representation election, but in that case two unions were competing in an election. The Board refused to set the election aside due to the fact that the employer had an invalid no-solicitation rule because there was a lack of evidence that this unlawful rule was applied in a disparate manner to the two competing unions. Thus Flat River is distinguishable from our case which involved only one union, and an effort on its part to get recognition.

In Essex International, Inc., 211 NLRB 749, 1978 CCH NLRB p. 34, 563, the Company had three rules which discussed solicitation and distribution. Two of these prohibited solicitation for any cause or distribution of literature during working time. Only one rule prohibited distribution of literature during working hours. The Board decided the employer had made a sufficient showing to rebut the prima facie presumption from the rules' invalidity, and stated:

> It is arguable that the no distribution rule, standing alone, is invalid because of its prohibition of distribution during "working hours." However, after considering that rule, together with the Employers' no solicitation rule referring to "working time" and the separate section on Solicitations, which sets forth the Employers' rule against distribution during working time, we are unable to conclude that employees would consider the single reference to working hours to mean something other than working time.

Thus in Essex there was mitigating material. The Board also stated that the employer should be allowed to rebut the presumption of the rules' invalidity by presenting extrinsic evidence showing that the rule had not been applied in a manner such as to interfere with the employees' organizational rights. However, the important thing was that the Board relied on the fact that two of three rules used the term "working time" in reaching its decision that the election should not be set aside. The instant case is distinguishable in that both rules used the term "working hours." Hence potential members of the Union could not get any consolation from either of the rules.

The majority opinion appears to rely on the Regional Director's statement in his findings that in enforcing the no-solicitation, no-distribution rules the company had not engaged in conduct which would provide a basis for setting aside the election. That statement is cited in support of the majority's position that there were no grounds upon which to set aside the election. However, the Regional Director was referring to specific allegations of misconduct presented by the Union, which the Regional Director held to be unfounded. The Regional Director specifically stated that in the circumstances presented there was no evidence of misconduct. This is not to say, however, that the rules themselves were valid, or that the rules themselves were not grounds for drawing inferences in support of the judgment setting aside the election. The Director found that the rules were invalid and supported the voiding of the election.

The effect of the majority opinion would be to place a burden on the employees, or the Union, to show that the rules were applied to mean "working hours" rather than "working time." The burden of proof is not with the Union, however, but with the employer. The fact remains that the rules prohibited solicitation and distribution during "working hours" and, as such, were presumptively invalid. It was, therefore, the burden of the employer, America Safety Equipment Corporation, to rebut that presumption. Essex, supra.

The Regional Director determined in this case that American Safety had not met its burden of overcoming the coercive effect of its written rules. Thus the Director placed the burden where it belonged: on the employer in these conditions.

The Board decided that the evidence that the four employees, three of whom held supervisory positions and one of whom was a personal secretary, believed that the rules were to be applied to mean working time rather than working hours was not sufficient to rebut the prima facie inference of the rules' invalidity. This court should not disturb the Board's ruling and choose its own conclusion.

In the case of Groendyke Transport, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, we stated that in order to find that a presumptively invalid no-solicitation or no-distribution rule is valid, the employer must prove unusual circumstances justifying the rule. See 530 F.2d at 141. Thus we are not empowered to set aside the Board's finding and conclude on our own that the fact that the four mentioned employees believed the rules were applied to mean working time is sufficient to establish that the rules were harmless. Nor is it possible for us to shift the burden from the employer to rebut the presumption of the rules' invalidity—to the Union to show that the rule was applied in a manner to interfere with the employees' organization rights. Rules of this nature tell a conclusive story. Hence they are presumed to interfere with the employees' organizational rights. It is up to the employer to show otherwise.

In Ann Lee Sportswear, Inc. v. NLRB, supra, 543 F.2d at 742, this court said "that it should only interfere with the Board's findings in the rare instance when the standard [regarding substantial evidence] appears to have been misapprehended or grossly misapplied."

The fact that both of the rules used the term "working hours" and a resultant restricted meaning existed is bolstered by the fact that there is still another rule prohibiting the soliciting generally and a warning against it. Inasmuch as both of the rules used the term "working hours" and the employees-at-large were not notified that any different meaning or interpretation was intended, the evidence supporting the Board's decision to set aside the election because laboratory conditions were not present surely meets the substantial evidence test inasmuch as it constitutes more than a mere scintilla and connotes such relevant evidence to support a conclusion.

Accordingly the decision of the National Labor Relations Board to set aside the first representation election should be affirmed. Therefore, this court should consider the merits of appellants' second and third issues of this appeal.

The majority opinion would place the burden on the employees or the Union to show the rules were applied to mean "working hours" rather than "working time." The burden of proof is not with the Union, however, but with the employer.

For the reasons stated, I would enforce the Board's order.

NLRB v. Dillon Stores, Division of Dillon Companies, Inc.

643 F.2d 687 (10th Cir.), March 3, 1981—241 NLRB 579

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before SETH, Chief Judge, MCKAY, Circuit Judge, and CHRISTENSEN, Senior District Judge*

689

CHRISTENSEN, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board seeks enforcement of its order issued against Dillon Stores, Division of Dillon Companies, Inc. (the Company), pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). The Board adopted the findings and order of the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) who found that the Company had committed an unfair labor practice as defined in section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the N.L.R.A., 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3),[1] by changing the duties of and then discharging James P. Kuhn because of his union activities.

Kuhn was employed by the Company from July, 1963, until his discharge on January 7, 1978. In April of 1977, he was transferred to the Company's store No. 50 where he worked in the meat department with Melvin Cowger, the department manager. On November 3, 1977, Kuhn's duties were changed from meatcutting to ordering, stocking cases, wrapping and cleaning. On January 7, 1978, without prior warning, Kuhn was discharged by the Company.

Contemporaneous with these events was an attempt to unionize the Company's meat market employees. In February and March a representation hearing was held, where the Board determined that the Company's meat market managers, including Cowger, were not supervisors within the meaning of section 2(11) of the Act and were thus eligible to vote in the Board-conducted elections. Both Cowger and Kuhn voted in the May 13, 1977 election and in a second election held on November 30, 1977.

In the unfair labor practice proceeding based on Kuhn's discharge, the ALJ allowed relitigation of Cowger's supervisory status and concluded that he was a statutory supervisor whose anti-union actions and statements were attributable to the Company. The ALJ further concluded that anti-union animus was the motive for Kuhn's change in duties and ultimate discharge.

*Of the United States District Court for the District of Utah, sitting by designation.

[1] 29 U.S.C. § 158(a).

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *.

The Company resists enforcement of the Board's order on the grounds that (1) relitigation of Cowger's supervisory status was error and (2) there is no substantial evidence on the record to support the findings that Cowger was a supervisor or that Kuhn's change in duties and discharge were in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (3)

The Company contends that the Board's regulation 29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f) renders the earlier determination that Cowger was an employee res judicata, precluding relitigation of his status. The relitigation of Cowger's status with the conclusion that he was a supervisor was essential to the Board's determination that there was a discriminatory discharge, since it relied upon Cowger's statements to impute anti-union animus to the Company.[2]

Section 102.67(f) provides in part:

> The parties may, at any time, waive their right to request review. Failure to request review shall preclude such parties from relitigating, in any related subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding, any issue which was, or could have been, raised in the representation proceeding.

This section bars relitigation of an issue determined in a representation hearing only when the subsequent hearing is a "related" proceeding. Most courts addressing the issue have concluded that unfair labor practice proceedings under section 8(a)(1) or (3) are not so related to prior representation hearings that relitigation of common issues is precluded. E. g., Rock Hill Tel. Co. v. NLRB, 605 F.2d 139 (4th Cir. 1979); Heights Funeral Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 385 F.2d 879 (5th Cir. 1967); and Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America v. NLRB, 365 F.2d 898 (D.C.Cir.1966). While the Board has not always been consistent in applying section 102.67(f), it has recently adopted the rationale of Amalgamated Clothing Workers. See Serv-U-Stores, Inc., 234 NLRB No. 191, 1978 CCH NLRB ¶ 19.054 nn. 8 and 10 (1978) (expressly overruling decisions inconsistent with Amalgamated Clothing Workers).

We agree with this interpretation. The purpose of determining whether an individual is a supervisor is different in a representation proceeding than it is in an unfair labor practice proceeding involving interference with organizational rights, and different policy considerations underlie each. The rule has an additional advantage of avoiding the unnecessary delay in representation elections that would result if parties were forced to engage in protracted litigation to protect their interests in different contexts. Amalgamated Clothing Workers, 365 F.2d at 905.

The Company's remaining contentions challenge the ALJ's findings of fact, which must be judged by the substantial evidence standard enunciated in Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). This standard of review is a narrow one, requiring upholding of the Board's findings if they are supported by "such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support [the] conclusion." 340 U.S. at 477, 71 S.Ct. at 459. If such evidence exists in the record considered as a whole, the Board's findings must be accepted without any necessity of searching for contrary alternative inferences that might also be drawn from the record evidence. U.S. Soil Conditioning v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 940, 944 (10th Cir. 1979).

There is ample evidence on the record as a whole to sustain the Board's conclusion that Melvin Cowger was a supervisor within the meaning of section 2(11) of the N.L.R.A., 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), which provides:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

Since this section is framed in the disjunctive, the existence of any one of the powers listed, as long as it involves the use of independent judgment, is sufficient to support a determination of supervisory status. Furr's, Inc. v. NLRB, 381 F.2d 562, 565 (10th Cir. 1967), cert denied, 389 U.S. 840, 88 S.Ct. 70, 19 L.Ed.2d 105 (1967).

[2] Although a finding of supervisory status is not always necessary before imputing an individual's actions to an employer, Betts Baking Co. v. NLRB, 380 F.2d 199, 202 (10th Cir. 1967), this is the usual basis for such an imputation and was the theory upon which General Counsel relied. We note also that in some circumstances a supervisor's acts cannot be imputed to the employer. See Sinclair & Valentine Co. v. NLRB, 549 F.2d 1183 (8th Cir. 1977). See also Furr's, Inc. v. NLRB, 381 F.2d 562 (10th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 840, 88 S.Ct. 70, 19 L.Ed.2d 105 (1967). In this case the circumstances do not justify a departure from the general rule.

The Board found that Cowger was the manager of a meat department staffed by four to five people and that he assigned and scheduled work, oversaw the employees in the performance of their work, granted time off, and assigned overtime and vacations. Cowger's immediate superior, the district supervisor, visited the market approximately once a week for a period of 45 minutes to one hour. At all other times Cowger directed the daily operation of the department. In addition, Cowger made regular written evaluations of the employees' performance, which sometimes took the form of recommendations for promotion. These recommendations were honored in most instances.

These findings and the resulting conclusions that Cowger was a supervisor are supported by substantial evidence in the record. A contrary determination would lead to the conclusion that, except for the one-hour weekly visits by the district supervisor, the meat market employees functioned without any in-house supervision. The unlikelihood in general of such a situation and the contrary indications in the record before us confirm the Board's conclusion. See, e.g., Vega v. NLRB, 341 F.2d 576 (1st Cir. 1965), cert denied, 382 U.S. 862, 86 S.Ct. 123, 15 L.Ed.2d 100 (1965).

Now as to the Board's findings that Kuhn's duties were changed and he was discharged because of his union activities: The credited evidence reasonably tends to establish and the ALJ found the following facts: Prior to his discharge, Kuhn worked for the company fourteen and a half years with an unblemished work record. During the last ten years of his employment he usually worked as a "second man" in the Company's meat departments. He first learned of the organizational campaign of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, Local 576 in March of 1977 through conversations with other meat department employees. In one of these conversations he urged another employee to attend a union meeting in order to find out about its program.

In April of 1977, Kuhn was transferred to store No. 50 to work under the direction of Melvin Cowger. At about this same time he signed a union authorization card at his home. During his first several months at store No. 50, Kuhn received numerous compliments from Cowger regarding his performance. On May 3, Kuhn voted in the representation election. A month later he informed Cowger that he had received a subpoena requiring his attendance at a post-election hearing. Cowger laughed and responded, "You got a subpoena. You're in trouble. You better get a lawyer." At lunch that day Cowger made the unsupported statement to other employees that Kuhn had received the subpoena because he was responsible for the pregnancy of a thirteen-year-old girl. Four days later, Cowger offered Kuhn five dollars not to honor the subpoena. He repeated the offer several times and thereafter raised the offer to ten dollars. Kuhn attended the representation hearing but did not testify, apparently because his testimony was unnecessary. Some or all of the other employees appearing at the hearing testified on behalf of the union.

During the ensuring months, Cowger's attitude toward Kuhn changed. He began "cursing and ridiculing" him daily. On November 3, Cowger informed Kuhn that his duties would be changed from meatcutting to ordering, stocking cases, wrapping and cleaning. Because of this change in assignment, Kuhn was required to work until 6:00 p.m. on Saturdays instead of his former 4:30 p.m. quitting time. Later that month Kuhn asked to take his annual "floating holiday" around Thanksgiving. Cowger arbitrarily refused the request. On November 30, Kuhn voted in the second representation hearing.

On December 3, after arranging the temporary transfer of another employee to the store, Cowger told Kuhn, "Your brother is coming over." When Kuhn said he didn't have a brother, Cowger responded, "Bob Puff, your union brother." Later that day Cowger referred to another employee as Kuhn's "union brother." One month later Kuhn was summarily fired without prior warning.

The Company's defense to the charge that it changed Kuhn's duties and discharged him because of union activities was that Kuhn's work performance was inadequate. Even though Kuhn's employee evaluations were high prior to his transfer to store No. 50, Whitie Miller, the district supervisor, testified that at store No. 50 Kuhn could not get along with other employees and his presence had a negative effect on morale and production. The Company did not introduce evidence of any decreased production or other objective evidence of inferior performance by Kuhn. It did present testimony that one employee had asked for a transfer to "get away from the hassle" between Cowger and Kuhn. However, the ALJ pointed to evidence of numerous employee complaints about Cowger in refusing to give weight to the evidence, concluding that the assertion of poor work performance was vague and unsupported by concrete evidence.

Underlying much of the Company's challenge to the Board's findings is an attack on the ALJ's credibility determinations. It argues that the ALJ acted arbitrarily in uniformly crediting the Board's witnesses and discrediting its witnesses. Merely because the ALJ believed the employee's story does not furnish reason to overturn his credibility determinations. NLRB V. Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. of Topeka, 613 F.2d 267, 271 (10th Cir. 1980). The ALJ advanced good reasons for his appraisal of credibility, and it is not for this court to substitute its weighing of creditibility for that of the ALJ absent extraordinary circumstances. Osteopathic Hospital Founders Ass'n v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 633 (10th Cir. 1980).

In establishing that an employee's duties were changed and he was discharged in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (3), the Board bears the burden of proving that these actions were unlawfully motivated, and this burden must be met by substantial evidence. NLRB v. First Nat. Bank of Pueblo, 623 F.2d 686, 693 (10th Cir. 1980). Proof of an employer's knowledge of his employee's union activity is an essential part of that burden. Bill's Coal Co., Inc., v. NLRB, 493 F.2d 243, 246–47 (10th Cir. 1974). There is no direct evidence in the record that Cowger or any other company representative knew that Kuhn signed a union authorization card or that he had urged another employee to attend a union meeting. Of course, an employer's knowledge that an employee voted in representation elections and honored a subpoena to appear at a representation hearing, in and of itself would be insufficient to establish knowledge of union support. However, such knowledge may be established by circumstantial evidence. Id at 247. Cowger's singling out Kuhn for derision regarding his subpoena, his extraordinary interest in inducing Kuhn not to honor it, and his multiple references to Kuhn's "union brothers," as well as the small size of the market in which the two worked are circumstances from which a reasonable inference of knowledge of union support may be drawn.

In assessing whether the record reasonably supports the finding of discriminatory change of duties and discharge, we are mindful that an employer may dismiss an employee for any reason or no reason at all, so long as hostility toward the employee's union activities does not enter into the decision. Betts Baking Co. v. NLRB, 380 F.2d 199, 203 (10th Cir. 1967). But when the Board produces evidence raising a reasonable inference of unlawful motive, the employer must explain its actions consistent with a legitimate motivation. NLRB V. Okla-Inn, 488 F.2d 498, 506 (10th Cir. 1973). Determining the degree of significance to be accorded the employer's explanation is, within the bounds of reason, the primary responsibility of the Board. Against a prima facie showing of unlawful motivation, a flimsy or unsupported explanation may affirmatively suggest that the employer has seized upon a pretext to mask an anti-union motivation. See Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966). See also NLRB v. Automotive Controls Corp., 406 F.2d 221 (10th Cir. 1969) and NLRB v. Okla-Inn, 488 F.2d at 507. The Board's finding of an improper motive for Kuhn's change of duties and discharge is buttressed by the Company's vague and unsupported explanation for its actions.

There are circumstances in the record that could support the Board if it had arrived at a contrary decision.[3] But it did not do so, and we may not

[3] The Company argues that the circumstances of Kuhn's change in duties and discharge make it unreasonable to infer an anti-union animus for Kuhn's treatment. It emphasizes that a long period of time elapsed between any knowledge it might have had on Kuhn's union activities and his change in duties and discharge and that other employees, who were not harassed or discharged, were as active or more active in support of the union than Kuhn was. In other circumstances the timing of an employee's discharge and the limited nature of his union activities have contributed to the court's conclusion that an inference of unlawful motive could not be drawn. E. g., NLRB v. First Nat. Bank of Pueblo, 623 F.2d 686 (10th Cir. 1980). The circumstances of this case, however, do not require such a conclusion. Cowger's anti-union statements and actions were directed specifically at Kuhn and his union activities, suggesting that this particular employee was singled out for abuse in at least significant part because of his union activities. Since this harassment originated during, substitute our judgment for that of the Board if its crucial findings have a reasonable basis in the record considered as a whole. In our opinion they have.

The Board's application for enforcement of its order is granted.

and continued throughout, the unionization period, the lapse in time between the Company's knowledge of his union activities and his change in duties and discharge does not negate the inference of anti-union motivation.

Local 174, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) v. NLRB

645 F.2d 1151 (D.C. Cir.), March 3, 1981—244 NLRB 826

On petition to review Board Order

Before PECK,* Senior Circuit Judge for the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, MACKINNON and GINSBURG, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge GINSBURG

GINSBURG, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board decided that a leaflet Local 174 ("the Union") sought to distribute was primarily a "political tract" and not a measure for the "mutual aid or protection" of employees within the meaning of § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). It therefore held that Firestone ("the Company") committed no unfair labor practice in refusing to allow union members to distribute the leaflet during nonworking time in nonworking areas of the Company's premises. We agree with the Union that the Board's method of adjudication in this case was intolerably abrupt. Nevertheless, we deny the Union's petition for review because, in our judgment on the undisputed facts, distribution of the leaflet falls outside the boundaries of § 7's mutual aid or protection" clause.

I.

The day before Election Day, 1978, representatives of Local 174 requested permission from the industrial relations manager of Firestone's Riverview, Michigan, plant for employee distribution of a leaflet in nonworking areas of the plant during nonworking time. The two-page leaflet, titled "Protect your hard-won collective bargaining gains—VOTE on Tuesday, November 7," features the Union-endorsed candidates for Governor, United States Senator, and Justices of the Michigan Supreme Court; it describes the endorsed candidates as "committed to working for the best interests of working men and women" or "familiar with workers' needs."[1] Firestone's manager refused the requested permission and threatened disciplinary action if any employees distributed the leaflet at the plant.

The Union abandoned its plans for leafletting on plant premises, but filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company. The charge asserted that distribution of the leaflet was protected activity under § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976),[2] hence the Company's refusal to allow the distribution violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976).[3] The Board's General Counsel agreed with the Union and filed a § 8(a)(1) complaint against the Company. Since the Company's answer admitted all material facts, the Board, on motion of the General Counsel, transferred the proceeding to itself and directed the Company to show cause why summary judgment should not be granted against it.

In response, the Company proposed that the parties first address the propriety of disposition without an evidentiary hearing; if the Board still determined to dispose of the case summarily, the parties could then file briefs on the merits. (J.A. (Joint Appendix) 29-30.) By telegram, the Board agreed to this proposal. (J.A. 31.) The parties thereupon filed briefs addressing the threshold procedural question, but the Board, with no further communication to the parties, issued a Decision and Order on the merits denying the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment, and granting summary judgment to the Company. The three-member panel declared it "clear as a matter of law" that distribution of the leaflet did not constitute concerted activity for the "mutual aid or protection" of employees; therefore the Company's refusal to permit the distribution did not interfere with the employees' exercise of rights safeguarded by § 7.

*Sitting by designation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 294(d).

[1] The leaflet is reproduced in full as an appendix to this opinion.

[2] Section 7 provides that "[e]mployees shall have the right * * * to engage in * * * concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection." The full text of § 7 is set out in note 4, infra.

[3] Section 8(a)(1) makes it an unfair labor practice "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in" § 7 of the Act.

Understandably upset that the Board had violated its agreement to limit initial argument and decision to the procedural issue and, thereafter, to establish a schedule for submissions on the merits, the Union moved for en banc reconsideration with oral argument and accompanied the motion with a memorandum of law. (J.A. 46–47.) Recognizing the merits of the Union's procedural point, the same three-member panel granted the Union's request to the limited extent of reconsidering the merits "in light of the Charging Party's Motion and supporting memorandum and Respondent's Opposition thereto" (J.A. 49); upon such reconsideration, the panel reaffirmed its original Decision and Order. The Union petitioned this court for review.

II.

The Board's manner of proceeding in this case was indefensible. After specifically instructing the parties to limit argument to the propriety of disposition by summary judgment, the panel skipped beyond that question and, without benefit of briefs, issued a decision on the merits. In addition to the obvious unfairness to the participants, the rush to judgment that occurred here diminishes respect for the Board; it fosters the impression that administrative agencies do not heed what those subject to their regulations say. The Board's handling of the matter, in short, was at odds with traditions of due process and orderly administrative procedure.

Nevertheless, a remand would serve no useful purpose, nor does the Union invite us to return the case to the Board. All parties now agree that the facts are undisputed, the leaflet "speaks for itself," and a pure question of law is at stake. Briefs and memoranda presented to the Board on the motion for reconsideration aired the parties' views on the merits of the unfair labor practice charge. Of more immediate prominence, the parties' positions have been briefed and argued comprehensively in this court. Consistent with the request for a final decision in all of the presentations before us, we turn to resolution of the substance of the controversy.

III.

Our inquiry is guided by Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 98 S.Ct. 2505, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978), in which the Supreme Court upheld an NLRB determination that an employer committed an unfair labor practice when it banned employee distribution of a newsletter criticizing a proposal to incorporate a "right-to-work" provision into the state constitution and a recent Presidential veto of a federal minimum wage increase. The Court ruled that characterization of "right-to-work" laws and minimum wage levels as political issues did not remove distribution of the newsletter from shelter under the "mutual aid or protection" clause of § 7. Id. at 570 n.20, 98 S.Ct. at 2514 n.20.[4] That clause, the Court said, encompasses employee endeavors to improve terms and conditions of employment, or the well-being of workers outside the immediate employee-employer relationship. Id. at 565–67, 98 S.Ct. at 2512–2513.

But the range of § 7's "mutual aid or protection" clause, the Court assumed in Eastex, is not infinite. "[A]t some point," the Court noted, the relationship of a proposed activity to employees' interests as employees "becomes so attentuated that [the] activity cannot fairly be deemed to come within the * * * clause." Id. at 567–68, 98 S.Ct. at 2513. The Court, however, did not consider itself the proper forum of first instance "to delineate precisely the boundaries" of the statutory "mutual aid or protection" language. "That task," the Court said, "is for the board to perform * * * as it considers the wide variety of cases that come before it." Id. at 568, 98

[4] Section 7, as amended, as set forth in 29 U.S.C. § 157, states in full:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 158(a)(3) of this title [29].

The Court, much earlier, had held that an employer may not prohibit its employees from distributing union organizational literature in nonworking areas during nonworking time absent a showing that the ban is necessary to maintain plant discipline or production. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945).

S.Ct. at 2513. Stressing that it anticipated "case-by-case" Board consideration, Id. at 570 n.20, 98 S.Ct. at 2514 n.20, the Court footnoted with apparent approval an NLRB decision distinguishing the Board's Eastex ruling. Id. at 568 n.18, 98 S.Ct. at 2513 n.18. That decision, Ford Motor Co., 221 N.L.R.B. 663 (1975), enf'd, 546 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1976), involved an employer's refusal to permit election eve distribution of a tract urging workers to reject both Democratic and Republican politicans and to support formation of an "independent workers party." The Board held the distribution unprotected by § 7 even though "the election of any political candidate may have an ultimate effect on employment conditions." 221 N.L.R.B. at 666.

The question we must resolve, then, is whether the handout before us bears, as the Eastex newsletter did, a sufficiently close relationship to employees' interests as to come within the guarantee of § 7's "mutual aid or protection" clause, or whether the link is so attenuated that § 7 does not shelter the activity.[5] The Eastex newsletter singled out and discussed two topics of immediate economic concern to employees, "right-to-work" laws and minimum wage levels. At the conclusion of the discussion, union members were urged to "elect our friends," and were reminded to register to vote. No election was pending. No particular candidates were named. The focus of the material was issues, not candidates.

The leaflet here, in contrast, focuses on the election of four candidates identified by name (printed twice in large bold-face type) and photograph. Preceding the candidate identification, the handout lists an assortment of issues of general concern to workers, but discussion of the listed issues is sparse. The dominant message conveyed by the leaflet is to vote for the endorsed individuals. We cannot disagree with the Board's conclusion that the principal thrust of the leaflet was to induce employees to vote for specific candidates, not to educate them on political issues relevant to their employment conditions.

The Union argues that the board is taking a "we know it when we see it" approach[6] that leaves both employees and employers without standards to guide their future conduct. This position, we believe, ignores the Supreme Court's direction in Eastex that the Board proceed "case-by-case." Moreover, the Board has indicated the approach it is taking.

In its brief to this court the Board states that it is attempting to range union "political" communication along a continuum, placing at one end literature dominantly aimed at inducing votes for specific candidates, and at the other, literature designed principally to educate employees on political issues that may impinge on their employment conditions.[7] We find this approach to be consistent with the Supreme Court's statements in Eastex that § 7 protection may depend upon the object or context of the activity. 437 U.S. at 568 & n.18, 570 n.20, 98 S.Ct. at 2513 & n.18, 2514 n.20.

The Board acknowledges that it may some day confront literature ranged around the midpoint of the spectrum, cases presenting close questions as to protected status. This, however, is not such a case. The leaflet before us does "speak for itself." We conclude, as did the Board, that it falls securely at the unprotected end of the spectrum. Accordingly, the Union's petition for review is denied.

It is so ordered.

[5] Eastex involved two distinct questions: (1) whether, apart from the location of the activity, distribution of the newsletter was the kind of concerted activity encompassed by § 7, (2) if § 7 sheltered the activity, did the employer have a countervailing interest in precluding use of its premises for the activity. 437 U.S. at 563, 98 S.Ct. at 2511. In this case, only the first of the two questions is before us.

Don't let your gains at the bargaining table be wiped out in Lansing and Washington.

Collective bargaining agreements are not unbreakable rocks of economic security—they're vulnerable to the changing tides of state and federal government.

For example, take state government. The degree of safe working conditions in shops and plants is dependent on how many safety inspectors are hired by the state Department of Labor, and how vigorously they do their job. The administration of workers' and unemployment compensation benefits is also the responsibility of the Department of Labor.

Even our fringe benefits are affected by what state government does. The level of Blue Cross-Blue Shield premiums, which is regulated by the state insurance commission, affects the cost of our negotiated health care benefits. Similarly, the level of state unemployment compensation benefits determines how much SUB money must be paid out to laidoff auto workers. Therefore, the less money paid out for such things as SUB and health care, the more money that can be freed for other negotiated benefits.

The story is much the same concerning the federal government—its action or inaction affects our collective bargining agreements.

William B.
FITZGERALD
for Governor

Action by the federal government to reduce inflation and taxes would give workers additional purchasing power. A system of national health care could free up for other purposes the money now diverted in our contracts for health care benefits.

Better funding for the Occupational Safety and Health Administration could ensure safer working conditions. A labor law reform bill would end the stalling tactics used by employers to prevent collective bargaining with unions. And plant closing legislation would prevent workers from being left with nothing but a worthless contract when a plant closes or moves away.

So as you can see, what happens in state and federal goverenment does affect what we accomplish at the bargaining table.

To protect our collective bargaining gains, we need to send candidates to Lansing and Washington who will protect and strengthen those gains. That's why Michigan UAW-CAP is backing BILL FITZGERALD for governor and CARL LEVIN for U.S. senator—they're two men committed to working for the best interests of working men and women.

Don't forget the Supreme Court

Remember to vote for the Michigan Supreme Court on the blue non-partisan ballot—it's important to you and other workers.

The Supreme Court rules on many issues vital to workers, such as workers' compensation benefits, insurance, unemployment compensation and others. Thus it's important to elect justices to the court who are familiar with workers' needs.

Two such men are Justice G. Mennen Williams and Judge Gary McDonald, both of whom were nominated by the Democratic Party for the Supreme Court.

We need to elect justices to our state's highest court who understand the problems and needs of working people. That's why Michigan UAW-CAP endorses G. MENNEN WILLIAMS and GARY McDONALD for election to the Michigan Supreme Court on November 7.

NLRB v. Los Angeles New Hospital

640 F.2d 1017 (9th Cir.), March 6, 1981—244 NLRB 960

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Wright and Tang, Circuit Judges, and Hanson,* Senior District Judge

1018

Hanson, Senior District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (Board) found that the Los Angeles New Hospital (Hospital) had interrogated and threatened its employees and created the impression that their protected union-organizing activities were under surveillance, all in violation of § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (Act). The Board applies to this Court for enforcement of its September 11, 1979, order directing the Hospital to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices and to post an appropriate notice. We conclude that the Board's order should be enforced.

---

*The Honorable William C. Hanson, Senior United States District Judge for the Northern and Southern Districts of Iowa, sitting by designation.

I.

On May 30, 1978, the Hospital announced that it was changing its sick leave policy so that effective June 5, 1978, employees would no longer be paid for their first day of sick leave. Employees Richard Fox and Richard Hopkins began soliciting other employees to sign a petition protesting the policy change. After organizing the petition drive, Fox and Hopkins approached Hospital administrator Jeffery Steadman and asked him to arrange a meeting at which they might present the petition to Stanley Diller, Hospital president and chairman of the board. The meeting was arranged and Fox and Hopkins presented the petition to Diller. At this meeting, the possibility of forming a hospital grievance committee was discussed. The committee—composed entirely of employees—was formed and it met a few days later in a seventh floor classroom of the Hospital, with management's knowledge and permission. At the grievance committee meeting, discussion turned from specific grievances to unionization, and an organizational meeting was arranged.

On June 19, 1978, a number of hospital employees met with representatives of the Hospital and Service Employees Union, Local 399. The Hospital activities challenged in this proceeding took place before and after the June 19 meeting. We discuss these in more detail below under separate headings, in connection with our review of the Board's separate findings and conclusions.

In reviewing the Board's decision and order, we are mindful that "The judicial role is narrow: The rule which the Board adopts is judicially reviewable for consistency with the Act, and for rationality, but if it satisfies those criteria, the Board's application of the rule, if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, must be enforced." Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978).

II.

A. Interrogation of Employees Fox and Myles.

1. At the hearing before the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), employee Richard Fox, a pathologist assistant, testified that Diller approached him while he was in the hospital cafeteria distributing memos that publicized the June 19 union meeting. Diller asked for one of the memos and after reading it, told Fox that he "felt [Fox] was working too hard in the matter." Fox also testified that, on the day of the union meeting, Diller told him "something to the effect that a union would never survive in that hospital and that we were fools and trouble-makers for trying to bring one in." Diller also asked Fox for the names of persons who were on the committee. Fox divulged the names, and later, committee members Richard Hopkins and Theresa Siminski told Fox that Diller had called them to his office and questioned them. Also on the day of the union-meeting, Fox spoke to administrator Steadman. Steadman said that he "felt sorry for [Fox] because [he] was under a lot of pressure and that [Fox] had to watch every move [he] made because Mr. Diller was watching [him]." Finally, a couple of weeks after the union meeting, Fox encountered Diller. Fox told him that his involvement in union activities was over. Diller replied, "That's good, because [I'm] still watching [you]." The ALJ credited the testimony of Fox because Steadman's testimony was too "vague and uncertain" to credit and because Diller did not testify at the hearing. The ALJ found that the statements by Diller and Steadman were "derogatory and repressive antiunion comments," and thus § 8(a)(1) had been violated. But, according to the ALJ, the statements failed to indicate that the Hospital had engaged in surveillance of its employees or created the impression that the employees were under surveillance, as alleged in the Complaint filed by the Regional Director. The Board agreed that § 8(a)(1) had been violated, but substituted its own finding that the comments amounted to threats of reprisal, and further created the impression that Fox's union and other protected concerted activities were under surveillance.

2. Jacqueline Myles, a secretary in the engineering department, was asked by Diller on the day after the union meeting whether she had attended that meeting. Diller also asked her for the names of those people in her department who attended. In a separate incident in late September of 1978, Myles was transferred at her request from engineering to the X-ray department. The day after her transfer, Myles's replacement in engineering quit and she was transferred back to her old department. Myles went to Assistant Administrator Sy Zafrani to protest. During their conversation, Zafrani asked her, "How do you feel about the Union?" Myles's testimony was credited because neither Diller nor Zafrani testified at the hearing. The Board upheld the ALJ's finding that the questioning of Myles by Diller and Zafrani was in violation of § 8(a)(1).

3. Interrogation of employees by the employer violates Section 8(a)(1) when that interrogation carries a threat of reprisal against the employee or when it forms a pattern of coercive conduct tending to inhibit the exercise of Section 7 rights. NLRB v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571, 584 (9th Cir. 1980), pet. for cert. docketed, No. 80-660 (filed Oct. 11, 1980). "[T]he test is whether, under all the circumstances, the interrogation reasonably tends to restrain or interfere with employees in the exercise of their protected rights." Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977).

In this case the record amply supports the Board's conclusion that both Fox and Myles were subjected to coercive interrogation by superiors. We note that neither Fox nor Myles was assured by the interrogators that no reprisals would be taken against them.

In addition, Diller and Zafrani failed to communicate to the employees whether they had a valid purpose for asking the questions. And finally, Diller, who held the highest position in the hospital management hierarchy, asked both employees specifically for names of individuals who were involved in the organizational activities, reasonably creating an impression that he sought information upon which to base actions against individual employees. All of the aforementioned factors are relevant in weighing the lawfulness of interrogations by management. See NLRB v. Ayer Lar Sanitarium, 436 F.2d 45, 49 (9th Cir. 1970), citing NLRB v. Varo, Inc., 425 F.2d 293, 298 (5th Cir. 1970). Finding substantial evidence on the record as a whole, we uphold the Board's decision as it relates to the interrogation of these two employees.

B. Solicitation by Employee James Cooke.

1. Anesthesia techician James Cooke testified that during the first week of July 1978, he was reading union literature to three other employees during his break time in a break room or lounge that was adjacent to the operating room. He was told by his supervisor, Ora Randall, that he was not supposed to have the literature in that area. According to Cooke, Randall stated that the room was not really a break room and that Cooke was not on a scheduled break. When Cooke continued to read the literature, Randall called him into her office and repeated that he was not on a scheduled break, that he was not supposed to have union literature in that particular room, and that he could be replaced for having the literature there. Randall testified that the area where Cooke was soliciting was not a lounge area, but rather part of the operating room. The ALJ, however, credited Cooke's testimony that the room was used by employees as a break room and that Cooke was in this break room at a time when he customarily took his break. The Board adopted the ALJ's conclusion that Randall prohibited Cooke from discussing unionism on his break time and threatened that he could be replaced for having union literature in the lounge area, both in violation of § 8(a)(1).

2. The general Board policy regarding solicitation in hospitals is that "solicitation on nonwork time may be prohibited only where necessary to avoid disruption of patient care or disturbance of patients." NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, Inc., 442 U.S. 773, 99 S.Ct. 2598, 2603, 61 L.Ed.2d 251 (1979). Thus, proscriptions against solicitation in "immediate patient-care areas" are not regarded as presumptively invalid. Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978). But in areas other than immediate patient-care areas, such proscriptions are presumptively invalid; and if they are to be sustained it is incumbent upon the Hospital to show that "disruption to patient care would necessarily result if solicitation and distribution were permitted in those areas." Id., at 495, 98 S.Ct. at 2470. In addition, we recognize that it is the Board's function to develop presumptions and "its conclusions on such matters are traditionally accorded considerable deference." Baptist Hospital, supra, 99 S.Ct. at 2611 (Brennan, J. concurring).

In Baptist Hospital, the Court held that substantial evidence supported the Hospital's position that solicitation in corridors and sitting rooms on patients' floors tended to disrupt patient care and disturb patients, justifying a ban on solicitation in those areas: "Small public rooms or sitting areas on the patient-care floors, as well as the corridors themselves, provide places for patients to visit with family and friends, as well as for doctors to confer with patients' families—often during times of crisis." 99 S.Ct. at 2604–05.

In the instant case, the controversy turns on the characterization of the room in which Cooke was soliciting. The Hospital argues that the area in question was a "sitting room" on a patient-care floor and thus it was permissible for Randall to prohibit Cooke from soliciting there and to threaten that he could be replaced for so soliciting.

The room in question is adjacent to the operating room on the second floor of the Hospital. There are four doors in the room. One door opens onto the second floor's main corridor. Approximately twenty feet away from this main door, at the opposite end of the room, are two doors which lead respectively to the doctors' and nurses' dressing rooms. Also on this end of the room is a narrow hallway, approximately fifteen feet long. At the end of the hallway is the room's fourth door; this door leads to the outer portion of the operating room area where there are patients waiting to go into surgery. The dimensions of the room itself, not including the hallway that leads to the operating rooms, are approximately ten feet by twenty feet. No patients ever enter the area in question; it is never used as a passageway through which to transport patients to and from the operating room, nor is it ever used as a holding area for patients awaiting or recovering from surgery. Patient access to the operating room is through double doors that connect the operating room area directly to the main corridor. The room in question is furnished with a couch and two chairs. There is also a bulletin board on the wall. It was undisputed that employees regularly eat and drink in the room. Cooke testified that he has seen as many as fifteen people at one time in this room and that it is used as a lounge by thirty people from two different departments. But the ALJ rejected Randall's testimony that the room is part of the operating room (and thus an "immediate patient care area"), finding that > Although Ora Randall's testimony sought to establish the "lounge" area as a part of the operating room—and thus not a permissible place to engage in union conversation—the evidence overwhelmingly refutes her testimony. One doesn't regularly eat lunch, drink cokes and coffee, and engage in social conversation in an operating room. That these things were done in the "lounge" area where James Cooke was "selling" the Union's cause is undenied.

The Board agreed that the room is indeed a lounge; it noted that in fact there was once a sign on the door leading into the room designating it as the "Doctor's Lounge." In addition, the Board indicated that the presence of a bulletin board in the room reinforced the conclusion that the room is a lounge for Hospital employees,[1] and therefore a permissible place to solicit support for the Union. Although the room is not generally accessible to visitors and patients, doctors occasionally confer with patients' relatives in the room. There is, however, a separate waiting room on the second floor for the use of visitors. Substantial evidence on the record supports the Board's conclusion that the area in question is neither part of the operating room, nor a public sitting room; it is a lounge for the use of hospital employees during their nonwork time.

Since the area where Cooke was soliciting is not an immediate patient care area, the burden rests on the Hospital to show that Randall's complete prohibition was necessary to prevent disruption of patient care. Beth Israel, supra, 437 U.S. at 495, 98 S.Ct. at 2470. Randall testified that before the incident with Cooke she was attending to a patient who was awaiting surgery in the operating room area—the area that is connected to the lounge by the fifteen-foot long corridor. A nurse asked Randall if she had seen Cooke because some supplies for which he was responsible could not be located. Randall looked for Cooke in the anesthesia room, but he was not there so she located the supplies herself. She then found Cooke, who was on his break, in the lounge reading union literature to three other employees. According to the credited testimony of Cook, Randall told him that he was not supposed to have union literature in the lounge. Cooke replied that he was on his break. Randall then returned to the operating room area where she had been before. She stated that she was aware of noise coming from the lounge. It was at this point that she returned to the lounge, told Cooke to come to her office, and then directed him to stop soliciting. This isolated incident is insufficient to show that "disruption to patient care would necessarily result" in the absence of a complete ban on solicitation in the lounge. Beth Israel, supra, 437 U.S. at 495, 98 S.Ct. at 2470. Randall failed to take the less restrictive approach of requesting that Cooke and other employees talk more quietly. As the ALJ observed, "It may very well be that this particular 'lounge' area is not well suited for a lounge area because of its proximity to the operating room. Nevertheless, it has been so used by the employees for at least the past year." Here, there is substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion that the Hospital failed to overcome the presumption that solicitation in non-immediate patient care areas of the hospital does not disturb patient care or disturb patients. Cooke was soliciting on nonwork time in a nonwork area. While Randall claimed that she was disturbed by Cooke's solicitation, her response to the alleged disturbance was overbroad under the circumstances. The Board's order predicated on its finding that Supervisor Randall's prohibition violated § 8(a)(1) shall be enforced.

[1] The presence of a bulletin board in the hospital cafeteria in the Beth Israel case served as one indication to the Court that the cafeteria was used for solicitation and distribution of other types of communications unrelated to union activity. As such, the cafeteria was held by the Court to be a permissible venue within the hopsital for solicitation and distribution of union literature. Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 490, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2468, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1977).

C. Interrogation of Employee Siminski.

1. Theresa Siminski, who no longer works at the Hospital, was the secretary to the assistant administrator in charge of fiscal affairs, Sol Goldner. She was questioned by both Goldner and Diller before and after the union meeting. Before the meeting, Diller asked Siminski if she knew anything about the union meeting and asked her to tell him the names of other employees who were planning to attend. Goldner called Siminski into his office twice on the day of the meeting. The first time he asked her not to go to the meeting. Siminski became so upset that Goldner told her to take a break. After she returned from her break, Goldner again called her into his office and again asked her not to go. Later in the day, Goldner changed his mind; he suggested that she go to the meeting and then report back to him about what had happened there. After the union meeting, Diller called Goldner's office. Siminski answered the phone and Diller asked her whether she had gone to the union meeting and whether she had signed a union card. Siminski told him that she attended the meeting but that she did not sign a union card. Diller replied that he thought someone had told him that she had signed a card. After Diller conversed with Goldner on the telephone, Goldner called Siminski into his office. He asked her whether she had signed a union card and again she denied it.

None of these interrogations was found by the ALJ to have been an unfair labor practice because the ALJ concluded that Siminski, as secretary to Sol Goldner, was a "confidential employee" and thus did not come within the Board's definition of employees who are protected under the Act. The Board reversed this conclusion; it found that Siminski was not a confidential employee, and held that the conduct of Goldner and Diller violated § 8(a)(1).

2. It is established Board policy that employees who have a confidential relationship to "persons who formulate, determine, and effectuate management policies in the field of labor relations," are "confidential employees" and may be excluded from rank-and-file bargaining units. The B. F. Goodrich Co., 115 NLRB 722, 724 (1956); Ford Motor Co., 66 NLRB 1317 (1946). The ALJ found first, that Siminski worked in a confidential relationship with Goldner, and second, that Goldner is a person who formulates, determines, and effectuates management policies in the field of labor relations (the so-called "labor nexus" requirement, see, e. g., Kleinberg, Kaplan, Wolff, Cohen & Burrows, 253 NLRB No. 54 (1980)). Then the ALJ went on to find that the Board-created exclusion of confidential employees from rank-and-file bargaining units extends to exclude those employees from protection under the Act against unfair labor practices.[2] Therefore, according to the ALJ, the interrogations of Siminski by Diller and Goldner were not unfair labor practices because Siminski was a confidential employee, and as such, her concerted activities were not protected by the Act.

The Board reversed the ALJ's finding that Siminski was a confidential employee because the evidence was insufficient to indicate that Siminski worked in a confidential capacity to Goldner. Thus, the Board did not address the issue of whether Goldner, in his capacity as assistant administrator in charge of fiscal affairs, had the requisite labor nexus to warrant a finding that Siminski was a confidential employee. The Board did note that the ALJ made a finding inconsistent with current Board law when he concluded that the concerted activities of confidential employees go completely unprotected under the Act.[3] Likewise, we need not reach the labor nexus question or the question of the extent of coverage of confidential employees under the Act if we conclude that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's finding that Siminski did not have the requisite confidential relationship with Goldner.

The Board stated that the ALJ's conclusion as to the confidential status of Siminski was based on a series of memoranda that were typed by Siminski for Goldner and that were introduced as evidence by the Hospital at the hearing. The documents included memoranda to the Hospital's personnel director regarding wage raises and evaluations by department heads of certain employees; a memo to an employee's file regarding his termination; and other internal management memoranda regarding payroll and other matters. The Board emphasized that Siminski could not be said to have a confidential relationship to Goldner solely because she typed these memoranda and because she had access to confidential data. In addition, Siminski's other duties of answering Goldner's telephone, opening his mail, and working with raw, confidential data that Goldner eventually used to implement policy decisions upon fiscal matters were insufficient to conclude that Siminski was a confidential employee.

Prior Board decisions have established that mere access to confidential material or typing of confidential labor relations memoranda does not, without more, establish a confidential relationship. United States Postal Service, 232 NLRB 556 (1978); Ernst & Ernst National Warehouse, 228 NLRB 590, 591 (1977). This circuit has previously held that mere access to confidential data is insufficient to constitute confidential employee status. See Union Oil Co. of Cal., Inc. v. NLRB, 607 F.2d 852, 854 (9th Cir. 1979). The Board refrains from a broad definition of confidential employees—and justifiably so: "Because most employees have an arguably confidential relationship with management, and because an expansive application of the exclusionary rule would deprive many employees of the right to bargain collectively, the Board has narrowly construed the definition of confidential employee." Union Oil, supra, 607 F.2d at 853. We therefore conclude that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's finding that Siminski was not a confidential employee and was thus entitled to protection under the Act.

Having found that Siminski was protected by the Act, we additionally find that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that the interrogations of Siminski by Diller and Goldner were unlawful and in violation of § 8(a)(1). The questions put to Siminski could reasonably be construed to be threats of reprisal and reasonably created an impression that the employees were under surveillance. Siminski's testimony certainly indicated that she took the interrogations by Goldner to be veiled threats of reprisal for engaging in union activities.[4]

[2] In so doing, the ALJ relied on a Fourth Circuit case, NLRB v. Wheeling Electric Co., 444 F.2d 783 (4th Cir. 1971), which holds that confidential employees were wholly excluded from protection under the Act because they were "supervisors" within the meaning of that term as used in § 2(3) of the Act; 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) provides in relevant part that, "The term 'employee' * * * shall not include * * * any individual employed as a supervisor."

[3] See Hendricks County Rural Electric Membership Corp., 236 NLRB No. 212 (1978), reversed, 603 F.2d 25 (7th Cir. 1979), pet. for cert. docketed, No. 80-885 (filed December 1, 1980); Southern Greyhound Lines, 169 NLRB 627 (1968), enforced, 426 F.2d 1299 (5th Cir. 1970). The Courts of Appeals are in disagreement as to whether confidential employees are protected under the Act for purposes of unfair labor practices. Compare Hendricks County, supra and NLRB v. Wheeling Electric Co., 444 F.2d 783 (4th Cir. 1971) with NLRB v. Southern Greyhound Lines, supra.

[4] Siminski testified that the second time she was called in to Goldner's office, she asked him, "If I go [to the union meeting], will you fire me?" During the hearing, the ALJ indicated that he gave a great deal of weight to Siminski's testimony: "As I've indicated earlier Theresa Siminski was a very candid, I felt, and almost too nervous a witness to have been anything but credible and honest on this witness stand * * *"

The impression that the employees were under surveillance was imparted by Goldner's request of Siminski to attend the meeting and report back to him afterward. Such requests have been held to be unfair labor practices by the Board. See Ayer Lar Sanitarium, supra, 536 F.2d at 47–48.

Accordingly, we find that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the findings of the Board in their entirety.

ORDER ENFORCED.

Golden Day Schools, Inc. v. NLRB

644 F.2d 834 (9th Cir.), May 8, 1981—236 NLRB 1292

On petition to review Board Order

Before BROWNING, Chief Judge, CHOY, Circuit Judge, and THOMPSON,* District Judge

836

BROWNING, Chief Judge: Employees of Golden Day Schools, Inc., a proprietary child care facility, held meetings at which the benefits of unionization were discussed. At least thirteen participants were interrogated about the meetings, and eight were fired. Employees picketed Golden Day and distributed leaflets. Five additional employees were discharged.

The union filed an unfair labor practice charge. The Board found Golden Day had violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by coercively interrogating employees concerning their interest in the union and asking one employee to renounce her membership.[1] The Board also found Golden Day had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging the 13 employees for union activity, and ordered reinstatement with back pay.

I.

Golden Day argues the Board should have exercised its discretion not to assert jurisdiction over Golden Day because Golden Day operates as an "adjunct" to the California school system, performing services "intimately connected" with the purposes of the school system, within the meaning of prior Board decisions declining to exercise jurisdiction over private employers standing in such a relationship to an exempt state entity.[2]

The cases relied upon by Golden Day are no longer controlling. Under subsequent Board decisions the test is "whether th[e] employer has sufficient control over the employment conditions of its employees to enable it to bargain with a labor organization which represents them." D.T. Watson Home for Crippled Children, 242 NLRB, ———, ——— (1979) (No. 187).[3]

Although the State of California reviews Golden Day's budget and sets academic standards, Golden Day, not the State, controls such matters as hiring, firing, employee evaluation, pay raises, grievance procedures, and sick and vacation allowances. Clearly, Golden Day has sufficient control over the terms and conditions of employment of its employees to bargain effectively with a union representing their interests.

Alternatively, Golden Day contends that its gross income was below the $1,000,000 standard established by the Board for exercising jurisdiction over "educational institutions." However, Golden Day met the Board's $250,000 standard for exercising jurisdiction over "day-care centers," and the Board concluded that Golden Day fell in this category.

Golden Day does not challenge the appropriateness of the two standards; it argues only that the Board applied the wrong standard to Golden Day because the Board mischaracterized Golden Day's operations. The issue is the reasonableness of the Board's classification on the facts.

The Board's determination of such a question will not be set aside "in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, such as unjust discrimination." NLRB v. Car-

*Honorable Bruce R. Thompson, Senior Judge, United States District Court for the District of Nevada, sitting by designation.

[1] Golden Day does not challenge this aspect of the Board's findings and conclusions.

Golden Day relies heavily upon Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, 209 NLRB 152 (1974). This case applied the "adjunct" test disapproved in D.T. Watson Home for Crippled Children, cited in the text.

We do not understand Golden Day to claim statutory exemption as a "political subdivision" of the state, see 29 U.S.C § 152(2). In any event, it is clear that Golden Day is not a "political subdivision" of the state under the test traditionally applied under Section 152(2). And the most liberal version of the statutory test is the same as the test for "adjunct" status applied in this opinion. See NLRB v. Austin Development Center, Inc., 606 F.2d 785, 789 (7th Cir. 1979).

roll-Naslund Disposal, Inc., 359 F.2d 779, 780 (9th Cir. 1966).[4] There are no such circumstances here. The administrative law judge concluded that Golden Day's operations are "essentially undistinguishable from Young World [5] and Salt & Pepper Nursery School," [6] in which the Board asserted jurisdiction under the standard for "day-care centers". We agree. Golden Day enrolls children between 2 years and 4 years 9 months in age.[7] Its hours of operation (6:30 a.m. to 6 p.m.) coincide with the parents' work day rather than with a conventional school schedule. Most of its employees are non-teaching aides. Although some of Golden Day's activities are educational, the emphasis, as the administrative law judge stated, is upon "caring for, rather than educating, very young children." Educational elements in its program are informal and occupy a small part of the daily schedule. Most of the day is spent feeding the children, assisting them during bathroom periods, putting them down for naps, and supervising them in coloring, painting, or singing, indoor play with toys, or outside playground activities.

II.

Golden Day argues that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the Board's finding that the employees were discharged because of their efforts to organize a union.

The employees met on September 30, 1976 and October 7. Golden Day learned of the meetings on Monday, October 11. On the same day, management personnel began to question individual employees regarding the meetings. Witnesses credited by the administrative law judge testified that the interrogation concerned formation of a union. On Wednesday management personnel called a meeting of all employees and told them there would be no union at Golden Day. From Monday through Friday, thirteen employees were interrogated, one for three hours, several more than once. Eight of the thirteen interrogated employees were discharged during the course of the week. On the following Monday, numerous employees picketed and distributed leaflets at Golden Day. Five were discharged. Thirteen of Golden Day's total workforce of 25 to 30 were terminated during the eight-day period.

Golden Day's management testified that seven of the first eight employees terminated were not discharged because they met to consider organizing a union but because they participated in unauthorized meetings with parents to induce these parents to withdraw their children from Golden Day and enroll them in a new school to be formed by staff members; because the employees made false and malicious statements to these parents regarding Golden Day's services and facilities; and because the employees falsely denied attending the meetings or making the derogatory statements to the parents. Golden Day asserts the remaining one of the first eight employees terminated was discharged for unsatisfactory work performance.[8]

Management testified that three of the last five employees terminated were not discharged because they picketed Golden Day, but because they circulated a disparaging leaflet regarding Golden Day while picketing, and that the remaining two were not discharged.[9]

"[I]t is particularly within the purview of the Board to determine in cases such as this on conflicting evidence what the motivation for discharge was." NLRB v. Winkel Motors, Inc., 443 F.2d 38, [7] Golden Day also provides "limited day-care and enrichment care for approximately 50 children age 4 years 9 months to age 12." This fact is not relevant to the jurisdictional issue since Golden Day concedes that the primary service is day-care until the children's parents arrive to pick them up.

[8] This employee, Henry, attended the union meetings and was discharged with the others who attended them. She was given neither written nor oral warning that her work was unsatisfactory. There was no evidence that she was late to work or fell asleep on the job, as Golden Day asserted.

[9] Two bus drivers who engaged in the picketing were "relieved of their keys." Golden Day argues this was done only to permit others to drive the vehicles. However, there was evidence that the drivers picketed only when not on duty, that when relieved of their keys they were told to pick up their pay checks, that upon inquiry, one of the two was told he had been fired, that neither was told of Golden Day's limited purpose in taking the keys, and that they were asked to return to work three days later when Golden Day found itself "in need of replacements for those individuals."

40 (9th Cir. 1971). The determination may, and usually must, be based upon circumstantial evidence.[10] Self-serving declarations by Golden Day's management personnel regarding their motivation are not conclusive.[11] Indeed, when the Board determines, as it did here, that such declarations are untrue, the false assertions of lawful purpose support the inference that the declarants' motive was unlawful.[12]

The record amply supports the Board's finding that the discharges were motivated by antiunion bias. The discharges followed immediately upon union organizing activity in which the discharged employees participated. Golden Day evidenced strong antiunion bias by announcing to its assembled workers that there would be no union, and by the timing, nature, and extent of interrogation of individual employees. And as the Administrative Law Judge found, Golden Day "concocted the flimsiest of explanations" for its conduct.

Golden Day questioned the adequacy of the performance of only one of the discharged employees, and as to this employee the charge was not borne out by the record.[13] There was no evidence that meetings between staff and parents were prohibited unless specifically authorized. There was no evidence that the two meetings that were held had any purpose except to consider organization of a union. There were no parents at the first meeting; only two parents attended the second. One was invited because of her knowledge of union matters; the other attended to inquire about conditions at Golden Day. The unfavorable statements regarding Golden Day's services and facilities appear from the testimony to have been moderate responses to direct questions asked of employees by this parent. There is no evidence that any employee sought to solicit these or any other parents to remove their children from Golden Day.

Since the leaflet containing statements disparaging Golden Day was distributed during the picketing, it could not have played a part in the eight discharges that occurred before the picketing. The record also supports the inference that the disparaging statements did not influence the discharge of the five employees who picketed while the leaflet was being distributed.

Golden Day admits that two of these five employees did not participate in distributing the leaflet.[14] The Administrative Law Judge found that Golden Day punished all "five employees on no known basis other than having picketed the school following [the] rash of discharges," indicating that the ALJ discredited testimony of the President of Golden Day that he was aware of the contents of the leaflet when he discharged the other three of the five employees. Rejection of the alternative motive is also reflected in the ALJ's finding that all five employees were discharged "for engaging in the protected activity of protesting an unfair labor practice." From what we have said earlier, it is evident that this finding that anti-union bias alone motivated the discharge of all five employees is amply supported by the record.[15] Assuming distribution of the leaflet would have afforded Golden Day justifiable ground for discharge of three of these employees, therefore, their discharges are nonetheless unlawful, for it is settled that "[d]ischarge of an employee for whom the employer has a justifiable ground for discharge constitutes a violation of § 8(a)(3) if the employer's motivation is in fact discriminatory." NLRB v. Western Clinical Laboratory, Inc., 571 F.2d 457, 459 (9th Cir. 1978).

III.

Golden Day contends that even if the employees were dismissed for union activity, the Board abused its discretion in ordering that they be reinstated with back pay. Golden Day argues that reinstatement was inappropriate because (1) the employees' pre-termination misconduct in meeting with parents without prior authorization "constituted gross disloyalty, justifying a denial of their reinstatement," and (2) the employees' post-termination misconduct in distributing a leaflet impugning Golden Day's services and facilities "renders them unfit for further service."

[15] For this reason "mixed motive" cases, applying the "moving cause" test to discharges motivated by both lawful and unlawful purposes, are not relevant. See, e.g., L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341–42 (9th Cir. 1980) (collecting cases).

Both arguments relate only to the appropriateness of the remedy. We have sustained the Board's finding that the employees were not discharged for their alleged misconduct, but because of their union activity. For the purpose of this portion of their argument, Golden Day assumes the correctness of this decision. Thus, the issue here is not whether the employees might have been discharged for the alleged misconduct, but whether that misconduct bars reinstatement with back pay.[16] For this reason, the portion of Section 10(c) of the Act that bars reinstatement of any individual discharged for cause,[17] and cases such as NLRB v. Electrical Workers, 346 U.S. 464, 74 S.Ct. 172, 98 L.Ed. 195 (1953), applying this provision, are not strictly relevant. As the court said in Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S.203, 217, 85 S.Ct. 398, 406, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1965):

> The legislative history of that provision indicates that it was designed to preclude the Board from reinstating an individual > who had been discharged because of misconduct. There is no indication, however, that it was designed to curtail the Board's power in fashioning remedies when the loss of employment stems directly from an unfair labor practice as in the case at hand. (footnote omitted) [18]

Golden Day recognizes that the Board has broad discretion in the choice of remedies,[19] and that reinstatement with back pay is the normal remedy for an unlawful termination.[20] The question the Board must answer in each case is whether in the particular circumstances reinstatement "wll effectuate the policies" of the Act.[21] The Board's exercise of its broad discretion to determine when reinstatement is appropriate is subject to only "limited judicial review." Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 406, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964), quoted in NLRB v. Western Clinical Laboratory, Inc., 571 F.2d 457, 461 (9th Cir. 1978). As the Supreme Court said in NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346–47, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288–89, 97 L.Ed.2d 377 (1953) "[w]hen the Board, 'in the exercise of its informed discretion,' makes an order of restoration by way of back pay, the order 'should stand unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act.' "[22]

Important policies served by the Act include "[a]voidance of labor strife, prevention of a deterrent effect on the exercise of rights guaranteed employees by § 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, and protection for the victimized employee." Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168, 185, 94 S.Ct. 414, 425, 38 L.Ed.2d 388 (1973). "The primary purpose of the act is to protect the public interest and the policies of the Act by mitigating the effects of the violation and preventing future violations," Marriott Corp. v. NLRB, 491 F.2d 367, 371 (9th Cir. 1974).[23]

The inquiry has also been stated in terms of the coverage of the statute—whether the employees' conduct was "protected" activity under the Act—rather than in terms of selecting the appropriate remedy. Under this analysis "[t]he standard is whether [the employee's] improper conduct was so indefensible as to forefeit the act's protection." NLRB v. Max Factor & Co., 640 F.2d 197, 89 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 12,232 (9th Cir. 1980). See also NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 17, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 1104, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962); Coors Container Co. v. Owners Maintenance Corp., 581 F.2d 44, 49–50 (2d Cir. 1978). This analysis may obscure a consideration that is important in some cases: The purpose of the remedy is not merely to vindicate or punish a particular employer or employee, but to protect the public interest. See Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 192–93, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 851, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941); Trinity Valley Iron & Steel Co. v. NLRB, 410 F.2d 1161, 1168 (5th Cir. 1969). Even though in the circumstances of a particular case, the unlawful conduct of the employees may make the remedy of reinstatement inappropriate, other remedies may be available and should be employed to protect the public interest in deterring unfair labor practices.

[17] Section 10(c), 29 U.S.C § 160(c), provides in part that if the Board finds that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice, the Board shall issue "an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of this [Act]." The portion of the section referred to in text then provides, however, that "[n]o order of the Board shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause."

In determining whether reinstatement will serve these policies, the Board must consider the degree and kind of unlawful conduct committed by the employer and by the employees, the relationship between the conduct of both, and the probable impact, in all the circumstances, of selecting the particular remedy. "[T]he Board, as a part of the process of determining whether reinstatement would effectuate the policies of the Act, will balance the severity of the employer's unfair labor practice which provoked the industrial disturbance against whatever employee misconduct may have occurred in the course of the strike." NLRB v. Thayer Co., 213 F.2d 748, 755 (1st Cir. 1954).[24]

The appropriateness of reinstatement as a remedy for the discharge of the eight employees because of their attendance at union organizing meetings requires little discussion.

Protection of the right of self-organization lies at the heart of the Act. Golden Day's reaction was accurately characterized by the administrative law judge as a "harsh and sudden crackdown," beginning with coercive interrogations and ending with discharge. As has been seen, the employees' alleged misconduct—meeting with parents without prior authority and responding to questions regarding conditions at Golden Day—was, at worst, innocuous. As the Board found, Golden Day's "stated reasons for the first eight discharges were transparently pretextual."

In sum, the employer's violations were egregious; and the employees' conduct was not of the quality or extent that might reasonably be thought to threaten future amicable relations between the employer and the employees.[25] In these circumstances reinstatement was clearly necessary to vindicate the purposes of the Act, deter future violations, and preserve industrial peace.[26]

Golden Day contends that three of the remaining five discharged employees should not be reinstated because they distributed a leaflet disparaging Golden Day's services and facilities while picketing Golden Day.[27] The leaflet was written in harsh language and made serious charges, not all of them true. It cannot be condoned. Nonetheless, we cannot hold that the Board abused its discretion in deciding that on balance, the purpose of the Act would best be served by reinstating the three offending employees.

Two other communications—a short written statement and a press release—were distributed with the disparaging leaflet and dealt almost exclusively with matters directly involved in the dispute. Although the leaflet itself consisted largely of criticism of Golden Day's facilities and services, these were not entirely irrelevant to the on-going dispute. Complaints about cleanliness, teachers' duties, and care of the children could be expected to figure prominently in discussions between the school's management and any union representing the employees. The leaflet ended with a plea for the parents' sympathy in the workers' dispute with Golden Day. Moreover, as the administrative law judge noted, the leaflet fell "woefully short of the malicious tone" that would have been necessary to justify discharge under the doctrine of NLRB v. Electrical Workers, 346 U.S. 464, 74 S.Ct. 172, 98 L.Ed. 195 (1954). The administrative law judge concluded that, on balance, "no sufficient showing of unfitness for further duty as the school is shown for any person involved in the preparation or dissemination of the flyer."

[26] See cases cited note 19.

[27] Golden Day has not contended that the other two of the five employees who were discharged after they participated in the picketing had also participated in distributing leaflets. Indeed, Golden Day argued these two employees were not discharged at all and were asked to return to work when the President of Golden Day learned that, although they had engaged in picketing, they had not been seen distributing leaflets.

The leaflet and other documents were prepared and distributed in response to the most severe provocation. They appeared immediately after Golden Day had coercively interrogated and peremptorily discharged eight of its employees—one-third of the work force—for union activity. The picketing during which the leaflets were distributed was primarily in protest against the unlawful and unwarranted firing of fellow employees. As the Board concluded, Golden Day "acted with flagrant disregard for its employees' rights under the Act." The purposes of the Act would not be accomplished without a firm and sure sanction for such aggressive anti-union efforts. A mere finding of unlawful discharge without the added remedy of reinstatement would be a weak deterrent indeed. As Judge Sobeloff said in NLRB v. M & B Headwear Co., 349 F.2d 170, 174 (4th Cir. 1965):

> An employer cannot provoke an employee to the point where she commits such an indiscretion as is shown here and then rely on this to terminate her employment. The more extreme an employer's wrongful provocation the greater would be the employee's justified sense of indignation and the more likely its excessive expression. To accept the argument addressed to us by the company would be to provide employers a method of immunizing themselves from the only real sanction against violations of section 8(a)(3). Reinstatement in the instant case is not, as the employer puts it, a reward to the employee for insurgency. Rather, as we see it, refusal to reinstate her would put a premium on the employer's misconduct. (citation omitted).[28]

The Board's order will be enforced.

Ernestine Bentley, Bonnie Collins, Ben Hall and Vera Hall v. NLRB

653 F.2d 243 (6th Cir.), March 9, 1981—242 NLRB 547

On petition to review Board Order

Before LIVELY and KEITH, Circuit Judges, and BOYLE,[*] District Judge

Bonnie Collins, Ernestine Bentley, and Vera Hall brought this matter upon a petition for review of a May 24, 1979 order for the NLRB reported at 242 NLRB 95. That decision dismissed a consolidated complaint against South East Coal Co. as being time barred under Section 10(b) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The petitioners are daughters of Ben Hall. Both before and after his retirement from South East Coal Co. in 1954 Ben Hall was an active supporter of the union. In 1962 and 1963 he picketed at the company's premises during a strike which the union had called against it. Daniel Quillen, vice president in charge of operations of the company, who has done all its hiring since December 1971 was aware of Ben Hall's membership in and activities on behalf of the union.

In August, 1976, Collins and Bentley filed complaints with the Kentucky Commission on Human Rights, alleging that the company had refused to employ them because of their sex, in violation of the state civil rights law. Their aunt, who had previously filed a similar complaint, was subsequently offered employment by the company under a conciliation agreement. Under that agreement, the company also placed an advertisement in local newspapers, stating that it was an equal opportunity employer, and that it was seeking applications from all qualified persons. The advertisement further stated that all previous applications were considered inactive, and that any past applicants who wished to be considered for employment must reapply.

As a result, Bentley filed an application for employment, dated September 3, 1976, and received by the company on September 16, 1976. Vera Hall filed an application dated September 17, 1976, and received by the company on September 20, 1976. Collins filed an application dated December 8, 1976, and received by the company on December 11, 1976. The application forms stated that all applications would be considered inactive after six months, and that anyone who still wished to be considered for employment after that period would have to reapply.

[*] Hon. Patricia Boyle, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Michigan, sitting by designation.

Company vice-president Quillen interviewed Bentley on September 24, 1976, and Vera Hall on September 29. Quillen decided, on the days the interviews were held, that he would not hire these applicants, and did not subsequently reconsider the decision. He did not interview Collins or reconsider his prior rejection of her. None of the sisters subsequently reapplied for employment.

The Kentucky Commission on Human Rights dismissed the sex discrimination complaint filed by Collins and Bentley in September 1977. They filed motions for reconsideration, which the Commission denied, indicating that the company had said that it had not hired, and would not hire, Collins and Bentley because their father, Ben Hall, had a pro-union reputation.

On November 22, 1977, Collins filed a charge with the NRLB alleging that the company had discriminatorily refused to hire her. This charge was served on the company on November 23, 1977. On December 5, 1977, Bentley filed, and served on the company, a charge alleging that the company had discriminatorily refused to hire her. On March 27, 1978, the Regional Director issued a complaint alleging that, [S]ince on or about May 23, 1977, the company had hired other employees while discriminatorily refusing to hire Collins and Bentley. On May 30, 1978, the complaint was amended to allege that Vera Hall, as well as Collins and Bentley, was discriminatorily denied employment "[S]ince on or about May 23, 1977."

On the foregoing facts, the Board found, in agreement with the ALJ, that the company had refused, prior to May 23, 1977, to hire each of the three sisters because of their father's reputation as an active supporter of the union. However, the Board concluded that the general counsel had failed to prove that any discriminatory refusal to hire had occurred on or after May 23, 1977. Accordingly, the Board found that any unfair labor practices occurred more than six months before the filing of the charges herein, and were therefore barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. The Board therefore dismissed the complaint in its entirety.

Our standard for reviewing the Board's finding of fact here is whether there is substantial evidence to support the Board's decision. See N.L.R.B. v. Challenge-Cook Bro. of Ohio, Inc., 374 F.2d 147 (6th Cir. 1967). We believe that the Board's finding that the company refused to hire the petitioners before May 23, 1977, and not after that date, is supported by substantial evidence. Accordingly, the petition for review is denied.

Pay'n Save Corporation v. NLRB

641 F.2d 697 (9th Cir.), March 9, 1981—247 NLRB 1346

On petition to review Board Order

Before PREGERSON, POOLE and NORRIS, Circuit Judges

PREGERSON, Circuit Judge: Pay'n Save Corporation, engaged in retailing goods to the public, petitions this court to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB); the NLRB cross-applies for enforcement of its order. The contested order was based on the NLRB's finding that Pay'n Save had violated subsections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3),[1] by maintaining and disparately applying an unwritten rule against wearing "controversial" buttons, including union buttons, and by suspending and later discharging two employees for engaging in protected union activities. The alleged violations took place during a union organizing campaign. The NLRB's order required Pay'n Save to recognize and bargain with the union and to cease and desist from interfering with employees' exercise of protected rights, to offer reinstatement and backpay to the discharged employees, and to post an appropriate notice.

Pay'n Save contends that its prohibition of controversial buttons was a justified business decision taken to avoid antagonizing coustomers, that the two employees were legitimately discharged for insubordination, and that the circumstances of this case do not justify the issuance of a bargaining order. Pay'n Save also challenges two evidentiary rulings made by the administrative law judge (ALJ) in the hearing on the unfair labor practice charges.

[1] Section 8(a)(1) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7" of the Act. (Section 7 appears, in relevant part, in note 5 infra.) Subsection 8(a)(3), in relevant part, makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization."

Because we find that the NLRB's findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, and that the NLRB correctly applied the law, we deny Pay'n Save's petition and enforce the NLRB's order.

I. FACTS

The instant dispute arose in May 1978, during an organizational campaign by the Retail Clerks Union Local No. 381 (Union) at Pay'n Save's Port Angeles, Washington, store. Dawn Frederick, a Pay'n Save sales clerk, contacted the Union in early May, obtained union authorization cards, and distributed them to other store employees. Ten of the thirteen employees signed cards.

At a May 15, 1978 meeting with Pay'n Save employees, a Union representative distributed yellow and black lapel buttons, 1¼ inch in diameter, some saying "Vote Yes Retail Clerks Union AFL-CIO" and others "Vote Retail Clerks Union AFL-CIO." That day and the next day, Frederick and fellow employee Joyce Berry wore the union buttons on their company-issued jackets while on the store sales floor.[2] On May 17, Assistant Store Manager Gary Jennings directed Frederick and Berry to remove the buttons; they refused, and Jennings suspended them. Later that afternoon, Store Manager Jim Hanrahan telephoned Frederick and Berry and told them they would be discharged by May 19 unless they returned to work without the buttons. Frederick telephoned Hanrahan a few minutes later, asked whether she could wear the button on her own clothing rather than on the store jacket, and was told she could. She and Berry both wore the buttons on their personal clothing when they returned to work.

On May 27, Frederick and Berry each wore a union button on their store jackets. (Berry wore an additional button on her personal clothing.) Hanrahan called them into his office one at a time and discharged them. Although there is conflicting testimony as to exactly what was said, it is clear that Hanrahan withdrew the option of wearing the union button on personal clothing, and made it clear that the buttons were not to be worn on the sales floor at all.

After a hearing, an ALJ found that Pay'n Save had violated subsections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by suspending and discharging Frederick and Berry, and ordered reinstatement and backpay as a remedy. The NLRB substantially affirmed the ALJ's findings, but reversed the finding that Pay'n Save's ban on controversial buttons had not been disparately applied. The NLRB also issued a bargaining order.

II. DISCUSSION

This court will enforce the NLRB's order if the NLRB correctly applied the law and if its findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, at 724 (9th Cir. 1980).[3]

A. The Rule Against Controversial Buttons

Although Pay'n Save's employee handbook contained no written regulation concerning buttons or insignia, the company alleges it had a long-standing policy prohibiting employees from wearing political, controversial, or offensive insignia on store jackets. It argues that this policy was meant to avoid the appearance of an endorsement of a controversial position that might offend customers.

This circuit has held that, absent "special considerations," an employee has a right, protected by section 7 of the Act,[4] to wear union buttons and insignia at work. NLRB v. Essex Wire Corp., 245 F.2d 589, 593 (9th Cir. 1957). See Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945). A later opinion made it clear that this right is not per se guaranteed by the Act; "evidence of a purpose protected by the act" is also required. NLRB v. Harrah's Club, 337 F.2d 177 (9th Cir. 1964). In the instant case, the button-wearing was linked to such a protected purpose—

[2] Each Pay'n Save employee is issued a store jacket. The women's store jacket is a bright orange, hip-length smock.

[3] That the NLRB's findings were in part contrary to the ALJ's does not change this standard of review. NLRB v. Big Bear Supermarkets No. 3, ——— F.2d ——— at ——— (9th Cir. Apr. 2, 1980).

[4] Section 7, 29 U.S.C. § 157, guarantees to employees "the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

the Union's attempt to organize Pay'n Save's employees. Thus Pay'n Save's ban on wearing union buttons interfered with the exercise of a protected right—a violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act—unless there were special considerations justifying the ban.

The NLRB has found such special considerations, justifying a prohibition on wearing union insignia, in cases where the insignia could exacerbate employee dissension,[5] jeopardize employee safety,[6] or damage machinery or products.[7] The courts have recognized additional "special considertions"—distraction from work demanding great concentration[8] and a need "to project a certain type of image to the public."[9] Only the last of these special factors is even arguably present in the instant case.

Pay'n Save argues that its ban on union buttons was justified by its legitimate concern about the image projected to the public by its employees and compares its policy to that upheld in NLRB v. Harrah's Club, 337 F.2d 177 (9th Cir. 1964). That case, however, is quite different from the present one, since in Harrah's Club "the wearing of the union buttons was not part of any concerted campaign to organize the employees" or otherwise to exercise rights protected by the Act, id. at 178, and was thus not in itself a protected activity, id. at 179. The court's remark, id. at 180, that Harrah's concern with "the appearance of its uniformed employees" would in the circumstances of that case have been sufficient justification for prohibiting the buttons even if button-wearing in itself had been a protected right was dictum unnecessary to the decision of the case.[10]

Pay'n Save also cites the Fifth Circuit's decision in Davison-Paxon Co. v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 364 (5th Cir. 1972), which held that a fashionable department store was justified in prohibiting its employees from wearing a large, gaudy union button on the selling floor. The Fifth Circuit noted that the store "was concerned primarily with the button's capacity to antogonize its customers"—the same interest Pay'n Save asserts here. Id. at 369. And Davison-Paxon, unlike Harrah's Club, did uphold a ban on a union button while a union organizing campaign was in progress. Nevertheless Davison-Paxon is distinguishable from our case because it involved "animosity between union and anti-union factions at the store" that made the ban on the union buttons reasonable. Id. Moreover, Davison-Paxon involved a fashionable department store that liked its employees to double as customers and models for its merchandise, id. at 368.

Finally this case is different from either Harrah's Club or Davison-Paxon because the NLRB found that Pay'n Save had disparately enforced its controversial-button rule against Frederick and Berry.[11] Substantial evidence in the record indicates that, although Pay'n Save had consistently enforced its rule against political buttons, various non-political but potentially controversial buttons had been tolerated on employees' store jackets while the employees were in contact with the public. Buttons with religious messages, religious holiday insignia, and product promotional insignia had been permitted. Moreover, company officials appeared to disagree as to precisely what Pay'n Save's unwritten rule prohibited.[12]

[5] United Aircraft Corp., 134 NLRB 1632 (1961) (reasonable to ban wearing union pins to prevent disorder and divisiveness between strikers and nonstrikers).

[6] Andrews Wire Corp., 189 NLRB 108 (1971) (banning union insignia on employees' hard hats was permissible where insignia could impair the hats' visibility and endanger employees).

[7] Campbell Soup Co., 159 NLRB 74, enforced in part, enforcement denied in part on other grounds, 380 F.2d 372 (5th Cir. 1967).

[8] Fabri-Tek, Inc. v. NLRB, 352 F.2d 577 (8th Cir. 1965) (manufacture of computer memory units demanded extraordinary concentration, justifying ban on distracting union insignia).

[9] NLRB v. Harrah's Club, 337 F.2d 177, 180 (9th Cir. 1964) (casino/restaurant could prohibit wearing of union buttons by employees coming into contact with public).

[10] Moreover, Harrah's Club would be distinguishable from the instant case even if wearing union buttons were a per se protected right without the need for a link with an otherwise protected purpose. For in Harrah's, the court's dictum indicates that the strong employer interest in the image its employees presented to the public would outweigh the weak employee interest in wearing union insignia in the absence of any organizing or collective bargaining activity. In our case the employee interest is much stronger, since an organizing drive was under way, and the employer's interest in employee appearance is much weaker, since Pay'n Save's clerks in their bright orange smocks have little in common with the service personnel of a casino/restaurant "on a par with * * * the finest theater-restaurants in the world." 337 F.2d at 178 n.1.

[11] The court in Davison-Paxon explicitly stated that "(t)here is no issue of discriminatory motive here." 462 F.2d at 370 n.14. In Harrah's Club the employer's rule had "been strictly enforced in the past against badges, pins, and buttons showing religious, political, or social affiliations." 337 F.2d at 178.

[12] For example, Dale Collette, Pay'n Save's director of training and former personnel director, stated that no buttons were allowed "that would illustrate an endorsement by the company of any type of politics, religion, anything like that"—and that anything worn on the store jackets would constitute an endorsement or promotion by the company. Execu-

Thus, there is substantial evidence to support the NLRB's finding that Pay'n Save violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining and disparately applying a rule against wearing political or controversial buttons, including union buttons. Pay'n Save has not met its burden of establishing that its policy was justified by "special considerations."[13]

702

B. The Suspensions and Discharges

Given that, absent special circumstances, the wearing of union buttons at work during a union organizational drive is an activity protected under the Act, the illegality of suspending or discharging an employee for wearing a union button is an obvious corollary. Subsection 8(a)(3) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to discriminate against an employee for engaging in protected union activity.[14]

The employer's motivation is controlling in determining whether subsection 8(a)(3) is violated by a discharge or suspension. Clear Pine Mouldings Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721 at 726 (9th Cir. 1980). The Company argues that Frederick and Berry were disciplined for insubordination, not for engaging in protected union activity. The determination of motive, however, is particularly within the purview of the NLRB. NLRB v. Fort Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596, 600 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 915, 100 S.Ct. 1275, 63 L.Ed.2d 599 (1980). The NLRB's inferences and findings must prevail where they are reasonable and supported by substantial evidence. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. supra, 632 F. 2d at 726.

The NLRB concluded that the Company engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of subsections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by suspending and later discharging Frederick and Berry. This conclusion was based upon the uncontradicted evidence that Frederick and Berry were discharged for wearing union buttons on their store jackets during a union organizatonal drive. There is substantial evidence to support the NLRB's conclusion that the restriction on political campaign buttons was broadened to include all "controversial" buttons in direct response to the Union's activity. Thus, the NLRB's finding that the Company violated section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging and suspending Frederick and Berry for wearing union buttons must be upheld.

C. The Bargaining Order

> [A] bargaining order can properly be entered where three requirements are satisfied. First, that the union once had a card majority; second, that the employer committed serious unfair labor practices which, though less "outrageous" and "pervasive" than those which by themselves justify a bargaining order, undermine the union's majority and continue to impede the holding of a fair election; and third, that the likelihood of erasing the effects of the unfair practices and obtaining a fair election by the use of traditional remedies is slight and that on balance the employees will best be protected by entry of a bargaining order.

NLRB v. Peninsula Association for Retarded Children and Adults, 627 F.2d 202, at 203 (9th Cir. 1980). See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 610–16, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1938–1941, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). Here, the union clearly had a card majority when ten of the thirteen employees signed union authorization cards. The NLRB found that Pay'n Save's serious misconduct—discharging the leading Union adherents for engaging in protected union activities—tended to dissipate that majority status and made it "practically * * * impossible" that a fair election could be held. The NLRB accordingly issued a bargaining order.

Pay'n Save urges this court not to enforce the bargaining order, arguing that: (1) the union authorization cards were tainted by Frederick's misrepresentations;

(2) Pay'n Save exhibited good faith and a lack of anti-union animus; and (3) twelve employees, on

tive Vice-President Calvin Hendricks spoke of "a controversial political button" as the type banned. And Store Manager Jim Hanrahan testified that "there's no list of what buttons are acceptable" and that he would decide on a case-by-case basis what to permit.

[13] Pay'n Save also contends that it did not in fact ban the union buttons, since employees had the option of wearing such buttons on their own clothing, as Frederick and Berry had done for almost two weeks. The facts belie this contention. Store Manager Hanrahan testified that he gave Frederick and Berry a choice between discharge and removing their union buttons and that he withdrew the option of wearing the buttons on their personal clothes.

their own initiative, petitioned the NLRB for an election and thereby expressed their opposition to a bargaining order. Deciding whether a bargaining order is warranted, however, is a matter peculiarly committed to the discretion of the NLRB, calling for "its expert estimate as to the effects on the election of the unfair labor practice." NLRB v. Bighorn Beverages, 614 F.2d 1238, 1243 (9th Cir. 1980). And a determination that a bargaining order is needed will not be upset if supported by substantial evidence. Id. Measured against this strict standard, Pay'n Save's arguments are inadequate.

First, Pay'n Save fails to cast serious doubt on the validity of the union authorization cards. "[E]mployees should be bound by the clear language of what they sign unless that language is clearly and deliberately cancelled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disregard and forget the language above his signature." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 606, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1936, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). The union cards here were entitled "Authorization for Representation." They stated in simple language that the signer authorized the Union to represent him or her for collective bargaining purposes. Pay'n Save did not convince the ALJ or the NLRB that any of the signatures on the cards were obtained by misrepresentations that cancelled this clear wording. The NLRB could properly find majority support for the Union on the basis of the cards signed and returned by employees.

Second, Pay'n Save contends that the NLRB failed to consider the company's good faith and lack of anti-union animus. The Supreme Court in Gissel, however, endorsed the NLRB's approach, under which good faith, "is largely irrelevant, and the key to the issuance of a bargaining order is the commission of serious unfair labor practices that interfere with the election processes and tend to preclude the holding of a fair election." 395 U.S. at 594, 89 S.Ct. at 1929. Indeed, the Court in Gissel viewed its decision as reinforcing the NLRB's policy of avoiding any inquiry into the employer's state of mind at the time of the unfair labor practices. R. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law 96.

Finally, Pay'n Save points to a July 1, 1978 petition, signed by twelve employees, as a clear indication that a majority of the store's employees wanted a union election rather than a bargaining order. The petition stated that the employees signed the union cards as a step towards an election rather than as evidence of a decision in favor of the union. Courts have noted, however, the understandable tendency of employees, desiring to retain their jobs and maintain good relations with management after indicating support for a union, to make statements damaging to unions or undermining the validity of union authorization cards they signed. Gissel, supra, 395 U.S. at 608, 89 S.Ct. at 1937; L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1350 (9th Cir. 1980). NLRB argues persuasively that the petition is strong evidence that the discharge of the two leading Union adherents had a chilling impact upon other Union supporters. We cannot say that the petition should have compelled the NLRB to find a bargaining order unwarranted.

There is substantial evidence to support the NLRB's conclusion that a bargaining order is a proper remedy in this case. "The probable impact of unfair labor practices is increased when a small bargaining unit, such as here, is involved and increases the need for a bargaining order." NLRB v. Bighorn Beverages, 614 F.2d 1238, 1243 (9th Cir. 1980) (citations omitted). This case falls within the Gissel holding approving the "use of the bargaining order in less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process." 395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940.

D. The Evidentiary Rulings

Pay'n Save attacks two evidentiary rulings that were made during the unfair labor practice hearing before an administrative law judge.

(1) At the hearing, Pay'n Save sought to elicit testimony from Richard L. King, an official of an employer group that negotiates and administers labor contracts for members like Pay'n Save, about conversations with union and NLRB officials that allegedly supported Pay'n Save's claim that it was entitled to discipline employees for wearing union buttons. The ALJ sustained an objection to the testimony. King's testimony was of doubtful relevance: the issuance was not how an NLRB official, speaking without authorization or full knowledge of the facts, characterized Pay'n Save's actions, but whether those actions were lawful.

(2) The ALJ sustained the relevancy objection to admission of the July 1, 1978 petition discussed earlier. That petition, signed by twelve employees several weeks after the discharge of Frederick and Berry, stated that the employees had signed the union cards only as a step towards an election, not to indicate a decision in favor of the union. Pay'n Save argues that the NLRB should have considered this petition as evidence that a bargaining order was inappropriate. This circuit noted recently that the NLRB may properly disregard attacks on authorization cards made after employer unfair labor practices. L'Eggs Prods. Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1350 (9th Cir. 1980).

CONCLUSION

The NLRB's order is supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole and the NLRB correctly applied the law. Accordingly, the petition to review and set aside the NLRB's order is dismissed and the order is enforced.

NLRB v. Vulcan-Hart Corporation (St. Louis Division)

642 F.2d 255 (8th Cir.) March 9, 1981—248 NLRB 1197

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Ross, Henley and McMillian, Circuit Judges

Ross, Circuit Judge: In this case the National Labor Relations Board requests this court to enforce its order of April 17, 1980, in connection with an alleged unfair labor practice held to have been committed by Richard Klohr, general manager of Vulcan-Hart Corporation of Kirkwood, Missouri, on June 22, 1979.

Vulcan-Hart manufactures commercial refrigerators in Kirkwood, Missouri. At the time of the alleged unfair labor practice about 37 of its employees were represented by Stove, Furnace, and Allied Appliance Workers Union of North America, AFL-CIO, Local 110 (the union). In 1973 Klohr offered to permit its workers to use the company lunchroom for union meetings after normal working hours. He charged the union a nominal $5 per month for this use.

From December of 1978 to May of 1979, the union and its president filed three unfair labor practice charges against Vulcan-Hart, all of which involved claims of discriminatory discharge of union employees. Each of these charges was either withdrawn or dismissed by the Regional Office. On June 13, 1979, a union meeting was held in the lunchroom. Klohr was outside the meeting room writing on a clipboard and appeared to write down each employee's name as he left. The president of the union, on June 21, 1979, filed another unfair labor practice charge alleging illegal surveillance of union activities by Klohr at the June 13 meeting.

Klohr received notice and a copy of this latest 8(a)(1) charge on June 22, 1979. He then left his office and, according to the testimony of a Mr. Opelz, approached union Vice-President Leroy Miller and said:

> * * * "There will be no more union meetings in the lunchroom." Leroy just looked at him and he said, "I mean it. There will be no more union meetings in the lunchroom."

Thereafter no union meetings were held in the lunchroom and the union filed a charge alleging violations of 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act. The Board upheld the charge and ordered the company to permit its employees to use the lunchroom for its meetings as before and to post an appropriate notice.

We agree with the Board that the evidence is substantial that the termination of the right of the employees to hold union meetings in the lunchroom resulted from Klohr's anger at the filing of the June 21 8(a)(1) charge. We therefore uphold the Board's determination that the retaliatory action by Klohr was in violation of the Act.

However, our function "in a case such as this is to determine whether the Board, acting within the compass of its power, (1) has held a proper hearing, (2) has made findings based upon substantial evidence, and (3) has ordered an appropriate remedy." NLRB v. Parkers Prairie Cooperative Creamery Ass'n, 154 F.2d 455, 457 (8th Cir. 1946). We have no problem with the first two of these prongs, but an analysis of the remedy is in order.

In Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 316, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1132, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979) the Supreme Court set forth this rule for use in determining whether or not the Board has abused its discretion in fashioning a remedy:

> We are mindful that the Board is granted broad discretion in devising remedies to undo the effects of violations of the Act, NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288, 97 L.Ed. 377; Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233, and of the principle that in the area of federal labor law "the relation of remedy to policy is peculiarly a matter for administrative competence." Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271. Nonetheless, the rule of deference to the Board's choice of remedy does not constitute a blank check for arbitrary action. The role that Congress in § 10(e) has entrusted the courts in reviewing the Board's petitions for enforcement of its orders is not that of passive conduit. See Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, supra, at 216, 85 S.Ct. at 405.

In this case the Board has ordered the company to permit the employees and the union to use the lunchroom for union meetings as in the past. There is no time limitation on the order, no mention of a possible increase in the payment made for the use of the room and no provision permitting a termination of the use either by collective bargaining or for some legitimate and necessary company purpose. It seems to permit the use of the room by the union whether it remains the collective bargaining agent for the employees or not. Under these circumstances, in our opinion, the Board abused its discretion in fashioning the remedy and some modification of the order should be made.[1]

The Board is directed to modify its order as follows:

> 1. The order regarding use of the lunchroom is limited to such period as the union is the certified bargaining agent of the employees. Because of the situation described by the company as set forth in footnote. 1, the union shall be considered the bargaining agent (for the purpose of this order only) until the Board has ruled on the case now pending.
> 2. The order may be modified by the parties as a result of collective bargaining between this union and Vulcan-Hart.
> 3. If it is finally determined that the union is still the bargaining agent of the employees, the use of the lunchroom by the union may be withdrawn by Vulcan-Hart for any legitimate, nonpretextual reason which does not involve any element of antiunion animus.

The Board is directed to amend its order and notice, and as so amended, its order is hereby enforced.

Hedison Manfacturing Company v. NLRB

643 F.2d 32 (1st Cir.), March 11, 1981—249 NLRB 791

On petition to review and cross-petition to enforce Board Order

Before ALDRICH AND WINTER,* Circuit Judges and WYZANSKI, District Judge

ALDRICH, Senior Circuit Judge: Petitioner seeks review of an extensive order of the NLRB, including an order to bargain pursuant to NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 1969, 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement. In addition to attacking the substantive findings of the administrative law judge, which the Board substantially upheld, petitioner devotes considerable space to the argument that it was denied its constitutional right to a fair trail. We find its contention unreal, and affirm.

The hearing was scheduled to begin on August 28, 1978. On August 23 Board counsel, by registered mail, served a subpoena ad testificandum on petitioner's principal officer, Harry Hedison, directing him to appear at the hearing in Providence, Rhode Island on August 28 at 10 a.m. Because of settlement negotiations throughout the 28th, the hearing did not commence that day. On the morning of August 29 Hedison was called as Board counsel's first witnesses.[1] There was silence. Upon questioning by the ALJ, petitioner's counsel (hereinafter, counsel) stated that he had not seen the subpoena until that morning; that a plant employee must have picked it up; that he had not instructed Hedison to be present; and that in his opinion the subpoena, being for August 28, was void so far as the 29th was concerned. At the same time counsel did not contradict Board counsel's statement that he had told counsel on August 28 that he planned to call Hedison the next day. There is no indication that counsel demurred. In fact, elsewhere in the record, counsel stated that he had asked Board counsel for names, so that company personnel could be scheduled. Further dialogue adduced that "Mr. Hedison yesterday and this morning * * * is engaged in a major business transaction," and that his attendance could be arranged "at a mutually convenient time," although counsel could not reach him to say just when.[2]

[1] In its brief Vulcan-Hart indicates that the union no longer represents the employees. It indicates that it has withdrawn recognition from the charging party and that the case is presently pending before the Board. Since this is outside the record, we have no way of knowing the true situation and refer to it only as an allegation of one of the parties.

*Of the Fourth Circuit, sitting by designation.

Of the District of Massachusetts, sitting by designation.

[1] Petitioner in its brief describes this order of witnesses as "trial tactics," as if to suggest it was not Board counsel's aboslute right.

Asked by the ALJ if Hedison could be produced the following morning, counsel replied, "I didn't say tomorrow morning, Your Honor. I know I could have Mr. Hedison here tomorrow," either morning or afternoon. Pressed for which it would be, counsel replied, "I will go further than that, Your Honor, and say that absent—possibly I will have him here tomorrow morning. I don't see any problem with that." The ALJ replied that it would be satisfactory to have Hedison appear as soon in the day as he could terminate his appointments.

The next morning counsel appeared without Hedison, stated that he did not intend to "assist" Board counsel in "trying my case by way of rebuttal before he's put his own case on," and stated that he would not produce Hedison until petitioner's own case was reached. Board counsel did nothing further to compel Hedison's attendance, but when the time came the ALJ refused to accept him as a witnesses in petitioner's case, invoking the principle of Bannon Mills, Inc., 1964, 146 NLRB 611, a case we have already endorsed. NLRB v. C. H. Sprague & Son, 1970, 428 F.2d 938, 942.

This exclusion was clearly warranted. Initially, we would have doubts whether the subpoena was, in fact, defective. See United States v. Snyder, 9 Cir., 1969, 413 F.2d 288, cert. denied, 396 U.S. 907, 90 S.Ct. 223, 24 L.Ed.2d 183. Still more do we question petitioner's statement in its brief, repeated orally, that "There is no evidence in our case that Mr. Hedison would not have appeared and testified on August 28, if trial had convened * * *." Counsel forgets that he had already put in the record not only that Hedison made no attempt to comply on August 28, but that he had had the same business engagement.

Even were we disposed to grant petitioner the benefit of a technicality, any defect was waived by counsel's representation that he would produce Hedison the next day. The natural effect was to induce Board counsel not to issue a new subpoena, or to seek court enforcement of the old. Basic fairness and the orderly conduct of a hearing require at least a modicum of candor and good faith. See generally United States v. Bryan, 1950, 339 U.S. 323, 330–35, 70 S.Ct. 724, 730–32, 94 L.Ed. 884. Such were conspicuously lacking here.

The imposition of the Bannon Mills principle was classically called for. A subpoena is not a suggestion to appear when mutually convenient, nor is it "an invitation to a game of hare and hounds, in which the witness must testify only if cornered at the end of the chase." United States v. Bryan, ante, 339 U.S. at 331, 70 S.Ct. at 730. Petitioner's conduct reminds us of our language in NLRB v. C.H. Sprague & Sons, ante, 428 F.2d at 942:

> "[T]he company's intransigence gave the trial examiner ample justification for his ruling made in the interest of maintaining the integrity of the hearing process."

Its further contention that instead of invoking Bannon Mills, Board counsel should have delayed the proceedings further by seeking court enforcement of its subpoena, 29 U.S.C. § 161, is frivolous. If Board counsel needed Hedison's testimony, that course was open to it, but petitioners is in no position to compel the choice. Equally frivolous is petitioner's assertion that Board counsel's decision deprived it of the opportunity to contest the subpoena. Under Board rules, petitioner had the right to petition the ALJ to revoke the subpoena, and the ALJ "shall revoke the subpoena * * * if for any * * * reasons sufficient in law the subpoena is [2] In view of our awarding counsel fees to the Board in this case we take the space to note that during oral argument we asked counsel what would have been the effect of this major business transaction on Hedison's being able to appear on the 28th, if needed, and he replied that Hedison was on call three miles away.

* * * invalid." 29 C.F.R. 102.31(b). Instead, counsel contended himself with the statement that in his opinion "the subpoena by its own terms is void, and there would be no point in my moving to quash it." There is a point, and we must hope petitioner gets it.

Petitioner's recalcitrance contained. Board counsel subpoenaed a tape, made by petitioner, of a speech by its vice president, one O'Brien, which the Board's complaint averred included statements amounting to unfair labor practices. Petitioner declined to produce the tape, and Bannon Mills was again invoked against it. The first ground advanced by petitioner for nonproduction, that the tape was the work product of counsel, defies comment. As to the second, that the employes who heard the talk must testify first, it should suffice to quote from petitioner's brief.

> "[T]he tape was * * * not the best evidence but rather secondary evidence. In short, it was and remains Hedison's position that General Counsel had the obligation of producing affirmative evidence through witnesses that illegal conduct had taken place in the course of O'Brien's speech on March 1 * * *. These witnesses should have been required to testify under oath, thus exposing or establishing their credibility."

We find no more merit to petitioner's remaining procedural arguments. Its assertion that it was entitled to statements made to Board counsel by employees who never testified evidences invincible ignorance of our repeated holdings to the contrary. P.S.C. Resources, Inc. v. NLRB, 1 Cir., 1978, 576 F.2d 380, 387 and cases cited; see NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 1978, 437 U.S. 214, 236–42, 98 S.Ct. 2311, 2323–26, 57 L.Ed. 159. Its claim, as a matter of due process, to notes made but not referred to on the stand by witnesses who did testify likewise comes too late. Goldman v. United States, 1942, 316 U.S. 129, 132, 62 S.Ct. 993, 994, 86 L.Ed. 1322; see F.R.Ev. 612.

On matters of substance, we have reviewed the findings, and need only say that petitioner has seemingly lost sight of the fact that we do not reverse credibility findings, or choices between reasonable inferences, in routine cases. This is not changed by petitioner's claim of bias on the part of the ALJ. Its charge that his rulings are "evidence of a state of mind which had gone far beyond dislike of a party and had become an advocate of the Union" is not only baseless; it is offensive. Cf. Scully Signal Co. v. Electronics Corp. of America, 1 Cir., 1977, 570 F.2d 355, 363, cert. denied, 436 U.S. 945, 98 S.Ct. 2848, 56 L.Ed.2d 787. Even had the ALJ's rulings in fact been erroneous, a judicial ruling made in the ordinary course is not to be translated into bias by disappointed counsel. Johnson v. Trueblood, 3 Cir., 1980, 629 F.2d 287, 291; Gallarelli v. United States, 1 Cir., 1958, 260 F.2d 259, 261, cert. denied, 359 U.S. 938, 79 S.Ct. 654, 3 L.Ed.2d 638. In fact, the ALJ's conduct was proper throughout.

As to the Gissel Packing Co. order to bargain, there were far too many established unfair labor practices for us to question the Board's decision.

Finally, since this is experienced counsel, the totally frivolous nature of the contentions leads us to conclude that the petition was filed only for purposes of delay. We remind counsel of F.R.Civ.P. 11, a reminder that we shall not, and trust that he will not, forget. Costs will be taxed in favor of the Board, to include counsel fees and all expenses. General Tire & Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 1 Cir., 1971, 451 F.2d 257, 259. The petition is denied, and the order will be enforced.

On petition to review Board Order

Before SCHROEDER and CANBY, Circuit Judges and PFAELZER, District Judge*

934

CANBY, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board found that McDonnell Douglas had committed unfair labor practices in violation of §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (3), by firing Robert Mourning for union activity and by warning Malcolm Campbell not to become involved in union activity. McDonnell Douglas petitioned this court for review under § 10(f) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(f). The Board cross-petitioned for enforcement of its order to cease the unfair labor practices and to reinstate Mourning with back pay. Mourning intervened in support of the Board. We enforce the Board's order.

*The Honorable Mariana R. Pfaelzer, United States District Judge, Central District of California, sitting by designation.

I.

McDonnell Douglas employed five transport pilots, including Mourning and Campbell, to ferry company executives and other persons between company facilities in southern California. The transport pilots also flew "chase" missions, photo missions, test flights, and instruction flights for new company pilots. Usually, the transport pilots flew alone, but some flights required a copilot. The transport pilots therefore alternated as pilots in command and copilots; their job required that they serve in each position at different times. Mourning usually flew as pilot in command. On approximately five percent of his fights as pilot in command, he had a copilot. Otherwise, he flew without a crew. On another five percent of his flights, he was accompanied by a pilot trainee. Occasionally, he was accompanied by a photographer or observer.

Mourning because interested in organizing a pilots' union in late 1967. He talked to his fellow pilots about organizing, and mailed them literature from the Airline Pilots Association. He also talked about the union to his supervisor, Orion Quinn. He approached company officials to talk about working conditions. At a meeting in mid-1968, A.G. Heimerdinger, director of flight operations, told Mourning that if he did not like the way the company was being run, he should leave. In May 1968, Heimerdinger sent a memo to the company president to advise him that the pilots were organizing. In June 1968, another memo written by the company's assistant supervisor of labor relations identified Mourning as one of three pilots behind the union movement.

Mourning was fired on November 15, 1968. Heimerdinger told him that he was fired because he had blown out two vacuum pumps during a flight on the preceding September 30. Heimerdinger said the incident was "a matter of misoperation of the aircraft which involved safety considerations." During the September 30 flight, two vacuum pumps had failed. Mourning was pilot in command of the plane but a copilot had actually operated the controls. Mourning reported the failure to company mechanics, and the vacuum pumps were replaced. The mechanics also found scorched paint on the engine cowling, suggesting overheating. Heimerdinger ordered a complete inspection of the plane, but no other damage was found. Mourning was not reprimanded at that time.

After Mourning's discharge, Quinn told Campbell not to get involved in the "politics" that was stirring up the pilots. Quinn said that if Campbell just did his job and avoided the "malcontents", he would be better off in the long run. Quinn told Campbell that the order to fire Mourning had come "from the top," and that if Mourning had not been so open about the union, he would not have been fired. Within 30 days of Mourning's discharge, Campbell blew out vacuum pumps on two separate planes, but he was not discharged. On other occasions, pilots blew out tires during landings, flew planes into power lines, and ran planes into fixed objects on the ground, but none of the pilots was fired as a result.

Mourning filed an unfair labor practice charge against McDonnell Douglas. An administrative law judge found that Mourning and Campbell were supervisors who were not protected by the Act. The Board affirmed the ALJ's decision and dismissed the complaint. 221 N.L.R.B. 1180 (1975). On appeal, the D.C. Circuit remanded to the Board to consider whether Mourning's crew ever consisted of persons who were "employees" withing § 2(3) of the Act or were merely pilots of equal rank. Mourning v. NLRB, 559 F.2d 768 (D.C. Cir. 1977). On remand, the Board decided that Mourning and Campbell were not supervisors because they exercised authority only over other pilots like themselves, and that in any event the exercise of this authority was too sporadic and routine to make them supervisors. The Board then found that McDonnell Douglas had used the vacuum pump incident as a pretext to fire Mourning, and that his discharge was really intended to discourage union activity. It therefore found that McDonnell Douglas violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) by firing Mourning. The Board also found that Quinn's comments to Campbell were a warning not to engage in union activity and therefore violated § 8(a)(1).

II.

The initial issue in this case may be simply stated: Are Mourning and Campbell supervisors? If they are, then they are not entitled to the protections of § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, and the employer, McDonnell Douglas, may fire Mourning for any reason or for no reason. Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 1379, 1382 (9th Cir. 1976). The evidence focused on Mourning's status. The Board found that Mourning was not a supervisor. We must accept that decision if it is supported by the record and has a reasonable basis in law. NLRB v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 322 U.S. 111, 131, 64 S.Ct. 851, 860, 88 L.Ed. 1170 (1944); Laborers & Hod Carriers, Local No. 341 v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 834, 837 (9th Cir. 1977).

The definition of supervisor is found in § 2(11) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11):

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or reponsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

A worker who uses independent judgment to exercise any one of the listed powers in the interest of the employer is a supervisor. Walla Walla Union-Bulletin v. NLRB, 631 F.2d 609, 613 (9th Cir. 1980); Arizona Public Service Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 228, 230 (9th Cir. 1971); NLRB v. Fullerton Publishing Co., 283 F.2d 545, 548 (9th Cir. 1960). For our purposes, a supervisor is one who uses independent judgment responsibly to direct other employees in the interest of the employer.

The definition of "supervisor" in § 2(11) depends upon the meaning of "other employees." McDonnell Douglas argues that "other employees" should be given its everyday meaning, i.e., other persons who work for the employer. Such a definition would include the copilots who flew with Mourning when he was pilot in command. That would make Mourning a supervisor, since to some extent he directed his copilots when he was pilot in command.

The NLRB, however, accepted the invitation of the District of Columbia Circuit and held that "employees" in section 2(11) must be defined as provided in § 2(3), 29 U.S.C. § 152(3). That definition states:

> § 2. Definitions.
> When used in this subchapter—
> * * * * *
> 936
> (3) The term "employee" shall include any employee * * * but shall not include * * * any individual employed as a supervisor * * *.

With this definition in effect, it cannot sensibly be maintained that Mourning is a supervisor by reason of his authority over his fellow pilots. The reason for that conclusion is that if Mourning is a supervisor, then so must his copilots be supervisors. Mourning and his fellow pilots serve interchangeably as pilots in command and copilots. If they are all supervisors, they cannot be "employees" by reason of § 2(3). That would mean that the pilots would be supervisors with no employees to supervise. Yet § 2(11) defines "supervisor" as one who exercises authority over "employees." Defining the pilots as "supervisors" therefore becomes a logical impossibility under the Act. The escape from this logical dilemma is to hold, as the Board did, that in their relation to each other, the pilots are employees and not supervisors.

We agree with the Board's conclusion that "employees" as used in § 2(11) must be defined in accordance with § 2(3). In addition to the logical difficulties attending the contrary approach, there are several reasons why we believe the Board was correct and McDonnell Douglas wrong. The first arises from the plain words of § 2. All of the definitions, including that of "employee", apply to the terms "when used in this subchapter." Section 2(11) is not only in the same subchapter, it is in the very same definitional section containing § 2(3). It seems highly likely that Congress, in constructing this definitional section, would intend that the defined terms interrelate.[1]

[1] As stated in the text, § 2(11) refers to supervisory authority over "other employees." Our conclusion that "employees" is defined by § 2(3) does not render the word "other" superfluous; its import, however imperfectly stated, is to require that the supervisory authority be exercised over other employees of the same employer. Mourning v. NLRB, 559 F.2d 768, 770 n.3 (D.C. Cir. 1977); Illinois State Journal-Register, Inc. v. NLRB, 412 F.2d 37, 43–44 (7th Cir. 1969).

We reject the argument of McDonnell Douglas that the Board's ruling would render a company president who supervised only supervisors an

It is true that the § 2(3) definition of "employees" was held not to limit the power of the Board under § 10(c) to order "such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees * * *, as will effectuate the policy of this Act." Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 61 S.Ct. 845, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). In that case, however, the Court found that the broad purposes of § 10(c) militated in favor of permitting the Board to reinstate strikers who had found equivalent employment even though they would be excluded from the definition of "employee" provided by § 2(3). No such policy reasons exist in the present case to overcome the usual presumption that the plain words of § 2 mean what they say.

Indeed, the policies underlying the Act militate in favor of applying the definition of § 2(3) in the present case. It is important for the Board not to construe supervisory status too broadly, for a worker who is deemed to be a supervisor loses his organizational rights. Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 1151, 1158 (7th Cir.) cert. denied, 400 U.S. 831, 91 S.Ct. 63, 27 L.Ed.2d 62 (1970). The purpose of excluding supervisors from the protection granted bvy the Act to employees is that the status of the two groups in relation to each other is fundamentally inconsistent. Supervisors are not included in the bargaining unit of employees because their supervisory function would create conflicts of interest in dealing with employees in the unit. H.R. Rep.No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 14 (1947). No such representational conflict occurs when one pilot deals with another pilot whose relationship to management is exactly the same as his own. In this case, Mourning and the other pilots were equals, each of whom had the job of serving interchangeably as pilot in command and as copilot. As equals, they all had to be regarded as supervisors or all as employees. If supervisors, they were excluded from the benefits of the Act, even though there was no representational conflict to justify the exclusion. The Board chose the better alternative of treating them all as employees and bringing them within the protection of the Act.

McDonnell Douglas argues that this result is contrary to a trilogy of the Board's prior decisions. In Douglas Aircraft Co., 207 N.L.R.B. 682 (1973), McDonnell Aircraft Co., 207 N.L.R.B. 684 (1973), and Lockheed-California Co., 207 N.L.R.B. 686 (1973), the Board held that pilots in command who flew regularly with non-pilot crews were supervisors. Our review of the record substantiates the Board's finding that Mourning did not exercise supervisory authority over non-pilot crew members. Consequently, we do not see an inconsistency between the result in this case and the Board's decisions in the trilogy.

This case is different from the trilogy in three respects. First, Mourning did not fly regularly with non-pilot crews when he was pilot in command. He had a copilot on five percent of his flights. Otherwise, he flew without a crew. McDonnell Douglas argues that Mourning was accompanied by a pilot trainee on five percent of his flights. The Board has consistently held, however, that an instructor-trainee relationship is different from a supervisor-employee relationship. See Rub-R Engraving Co., 89 N.L.R.B. 475 (1950); Petroleum Helicopters, Inc., 184 N.L.R.B. 60 (1970); Ball Plastics Division, 228 N.L.R.B. 633 (1977). McDonnell Douglas also argues that Mourning flew with photographers and observers. The record does show that Mourning occasionally carried a photographer or observer on his flights. The Board found, however, that these employees were mere passengers, not members of Mourning's crew. Authority exercised by a pilot over passengers is not supervisory authority. Mourning v. NLRB, 559 F.2d at 771 n.4.

Second, Mourning did not exercise the same type of authority over his copilots as the trilogy pilots did over their crew members. In the trilogy, the pilots exercised supervisory authority in the true sense of the word. The pilots assigned duties to crew members, and on overnight flights decided when the crew worked and when they took time off. In this case, however, Mourning's authority stemmed from his professional expertise. He exercised only the authority needed to insure the safety of the airplane, passengers, and crew. Such authority is an intrinsic part of any pilot's job. Taken alone, it does not necessarily prove that Mourning is a supervisor. See Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, 538 F.2d at 1384; NLRB v. Doctors' Hospital, 489 F.2d 772, 776 (9th Cir. 1973).

"employee" within the meaning of the Act. To qualify as a supervisor, it is only necessary that a person supervise statutory "employees" directly or indirectly through a chain of command.

Finally, the Board held that even if Mourning's authority over his copilots were supervisory in nature, it was too sporadic to permit a finding that he was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. We believe that substantial evidence in the record supports that ruling. Mourning flew with a copilot only about 5% of his overall flight time. Such an infrequent exercise of supervisory authority may reasonably be viewed as insufficient to render § 2(11) applicable. Plastic Workers Union v. NLRB, 369 F.2d 226, 230 (7th Cir. 1966); see NLRB v. Lindsay Newspapers, Inc., 315 F.2d 709,712 (5th Cir. 1963). This is particularly true when the occasional direction is exercised over fellow workers of equal rank. NLRB v. Doctors' Hospital, 489 F.2d at 776; see NLRB v. Security Guard Services, Inc., 384 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1967). Consequently, we do not believe that adherence to the trilogy dictates a decision in favor of McDonnell Douglas in this case.

III.

Once the Board decided that Mourning and Campbell were not supervisors, it faced the question whether McDonnell Douglas had committed the alleged unfair labor practices. We agree that McDonnell Douglas's actions in this case violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the Act.

The Board found that McDonnell Douglas had fired Mourning because of his union activity. Specifically, the Board found that the vacuum pump incident was merely a pretext for his discharge. We agree. Heimerdinger said that he discharged Mourning because the vacuum pump incident demonstrated his inattention to safety considerations. Yet Mourning was regarded as a competent pilot by his fellow pilots and by Quinn, his immediate superior. Heimerdinger did not reprimand Mourning immediately after the incident. In fact, Heimerdinger granted Mourning a merit increase in pay after the incident occurred. Other pilots who were guilty of the same or worse conduct were not fired. We think the Board was clearly justified in concluding that Heimerdinger seized upon the vacuum pump incident to rid himself of Mourning. McDonnell Douglas officials were concerned about union activity among the pilots. Mourning had been identified as one of three pilots behind the union movement. Quinn even told Campbell that Mourning would not have been fired if he had not been so open about his union activities. The Board could not avoid the conclusion that Mourning's union activity was the "moving cause" behind his discharge. Stephenson v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 1210, 1213 (9th Cir. 1980).

McDonnell Douglas argues that it was improper for the Board to make this finding without remanding to the ALJ for credibility findings. We disagree. First, McDonnell Douglas never clearly asked the Board for this relief. In any event, the Board did not act improperly. Contrary to McDonnell Douglas' contention, the Board did not proceed on the erroneous assumption that there was no contradiction in testimony over the ultimate question of antiunion animus. Instead, the Board found sufficient facts established by uncontradicted testimony to permit it readily to conclude that Mourning was discharged for his union activity, and to reject as pretextual the explanations offered by company officials. There was no need in this instance to remand for credibility findings; the Board was free to draw its own inferences from the record NLRB. v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 572 F.2d 1343, 1347 (9th Cir. 1978; See Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1079, (9th Cir. 1977). Its opinion clearly sets forth the inferences it drew and the substantial evidentiary bases for them.

The Board also interpreted Quinn's comments to Campbell as a warning not to engage in union activity. That finding was similarly within the power of the Board and was supported by substantial evidence. We will therefore not set it aside. NLRB v. Ayer Lar Sanitarium, 436 F.2d 45, 48 (9th Cir. 1970).

We conclude that the Board committed no error and that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports its findings that McDonnell Douglas' actions violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The petition to review and set aside the Board's order is denied, and enforcement of the Board's order is granted.

Service Employees International Union Local 250, AFL—CIO v. NLRB

640 F.2d 1042 (9th Cir.), March 12, 1981

On petition to review Board Order

Before DUNIWAY and KENNEDY, Circuit Judges, and CURTIS,* District Judge

KENNEDY, Circuit Judge: The primary question here is whether an earlier judgment by a Court of Appeals precludes adjudicating other legal aspects of the dispute in further proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board [Board]. The Board, the Union and the employer were previously before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on the Union's petition to review an order determining that the employer committed an unfair labor practice, and on the Board's and the employer's cross-petitions. The judgment was in favor of the employer, reversing the Board's finding that an unfair labor practice had occurred. Service Employees Int'l Union Local 250 v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 930 (D.C.Cir. 1979). The Union then went back to the Board. The Union contended that the Court of Appeals' decision was limited to a determination that the employer had not committed unfair labor practices under sections 8(a)(1), (4) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (4) and (5) (1976), and that the Court had not adjudicated a Union claim that the employer had also violated section 8(a)(3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976). The Board declined jurisdiction, and the Union now petitions us to order the Board to rule whether the employer has violated section 8(a)(3). We agree with the Board that it lacked jurisdiction to rule on the charge.

The underlying dispute arose in 1974, and the facts are set forth in the first case. 600 F.2d at 933–35. In essence, the employer, E. H. Limited, warned its employees not to leave work to attend a Board representation hearing, although the employer did offer to allow one employee representative to attend. Despite the directive, thirteen employees left work to attend the hearing. They were dismissed for their unauthorized absence from work.

The employees filed charges with the Board, alleging violations of sections 8(a)(1),(3), (4) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Board ruled that the employer had violated sections 8(a)(1), (4) and (5). In a footnote, the Board expressly declined to pass on the alleged section 8(a)(3) violation. The Board said:

> However, in view of our findings above we need not decide whether, in the circumstances here, Respondent's discharge of the 13 employees violated Sec. 8(a)(3) as well as Sec. 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act. Furthermore, we believe it important to stress that our decision here protecting the right of employees to attend Board hearings does not rest at all upon whether that right is exercised alone or in concert.

E. H. Limited d/b/a Earringhouse Imports, 227 N.L.R.B. 1107, 1109 n.9 (1977). The dissenting members of the Board explicitly found that the alleged section 8(a)(3) violation was "clearly without merit." Id. at 1114–15 n.25.

Although the Board awarded the Union most of its requested relief, the Union petitioned the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for modification and enforcement of the order. The Union specifically claimed that the Board had erred by not deciding the section 8(a)(3) question and by incorrectly computing the amount of back pay awarded for the other violations. The employer and the Board filed cross-petitions, and the actions were consolidated.

The Court of Appeals granted the employer's petition for review and vacated the Board's order, concluding that the Board had erred in finding violations of sections 8(a)(1), (4) and (5). With respect to the Union's claim that the Board erred in not deciding the section 8(a)(3) contention, the court was less clear. In denying the Union's petition for review and enforcement, it said:

> Since No. 77-1165 [the Union's petition] involves only an alleged error as to the date back pay should become effective and whether the discharge of the thirteen employees violated § 8(a)(3) of that Act, and by reason of the conclusions herein reached we deem it unnecessary to give further consideration to No. 77-1165 for the reason that our action in No. 77-1630 [the employer's petition] will render the back pay issue moot.

Service Employees Int'l Union, Local 250 v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 930, 932 n.4 (D.C.Cir.1979). The court did not remand any portion of the case to the Board.

*Honorable Jesse W. Curtis, Senior United States District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

The Union petitioned the court for rehearing and suggested the appropriateness of a rehearing en banc. In its petition the Union claimed, among other things, that "the panel failed to consideir the position considered by this petitioner that the employees [sic] concerted activity mandating protection under § 8(a)(3). [¶] This Petition for Rehearing and Suggestion of Hearing En Banc is directed to the elements of the case totally ignored by the panel which consider [sic] only the implications of § 8(a)(4)." The Court of Appeals denied both the rehearing petition and the suggestion for rehearing en banc on May 31, 1979. No certiorari petition was directed to the Supreme Court.

The Union then promptly went before the Board and moved to "reopen [the] case in order to conclude the remaining allegation." The Board denied this motion, finding that the Court of Appeals, by not remanding the matter, had "concluded" the case and had left the Board with "no authority at this time to consideir the merits of Section 8(a)(3) allegation of the complaint." The Union now petitions this court to direct the Board to hear its section 8(a)(3) claim.

The Union contends the Board still retains jurisdiction to hear the section 8(a)(3) claim. It asserts that since the Court of Appeals' opinion speaks of mootness of back pay in its footnote four, an issue concededly irrelevant to the section 8(a)(3) claim, the court's opinion must be interpreted as having reserved the claim for later Board consideration. The employer contends this interpretation is inconsistent with the Court of Appeals' failure to order a remand, especially after the Union in its failure to address the section 8(a)(3) claim.

A preclusive effect in the Court of Appeals' mandate is fairly implied from the scope of its jurisdiction and the wording of its judgment. In section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), Congress provided that "[u]pon the filing of the record with [the Court of Appeals] the jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree shall be final * * *. In International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, Local Nos. 15, 17, 107, 108 & 111 v. Eagle-Picher Mining & Smelting Co., 325 U.S. 335, 65 S.Ct. 1166, 89 L.Ed 1649 (1945), the Court addressed the effect of a "final" judgment of a Court of Appeals.[1] The Court said:

> We are not dealing here with an administrative proceeding. That proceeding has ended and has been merged in a decree of a court pursuant to the directions of the National Labor Relations Act. The statute provides that if, in the enforcement proceeding, it appears that any further facts should be developed the court may remand the cause to the Board for the taking of further evidence and for further consideration. (§ 10(e).) But it is plain that the scheme of the Act contemplates that when the record has been made and is finally submitted for action by the Board, the judgment "shall be final." It is to have all the qualities of any other decree entered in a litigated cause upon full hearing, and is subject to review by this court on certiorari as in other cases. (§ 10(e) supra).

Id. at 339, 65 S.Ct. at 1168 (footnote omitted). See also Greater Boston Television Corp. v. FCC, 463 F.2d 268, 287–89 (D.C.Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 950, 92 S.Ct. 2042, 32 L.Ed.2d 338 (1972); NLRB v. Wilder Mfg. Co., 454 F.2d 995, 997–98 (D.C.Cir. 1971). We think it follows from this that, absent an order to remand or some express qualification in the judgment, finality is presumed.

When the Union originally petitioned the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, it sought a ruling that the Board erred when it declined to pass on the section 8(a)(3) claim. See, e.g., United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, 405 F.2d 1373, 1377 (D.C.Cir.1968). It was open to the Court of Appeals to remand the case to the Board for further proceedings on the section 8(a)(3) claim if the court saw any merit to that contention. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 305 U.S. 364, 373–74, 59 S.Ct. 301, 306–07, 83 L.Ed. 221 (1939); National Labor Relations Act §§ 10(e), (f), 29 U.S.C. §§ 160(e), (f) (1976). The failure to remand implies a determination that the stipulated facts presented no violation of section 8(a)(3) and the court's written disposition supports this conclusion. After acknowledging that the Union sought adjudication of the alleged section 8(a)(3) violation, the court stated that "by reason of the conclusions herein reached, we deem it unnecessary to give further consideration to [the Union's petition] * * *." 600 F.2d at 932 n.4. This language and the failure to remand are construed most reasonably as a determination that no section 8(a)(3) violation was presented.[2] On such a reading, the court's opinion was final under sections 10(e) and (f), and barred further proceedings arising from the same transaction under the doctrine of res judicata. Eagle-Picher, 325 U.S. at 340, 65 S.Ct. at 1168. See also Montana v. Federal Power Comm'n, 561 F.2d 344, 348 & n.39 (D.C.Cir.1977); Greater Boston Television Corp., 463 F.2d at 290–91.

[1] Eagle-Picher involved section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), whereas the Union here petitioned the District of Columbia Court of Appeals for enforcement under section 10(f), 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976). Section 10(f), however, provides that "the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Board under subsection (e) of this section, and shall have the same jurisdiction [to grant interim relief], and in like manner to make and enter a decrees * * *." Thus, the preclusive effect of a decree entered under section 10(f) is no less than that under section 10(e).

The Union responds by saying that the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit was without jurisdiction to determine the existence of a section 8(a)(3) violation, and cites NLRB v. Food Store Employees Union, Local 347, 417 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974) for the proposition that a Court of Appeals may not enlarge the scope of an agency's order. In Food Store Employees, the Court of Appeals had said the Board had abused its discretion by omitting a specific remedy, and the court instructed the Board to enter an order accordingly. In reversing, the Supreme Court said that "remand to the agency for reconsideration, and not enlargement of the agency order, is ordinarily the reviewing court's proper course." Id. at 10. See also South Prairie Constr. Co. v. Local 627, Int'l Union of Operating Eng'rs, 425 U.S. 800, 805–06, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 1844–45, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976) (per curiam). There are at least two reasons why we find Food Store Employees inapposite. First, although a court may correct or modify its own mandate, Greater Boston Television Corp., 463 F.2d at 276–80; 28 U.S.C. § 2106 (1976), we conclude that it is more consonant with notions of comity, if not actually required, that a party dissatisfied with the mandate apply to the issuing court for correction or interpretation, see Bergh v. Washington, 535 F.2d 505 (9th Cir. 1976); Brittingham v. Commissioner, 451 F.2d 315 (5th Cir. 1971), or seek appellate review, see Eagle-Picher, 325 U.S. at 339, 65 S.Ct. at 1168; Chicago & N.W. Trans. Co. v. United States, 574 F.2d 926, 930 (7th Cir. 1978). Here, the alleged error was called to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals' attention in the Union's rehearing petition, and when the court declined to correct it, its judgment became final. Second, and more important, the doctrine in the Food Store Employees case is not inconsistent with the judgment of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Food Store Employees establishes that a court should defer to the Board in fashioning remedies for unfair labor practices. This is analytically distinct from deciding that a stipulated set of facts does not constitute a violation of a statute such as section 8(a)(3). The latter is within the province of the judiciary in our section of separate powers, and we believe that the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit observed its proper judicial function in its earlier disposition of this case.

The petition for review is denied.

[2] Without reaching the merits of the section 8(a)(3) violation, we note that it is not unreasonable to assume that the Court of Appeals ruled against the Union on this point. To begin with, that holding would be consistent with the result the court reached as to the other portions of the statute. Second, there is respectable existing authority to support such a conclusion. It is, for example, well settled that, except in the rarest of cases, some proof of anti-union animus is necessary to establish a violation of section 8(a)(3). See R. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law 137–38 (1976). The District of Columbia Court of Appeals, however, found this element lacking. "[I]n the case before us . . . there is not the slightest intimation of animous [towards] union activity." Service Employee Int'l Union, Local 250 v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 930, 936 n.17 (D.C.Cir.1979).

[1] Reported at 244 N.L.R.B. No. 19.

Board's cross-application for enforcement raise issues concerning the supportability of findings of violations of Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act and the appropriateness of remedy.

The company manufactures household paper products, having its central office and headquarters in Medford, Massachusetts, and a mill in Augusta, Maine, employing some 500 people, of whom approximately a dozen were office employees. The present litigation arises out of efforts by the United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO to unionize the office workers,[2] beginning in August 1976 and extending to May 1977.

Based on incidents occurring in December of 1976 and in May of 1977, the Board found that the company, through the coercive conduct of six of its supervisors, had violated § 8(a)(1) in no fewer than ten ways. In arriving at this result the Administrative Law Judge exercised considerable selectivity, dismissing in their entirety charges of coercive conduct on the part of three supervisors and dismissing particular charges attributed to four others.

THE SUPERVISOR ISSUE

The company's defenses are not only thin but leave many a salient undefended. Its first effort is to challenge the supervisory status of four of the persons charged with exercising coercion. The status of three supervisors (LaPointe, Levesque, and Lord) is nowhere put in issue. Of those selected for criticism, one (Poulin) is one of the supervisors the charges against whom the ALJ dismissed. Of the other three, the company recognizes that as to one, Greenlaw, there was specific testimony that he had the power to hire; the company's only argument is that the ALJ should have believed other witnesses. As to the other two, Jones and Bernier, there is ample evidence of supervisory, training, and disciplinary responsibilities, including that of making generally relied upon recommendations for hiring.

SECTION 8(a)(1) VIOLATIONS

The Board found that one or more of the six supervisors had engaged in the following conduct: threatening employees with reprisals if they associated with union activists; creating the impression of surveillance; threatening to discharge employees who signed union cards; encouraging an employee to withdraw her union authorization card; interrogating employees; promising benefits to employees; changing working hours; instituting a new nonmingling rule; creating other less favorable working conditions; and prohibiting the discussion of salaries.

Of these ten violations, the company has something to say about only two. It criticizes the finding that supervisor Greenlaw created the impression of surveillance and urges that Greenlaw's neutral characterization of his motives be accepted, rather than the credited testimony of an employee. Even more vulnerable is the criticism of the finding that the company engaged in the impermissible interrogation of employees.

Although the Board found that four supervisors had engaged in this activity (Bernier, LaPointe, Levesque, and Lord), the company directs its criticisms against findings relating to only two (Lord and LaPointe). Once again, its only contribution is that the supervisor should have been credited, not the subordinate. We are left with the observation that we cannot fathom why the company deemed it worth the investment to erect this kind of perforated dike against the § 8(a)(1) charges.

THE DISCHARGES

The Board also found the company in violation of § 8(a)(3) of the Act in that, first, it wrongfully discharged three employees, Harwood, Hanley, and Hill, and second, it wrongfully discharged nine employees by relocating certain office jobs from Augusta, Maine, to Medford, Massachusetts. Both issues are somewhat closer than those we have already discussed.

Our analysis is complicated by the fact that both sets of discharges involve a confrontation of an impermissible motive to get rid of reputed union activists, or to frustrate the union organizing campaign by relocating the office functions, and a permissible motive to discharge for reasons of reorganization and poor performance, or to relocate pursuant to a longstanding plan. We have set forth our approach to such dual motive cases in NLRB v.

[2] The union had represented all production employees during the prior 8½ years the company had owned the mill. It had also just been certified, following a consent election, as bargaining agent for a few laboratory employees.

Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979), requiring the Board to demonstrate a "'significant" improper motivation" for a discharge and then requiring "the employer to prove that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce the discharge." Id. at 671. In so deciding we accepted as relevant guides the non-labor cases of Mt. Healthy City Board of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977) and Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District, 439 U.S. 410, 99 S.Ct. 693, 58 L.Ed.2d 619 (1979).

In 1980 the Board similarly accepted Mt. Healthy as setting the appropriate analytical framework for testing causality in § 8(a)(3) cases in Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc, 251 N.L.R.B. No. 150. Its statement of the test is as follows:

> "First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct [footnote omitted]." Lab.L.Rep. (CCH) ¶ 17,356, at 32,469 (1980).

We see no difference in formulation between the tests in Eastern Smelting and Wright Line.[3] It is of course posssible that the approaches to each step and the manner in which motives are assessed may dramatically change the coloration of the test, but at present we see Wright Line as a conscientious effort to reduce the confusion and discord in dealing with mixed motive cases.[4]

Although the Board and we now seem to be on the same analytical track in what has been a vexing area, we deal with a record predating our concord. The ALJ decided this case in March of 1979; Eastern Smelting was issued in May; the Board affirmed the ALJ in August of 1979; and it was not until a year later that Wright Line was decided. Under these circumstances, having in mind that the now prescribed burden-shifting approach was not applied, but also that a huge investment of time has already been made, we shall view the evidence as to both § 8(a)(3) issues, the discharges of the three men and the relocation of the office jobs, and ask two questions: would a fair reading permit any other conclusion than that a prima facie case of anti-union animus was proven?; and, does the record permit a finding that the company had proven by a preponderance of evidence that the three men would have been discharged and the office jobs relocated when they were, even if there had been no union activity? Our test, thus, is not the normal deferential inquiry whether the record substantially supports the Board's findings, but whether "the record in this case does not admit of the argument that petitioner would have been terminated regardless of her [protected activity]." Givhan, supra, 439 U.S. at 417 n. 5, 99 S.Ct. at 697 n. 5.

We begin with the March 31, 1977 discharges of Harwood, Hanley, and Hill. Our first inquiry is to see whether there is sufficient evidence of significant improper motivation, not based on suspicion or mere anti-union predilection, but based on direct evidence, the circumstances of discharge, or other acts.

While the circumstances of the discharge, involving sixteen others being discharged for various reasons, are perhaps ambiguous, there was direct evidence from former supervisor LaPointe that Harwood, known to have been active for the union since August of 1976, had been singled out as the principal activist. Other employees had much earlier been warned against associating with him. Incredulous that one man could cause so much activity, company managers sought more names of activists, unsuccessfully at a second meeting, finally succeeding at a third meeting in early February in learning that Hanley and Hill were also involved. LaPointe testified that the three were then listed for termination because of their own union activity. In addition to this direct evidence of animus, there were the numerous threats, interrogations, acts of surveillance, etc. that we have discussed earlier, some of them specifically relating to Harwood and directed to Hanley and Hill. We do not see how, despite Statler's prior generally amicable relationship with the union as to production and laboratory employees, the Board could have come to any other conclusion on this record than that the General Counsel had made a prima facie case of discharge for improper motive.

[3] Although our first step in this two step analysis, requires the Board to prove a "significant" anti-union reason, while Wright Line in the passage quoted speaks only of "motivating factor", the quotation marks refer to language in Mt. Healthy equating "substantial factor" and "motivating factor". 429 U.S. at 287, 97 S.Ct. at 576.

[4] The company argues at length that we differ from Wright Line in requiring the Board to shoulder the burden of proving that there would have been no discharge but for an employee's protected activity. While in cases antedating Eastern Smelting, we have used such a formulation, our unequivocal adoption in that case of the Mt. Healthy test is determinative. Our subsequent decisions have either reaffirmed our position, Texas Instruments Inc. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 1067, 1073 (1st Cir. 1979), or have dealt with cases that have not involved a weighing of good and bad reasons but rather an absence of any improper reasons, as in NLRB v. Wilson Freight Co., 604 F.2d 712 (1st Cir. 1979) and Keosaian v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 36 (1st Cir. 1980), or an absence of any legitimate reason, as in South Shore Hospital v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 40 (1st Cir. 1980). In retrospect we do view as erroneous the last sentence of our opinion in NLRB v. Borden, Inc., Borden Chemical Division, 600 F.2d 313 (1st Cir. 1979), where we assigned the burden to the Board of establishing that the employer would not have taken an action but for an improper motivation, citing Eastern Smelting, 598 F.2d at 671. The page citation there indicates the opposite, the view we now reaffirm.

As to each employee discharged, there are different reasons proffered by the company and different countering observations. Harwood, assistant plant accountant, was allegedly fired because he was not qualified for promotion to take over his supervisor's job, and had, during the previous summer, distributed confidential salary information—an act which had led to the adoption of a company rule. But he had worked for the company for 8½ years, had never been disciplined or warned, had received regular pay increases, and his superior LaPointe proclaimed him "adequate" and would have kept him. What the case against Harwood boils down to is that he should have been fired because he was not qualified for a promotion was yet to be offered [5] and because some months earlier he had done something which if done later would violate a rule. While hardly an overwhelming case, it would be open to the possibility of preponderating were it not for the direct evidence that he was the top man on the company's union hit list. This fact is so prominent that we do not see how the Board could have found that the company had carried its burden of proving that Harwood would have been fired even if he had had nothing to do with the union.

Hanley worked half time as a "pulp prep clerk" and half time as a supervisor of production employees [6] in the mill. He had been with the company for nearly four years with no evidence of poor performance. He had been warned to stay away from the office where Harwood worked. The reason given for his discharge was the elimination of his job, another foreman taking over his supervisory duties and a laboratory supervisor taking over his pulp prep duties. Despite his seniority to other production personnel, he was not allowed to take a demotion and return to production work. In light of the total absence of criticism of Hanley, and the absence of any effort to accommodate his seniority, we find the direct evidence of his joining the hit list because of his perceived involvement with union activity compelling.

Finally, Hill, a production and shipping clerk, was discharged allegedly because of his poor performance, being slow and having mental lapses. He was told, however, that the cause of his termination was a "management shuffle". He had worked receiving regular raises, for the company 4½ years without any disciplinary problems, excepting only one occasion three months earlier when, because of medication, he was sleeping on the job. Later the same month his department manager told him he had an "excellent work record" and "management potential". Two weeks before his discharge his evaluation recorded him as improving. Again, the lack of any evidence of increasing dissatisfaction proximately related to the time of his discharge, together with the cogent evidence of his being listed as a target by company management persuades us that this record could not be viewed as preponderating in favor of a discharge that would have been forthcoming without any connection to union activity.

THE RELOCATION OF OFFICE EMPLOYEES

We now consider the Board's § 8(a)(3) finding that nine office employees were wrongfully discharged when the company, because of a motive to frustrate-union organizational activity, moved their jobs from Augusta to Medford. It is the company's position that a Price Waterhouse study in 1973 recommended centralization of all office functions in Medford, that other economic demands caused the move to be postponed for four years, but that in 1977, with the anticipated renovation of a building in Medford, the plan for moving reached fruition—without impact from any anti-union impulse.

[5] Moreover, this new company standard—of being able to take the number one spot—may rightly be viewed with some skepticism since it resulted in the discharge of only activists Harwood and Hill among the entire work force.

[6] The company argues that Hanley's discharge could not be an 8(a)(3) violation because he was really a supervisor as defined by section 2(11). Not only did the Board supportably find that Hanley's supervisory duties occupied less than half of his time but were exercised in a different location among employees other than those with whom he worked in a non-supervisory status. In sharp contrast to the situation in NLRB v. Florida Agricultural Supply Co., 328 F.2d 989 (5th Cir. 1964), on which the company relies, the separation of Hanley's supervisory and non-supervisory roles was "sharply demarcated". GAF Corp. v. NLRB, 524 F.2d 492, 496 & n. 9 (5th Cir. 1975).

This is the chronology. In May of 1973 the accounting firm of Price Waterhouse & Co. submitted a report to the company recommending the merger of "the accounting departments at the Medford location" of the company's two divisions, Sugarmen Brothers and Statler Tissue. This report—or such part of it as in the record—has nothing to say about Augusta office employees. The next relevant communication was from Price Waterhouse in January of 1974, putting forward to the company three proposals for enlisting the help of Price Waterhouse, ranging in fee levels from $120,000 down to $32,000. The proposals included the opaque language that Price Waterhouse "would reorganize and consolidate the accounting functions at Statler Industries, Inc. inclusive of the Augusta facilities." If the company gave instructions to proceed, a "detailed work plan" would be established. So far as the record reveals, no further instructions were forthcoming. In the data constituting what the covering letter called a "work plan", it was specifically acknowledged that the establishment of one central corporate accounting department depended on "a higher level of sales and mix of similar operations". In March of 1974 a "Management Letter" to the company from Price Waterhouse repeated both an interest in meeting with the company's management and the caution that higher sales were a precondition of a merger of all divisional accounting departments.

What followed was silence for the remainder of 1974, 1975, and all of 1976 until December 30. On that date a confidential message was sent by Medford management to the manager of the Augusta plant that the company had decided to move all office and accounting functions to Medford when the new office complex was completed, estimated then to be in June of 1977. The message concluded with the news that Price Waterhouse would do the necessary evaluations within the next month. In fact, no such evaluations by Price Waterhouse appear.

On April 28, 1977, after the firings of Harwood, Hanley, and Hill, and after continued unionization efforts were reported to management on April 20, a notice was posted in the Augusta plant that certain functions were being relocated to Medford and that the renovation of corporate offices was expected by July. Also on April 20, at a management meeting Vice President Lombardi stated that the company would move its Augusta office functions to Medford rather than recognize the union. At another meeting in early May, hastily convened when news of renewed union activity ws received, when a colleague cautioned Lombardi that a move during a period of intense union activity might be unwise, Lombardi exploded with expletives aimed at the woman organizer who had been the subject of conversation and saying that she would not frustrate his plans. Although the renovated building was not open for occupancy until December of 1977, the company did not wait for that event but moved most of the Augusta office functions to "old corporate offices" in Medford in July and August. It did not offer jobs or transfer to any Augusta employee, despite the seniority of some and the acknowledged superiority of others.

The ALJ (and the Board) ruled: "Contrary to the contention of Respondent that the move of certain clerical functions to Medford was made pursuant to a long established plan which came to fruition in 1977, I find that the transfer of these jobs was discriminatorily motivated." This conclusion was buttressed by reference to Lombardi's April 20 statement that the company would not have a union in the Augusta accounting department; the fact that the news of renewed union activity brought Medford and Augusta executives together in early May within hours; Lombardi's expletives at the meeting; the firings of Harwood, Hanley, and Hill; the various § 8(a)(1) violations we have noted:[7] the fact that six of the nine office employees discharged were known to be involved with union activities; the fact that none were offered the opportunity to move to Medford; and the dual factors of years of inaction followed by decision in the midst of the union campaign.

[7] It is clear that in considering the events that formed the basis of the earlier § 8(a)(1) charge the ALJ had specifically in mind the teaching of Local Lodge No. 1424, IAM v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411, 80 S.Ct. 822, 4 L.Ed.2d 832 (1960) that events occurring prior to six months before the filing of a charge (September 12, 1977) may not constitute the basis of an unfair labor practice but may be used to shed light on events within the six month period.

We begin our two-step analysis by holding that the various statements made by Lombardi, the discharges of Harwood, Hill, and Hanley, the numerous threats and interrogations amply make a prima facie case of discriminatory motivation. As for the weight to be accorded to the "legitimate business reasons" represented by the Price Waterhouse recommendations, the record forecloses any other reading than that they are too insubstantial to overcome the direct and indirect evidence of a motivation to frustrate union organization of office employees.

A detailed review of the record reveals Price Waterhouse recommendations that at best constitute an invitation to plan. They are directed mainly at Medford operations which were substantially altered when the Sugarman Division was sold. They outlined several approaches involving different levels of Price Waterhouse involvement, leaving the choice up to the company—a choice that was never made. Any action was expressly conditioned on a higher level of sales. Nearly three years passed without a record reference to a single communication referring to the Price Waterhouse proposals.

At the end of December, 1976, a month in which company supervisors had engaged in widespread anti-union threats, interrogations, surveillance and other violations of § 8(a)(1), Medford management communicated in confidence to the Augusta manager its intent to move the office employees when the renovation was expected to be completed in June of 1977. No study led up to this and, despite a reference to Price Waterhouse "evaluations" to be performed during the following month, we are aware of no such work being done. Finally, although the new building did not open for occupancy until December, 1977, the company did not hesitate to post the notice of the move, shortly after learning of renewed union activity, on April 28, 1977, and utilize facilities in Medford which had always been available.

This scenario is unlike that in NLRB v. Rapid Bindery, Inc. 293 F.2d 170 (2d Cir. 1961) and cases cited therein, relied upon by the company for the proposition that a change of operations dictated by sound economic reasons does not violate § 8(a)(3) even though decision may have been accelerated by union activity. In such cases the economic necessity of an imminent change of operations had been made manifest; union demands were merely a factor indicating additional costs. We need not in the case at bar decide whether acceleration of a demonstrably economically justified decision to move an operation because of the desire to avoid further union activity would constitute a § 8(a)(3) violation, for the predicate—the legitimacy and immediacy of the underlying decision—is not established by this fragmentary record.

THE REMEDY

The company makes a final argument that the Board's remedy in requiring reestablishment at Augusta of the office and accounting jobs that it had relocated at Medford was unwarranted.[8] It asserts that the move was the result of a legitimate business decision—a proposition we have found unsubstantiated; that the relocation produced improvements in operating efficiency—an assertion without any documentation; and that a major capital investment had been made in new office facilities in Medford—another undocumented assertion with no hint as to the absolute or proportionate amount of investment properly allocable to the jobs moved from Augusta. There is not even any indication of the burden facing the company in relocating the positions.

The company has evidently lost sight of the rigorous task facing an employer or court who would set aside a remedy fashioned by the Board: to show that "the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act." Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed.2d 1568 (1943). See also Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964); NLRB v. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 396 U.S. 258, 263, 90 S.Ct. 417, 420, 24 L.Ed.2d 405 (1969).

[8] The precise words used in the Board's order were:

"(b) Reestablishment at its Augusta, Maine mill the office and accounting jobs which it relocated at Medford, Massachusetts and offer to the following employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs, or if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make each of them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered in the manner provided in the section herein entitled 'The Remedy.' Francis Harwood, Walter Hill, David Hallee, Shelly Dorr, Lynn Verrell, Arlene Brackett, Normande Beckim, William Nichols Ellen Kinney, Gerald Boulette and Julia Stevens."

In such a case as this, where a union organizational effort was found to be aborted intentionally by removing an entire office operation, restoring the status quo ante would seem to be calculated to effectuate the policies of the Act insofar as it would give the union another chance in a fair fight. Space and equipment problems would seem to be minimal. Lacking here is any evidence of unduly burdensome investment such as was required in Frito-Lay, Inc. v. NLRB, 585 F.2d 62, 68 (3d Cir. 1978) (reopening of uneconomic plant would cost one million dollars plus operating loss of several hundred thousand dollars a year); NLRB v. Townhouse T.V. & Appliance, Inc., 531 F.2d 826 (7th Cir. 1976) (small TV service company required to buy two trucks); NLRB v. American Mfg. Co. of Texas, 351 F.2d 74, 80 (5th Cir. 1965) (employer required to purchase "a new fleet of unwanted trucks"). Nor are there other factors present here which have militated against orders to resume operation: disadvantaging the very employees affected by the employer's action. Jays Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 438 (7th Cir. 1978); giving a bargaining party unfair advantage, NLRB v. American Mfg. Co. of Texas, supra; the lapse of a long period of time prior to resumption; the making whole of injured employees through other means; causing injury to an innocent third party. See generally Annotation, Propriety of NLRB Order to Resume Discontinued Operations, 42 ALR Fed. 421.

We venture to require only one modification in the terms of the Board's order, to make explicit what may perhaps be implicit. The "reestablishment" paragraph we have quoted in note 8, supra, contains no proviso recognizing the right of the company to relocate Augusta office functions "at any time in the future if it deems best for business reasons to do so and is not implelled by the intent to deny to its employees the rights conferred by the statute." NLRB v. Preston Feed Corp., 309 F.2d 346, 352 (4th Cir. 1962). Just as we did in a similar situation in NLRB v. Kelly & Picerne, Inc., 298 F.2d 895, 899 (1st Cir. 1962), we retain jurisdiction and return the case to the Board for appropriate revision of the order, after which we shall issue our mandate enforcing it.

NLRB v. Evans Plumbing Company

639 F.2d 291 (5th Cir.), March 13, 1981

On petition for summary judgment

Before HILL, FAY and ANDERSON, Circuit Judges

292

PER CURIAM: This case involves a petition by the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") for summary entry of judgment to enforce the Board's decision ordering the respondent Evans Plumbing Company ("Evans") to reinstate with back pay two employees whom it discriminatorily discharged. Evans, who filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, opposes entry of judgment on the ground that the proceedings before the NLRB should have been stayed by the automatic stay provision of the Bankruptcy Act of 1978, 11 U.S.C.A § 362(a)(1) (1979). We hold that this NLRB proceeding falls within a statutory exemption to the automatic stay provision and grant the Board's petition for summary entry of judgment.[1]

I.

On or about February 15, 1980, Evans discharged Jack T. Lee and F. J. Meeks for complaining to their union about alleged mismanagement of their vacation funds by Evans. A charge of unfair labor practices was filed and the matter set down for a hearing. On August 8, 1980, the day before the commencement of the hearing, Evans filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy in the Northern District of Alabama. On the day of the hearing, Evans' counsel appeared and moved to continue the Board proceedings in order that the bankruptcy court might determine whether the proceeding fell within the automatic stay provision of the Bankruptcy Act. Evans' motion was apparently overruled and the hearing was held. On September 30, 1980, the administrative law judge ("ALJ") found that Evans had committed an unfair labor practice by discharging Lee and Meeks and ordered them reinstated with back pay. The order was promptly transmitted to the Board to await the filing of exception by Evans. Evans failed to file any exception within the time provided by the Board's rules and regulations and the Board adopted the ALJ's decision. This petition followed.

[1] It is appropriate to dispose of this case summarily. See Groendyke Transportation, Inc. v. Davis, 5 Cir., 1969, 406 F.2d 1158.

II.

We are faced with a threshold question of first impression under the new Bankruptcy Act: whether the automatic stay provision applies to an enforcement proceeding by the NLRB. We conclude that this action falls within an exception to the automatic stay provision.

The automatic stay provision, 11 U.S.C.A. § 362 (1979), provides in part:

> (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, a petition filed under section 301, 302, or 303 of this title operates as a stay, applicable to all entities, of—
> > (1) the commencement or continuation, including the issuance or employment of process, of a judicial, administrative, or other proceeding against the debtor that was or could have been commenced before the commencement of the case under this title, or to recover a claim against the debtor that arose be> > fore the commencement of the case under this title;
> 293
> * * * * *
> (b) The filing of a petition under section 301, 302, or 303 of this title does not operate as a stay—
> * * * * *
> > (4) under subsection (a)(1) of this section, of the commencement or continuation of an action or proceeding by a governmental unit to enforce such governmental unit's police or regulatory power;
> > (5) under subsection (a)(2) of this section, of the enforcement of a judgment, other than a money judgment, obtained in an action or proceeding by a governmental unit to enforce such governmental unit's police or regulatory power;

As explained in the legislative history of the Bankruptcy Act of 1978:

> Paragraph (4) excepts commencement or continuation of actions and proceedings by governmental units to enforce police or regulatory powers. Thus, where a governmental unit is suing a debtor to prevent or stop violation of fraud, environmental protection, consumer protection, safety, or similar police or regulatory laws, or attempting to fix damages for violation of such a law, the action or proceeding is not stayed under the automatic stay. Paragraph (5) makes clear that the exception extends to permit an injunction and enforcement of an injunction, and to permit the entry of a money judgment, but does not extend to permit enforcement of a money judgment. Since the assets of the debtor are in the possession and control of the bankruptcy court, and since they constitute a fund out of which all creditors are entitled to share, enforcement by a governmental unit of money judgment would give it preferential treatment to the detriment of all other creditors.

House Report No. 95-595, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. at 343, reprinted in 1978 U.S.Code Cong. and Adm.News, 5787, 6299. See also Senate Report No. 95-989, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. p. 52, reprinted in 1978 U.S.Code Cong. and Adm.News 5787, 5838. The crucial issue is whether the NLRB is a governmental unit and whether this action is one to enforce police or regulatory powers. It is clear that the NLRB is a governmental unit. This action was undertaken to enforce the federal law regulating the relationship between employer and employee. We can safely conclude therefore that this is an exercise of police of regulatory powers which places it within the § 362(b)(4) exemption to the automatic stay.[2]

We note that our decision today would permit the entry of judgment for injunctive relief and for back pay; however, should it be necessary to enforce the judgment for back pay, a different question would be presented. We express no opinion as to whether an action to execute or enforce a money judgment would be exempt from the automatic stay.[3]

[2] Our conclusion finds some support, albeit in dicta, in two recent decisions of the Seventh and Ninth Circuits. In re Bel Air Chateau Hospital, Inc. 611 F.2d 1248 (9th Cir. 1979), and In the Matter of Shippers Interstate Service, Inc., 618 F.2d 9 (7th Cir. 1980), held that the automatic stay provisions of the old Bankruptcy Act did not operate to stay unfair labor practice proceedings before the NLRB. In In re Bel Air, the court stated:

> This result appears harmonious with the new bankruptcy law * * *. Under 11 U.S.C. § 362(a)(1) the filing of a petition will normally operate as a stay of judicial or administrative proceedings. Section 362(b)(4), however, provides that the filing of a petition does not automatically stay an action by a governmental unit to enforce the government's police or regulatory power.

III.

The Board's petition for summary entry of judgment is hereby GRANTED.

[3] Similarly, we express no opinion as to whether the bankruptcy court has power under 11 U.S.C.A. § 105(a) (1979) to issue a discretionary stay notwithstanding the exemption of the Board's action from the automatic stay. See In re King Memorial Hospital, Inc., 4 B.R. 704 (Bkrtcy.S.D.Fla.1980); and In re Bel Air Chateau Hospital, Inc., 611 F.2d at 1251.

NLRB v. Schlegel Oklahoma, Inc.

644 F.2d 842 (10th Cir.), March 13, 1981—250 NLRB 20

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before McWILLIAMS, BARRETT, and DOYLE, Circuit Judges

842

McWILLIAMS, Circuit Judge: After examining the briefs and the appellate record, this three-judge panel has determined unanimously that oral argument would not be of material assistance in the determination of this appeal. See Fed.R. App.P. 34(a); Tenth Cir. R. 10(e). The cause is therefore ordered submitted without oral argument.

This is a National Labor Relations Board enforcement proceeding. Schlegel Oklahoma, Inc., an Oklahoma corporation, maintains a place of business in Frederick, Oklahoma, where it is engaged in the manufacture and sale of perimeter sealing and molded rubber products. The present dispute arises out of the efforts of United Steelworkers of America, AFL-CIO-CLC, to organize Schlegel employees at its Frederick plant.

Charles Ingraham was employed by Schlegel at its Frederick plant from June 20, 1979, until August 15, 1979, when his employment was terminated by the company. On August 21, 1979, Ingraham and Mike Wilson, a representative of the union, were distributing handbills to Schlegel employees during a change of shifts. The handbills were notices of a meeting to be held the following day. Ingraham and Wilson were standing at the intersection of a county road and a driveway leading to the west entrance of the company plant.

While they were passing out handbills, Ingraham and Wilson were challenged by the president of the company, Richard Williams. After reading the handbill, Williams first advised Ingraham and Wilson that they were standing on company property. When Wilson disputed that fact, Williams declared that he did not want the two stopping traffic. Wilson denied that they were in anywise impeding traffic. Williams then said that if the two didn't leave, he was going to call the police.

The present complaint is based on a charge, and an amended charge, filed by United Steelworkers, which alleged several violations by the company of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act. More specifically, the company was charged with unlawfully discharging Ingraham because of his union activities, and unlawfully interrogating Ingraham, as well as threatening Ingraham with arrest for handbilling on the public thoroughfare in front of the plant entrance.

The Administrative Law Judge, after an extensive evidentiary hearing, dismissed the charges of unlawful termination and interrogation. The Judge also held, however, that the company had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening Ingraham with arrest for passing out handbills on the public thoroughfare in front of one of the plant entrances. The Judge recommended a cease and desist order, and the posting of a notice. The Board affirmed the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the Judge, and adopted the recommended order.

The Board now seeks enforcement of its order. The company resists enforcement on the ground that there is no substantial evidence to support the Board's findings that: (1) the handbilling occurred on public property, and not on company property; and (2) Williams, the company president, had threatened Ingraham with arrest. These objections are without merit, and we conclude that the Board's order should be enforced.

Our study of the record convinces us that there is sufficient evidence to support the Board's finding that the handbilling took place on a public thoroughfare, not on company property. Further, the company's argument that Williams did not threaten Ingraham with arrest is not born out by the record. Both Ingraham and Wilson testified that Williams threatened to call the police if the two did not stop handbilling. Threatening to summon law enforcement authorities for the purpose of inhibiting lawful union activities has long been held violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See National Labor Rel. Board v. Revlon Products Corp., 144 F.2d 88, 89 (2d Cir. 1944).

Counsel seizes on Ingraham's testimony that Williams stated he was going to call the police and "have us moved." This qualifying statement, i.e., "have us moved," according to counsel, negated the possibility of any threat of arrest. We disagree with this highly semantical argument. The important thing is that, according to both Ingraham and Wilson, Williams stated he was going to call the police. Such statement was made for the obvious purpose of discouraging Ingraham and Wilson from passing out handbills which advised Schlegel employees of the forthcoming union meeting.

In a proceeding of this type, our only duty is to make certain that the Board's critical findings are supported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera Corp. v. Labor Board, 340 U.S. 474, 496–97, 71 S.Ct. 456, 468–469, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); N.L.R.B. v. Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. of Topeka, 613 F.2d 267, 270 (10th Cir. 1980); and Osteopathic Hospital Founders Ass'n v. N.L.R.B., 618 F.2d 633 (10th Cir. 1980). We are convinced that in the instant case the Board's findings meet that test.

ORDER ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Actors' Equity Association

644 F.2d 939 (2d Cir.), March 17, 1981—247 NLRB 1193

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WATERMAN, MANSFIELD and KEARSE, Circuit Judges

MANSFIELD, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) and Intervenor, Yul Brynner, petition this court for enforcement of the Board's order dated February 19, 1980, requiring Actors' Equity Association (Equity), a theater actors' union, to cease violating §§ 88(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A) and (b)(2) (NLRA), by charging non-uniform dues that unjustifiably discriminate against aliens who belong to the union and are in this country temporarily to perform in stage productions. The order also mandates repayment of all past overcharges from April 6, 1976, to the present. We agree with the NLRB's finding that the assessment of non-uniform dues against aliens without any reasonable basis violates the Act, and find no fault in the Board's choice of remedy. We also agree that intervenor Brynner was an employee subject to the Act's protection rather than a supervisor, and that this suit is not time-barred under § 10(b) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b). Accordingly, we grant the Board's petition for enforcement.

Actors' Equity is an employees' association that has entered into collective bargaining agreements on behalf of stage actors with various theater organizations in New York and throughout the United States and Canada. Its bargaining agreements universally contain a "union security clause" providing that the employer will hire only union members to act in its production

Equity has for many years attempted to regulate participation by foreign actors in American theater performances. This regulation has taken several forms. First, since 1964 Equity has participated in an agreement with the United States Department of Labor and the Immigration and Naturalization Service to the effect that the Labor Department would seek Equity's advice on aliens' applications for visas under 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(H), which permits resident aliens to obtain jobs in the United States only if they are rendering exceptional or temporary service in jobs which no unemployed Americans are capable of performing. Second, Equity has agreed with New York theater employers' organization—the Council of Stock Theatres (COST), League of Resident Theatres (LORT), and the League of New York Theatres and Producers (Producers)—that members of those organizations (the primary employers of aliens in the United States) will not hire non-resident aliens without Equity's consent.[1]

Finally, Equity has imposed a separate dues schedule on non-resident aliens. Citizens of the United States and Canada who belong to Actors' Equity, as well as aliens who reside here with the intention of making this country their permanent residence, pay dues according to a sliding scale ranging from $42 per year for an actor earning no more than $2,500 per year to a maximum of $400 for an actor earning more than $30,000 per year. Once a so-called "resident member" makes more than $1,400 per year his dues will never exceed 3% of gross income, with a $400 per year limit.

Non-resident aliens who are allowed to perform in the United States, on the other hand, must pay 5% of their stage income as dues, with no ceiling. Yul Brynner, the Intervenor, is a Swiss citizen and resident of France who was admitted into the United States to play the King of Siam in The King and I, a revival of a play in which he starred some years ago. If he had been a U.S. citizen or resident, his dues to Actors' Equity for the first year of the play's run would have been $400; under the separate schedule for non-resident aliens, he was required to pay $45,000.

Charges were filed with the Board [illegible] October 8, 1976, alleging that the union was violating §§ 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the Act through employment of its discriminatory dues schedule. Noting that those provisions prohibit discrimination against employees except as provided by § 8(a)(3), which allows unions and employers to enter union security agreements, the charging party relied on the second provison to § 8(a)(3), which states that employees who belong to a union having in effect a union security agreement may be required as a condition of membership only to "tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership" (Emphasis supplied).

The administrative jaw judge, and later the Board, agreed that the separate dues structure unlawfully discriminated against aliens by violating the union's duty to charge uniform dues or to demonstrate a reasonable justification for the nonuniformity. While it declined to impose a per se rule that any discrimination in dues charged to aliens was unacceptable under the Act, it nevertheless found such discrimination presumptively invalid, and declared that absent some justification for the nonuniformity it must be found illegal. It then rejected the justifications claimed by Equity—that the higher dues structure was necessary (1) to limit the number of alien actors in the United States, (2) to prevent reprisals from British Equity, Britain's "friendly adversary" correlative of Actors' Equity, and (3) to counterbalance British Equity's power to exclude as many American actors as it wants simply by telling the British Labor Board whom it wants excluded. Finding no merit in Equity's claim that the suit was time-barred, the Administrative Law Judge ordered Equity to desist from imposing a discriminatory dues schedule and ordered repayment of all amounts collected after April 6, 1976 (six months before the complaint was filed in this case) in excess of what non-resident aliens would have paid if treated like residents or citizens.

DISCUSSION

Equity first contends that the Board has no jurisdiction over the rights of aliens because the NLRA is aimed at protecting American workers only and that non-resident aliens therefore have no cognizable rights under the Act. We disagree. Nothing in the terms or construction of the NLRA limits the meaning of the word "employees" to American citizens or permanent residents. The provisions in question here do not specify "American-citizen" employees as opposed to non-resident aliens. They merely proscribe discriminatory treatment of individuals or groups of employees who belong to unions, without regard to the employees' nationality or residence. For instance, Equity does not deny that Canadian citizens and resident aliens have rights as union members under the NLRA. It would be unthinkable to allow Equity to demand union membership and payment of dues by alien members performing in the United States while denying them rights associated with union membership.[2]

[1] Equity's agreements with COST and LORT wholly prohibit employment of non-resident aliens without Equity's prior consent. Its agreement with Producers provides that a producer may not apply to the Immigration and Naturalization Service for admission of an alien actor unless Equity and Producers both approve the application, and that differences of opinion between Equity and Producers will be resolved by arbitration.

942

Having recognized that aliens possess equal rights as union members, we have no difficulty concluding that the union's two-tiered dues structure discriminates against non-residents by failing to impose uniform dues without some legitimate basis for the discrimination. See NLRB v. Kaiser Steel Corp., 506 F.2d 1057 (9th Cir. 1974); NLRB v. Electric Auto-Lite Co., 92 N.L.R.B. 1073 (1950), enf'd, 196 F.2d 500 (6th Cir. 1952). Equity attempts to justify its dues discrimination on three grounds. First, it argues that the 5% dues rate protects employment opportunities for members by limiting alien membership in American productions. Second, it suggests that the rule protects Americans from hostile or retaliatory actions on the part of British Equity, which now reciprocally charges American theater actors 5% dues.[3] Third, and relatedly, it says that the rule (or at least the power to have the rule) provides a needed counterweight to British Equity's influence over alien admissions in England.

We find no merit in these asserted justifications. There is no substantial evidence that the 5% dues assessment, either because of parity between American and foreign pay scales or for some other reason, would inhibit foreign actors from participating in America's comparatively lucrative theater productions. On the contrary, past statements by Equity indicate that the 5% dues rate was adopted primarily as a revenue-producing measure. Moreover, Equity's power to exclude aliens derives from an entirely different source, its agreements with COST, LORT, and Producers. In the face of these agreements, which give Equity effective authority to decide which aliens to admit and which to exclude, the 5% dues rate has no significant exclusionary force.

Similarly, the asserted justification that the higher dues are necessary to protect American actors from retaliatory action on the part of British Equity, which imposes a reciprocal 5% dues rate, lacks rationality. The fairness of discriminatory acts under American labor law does not depend on what is practiced under British labor law. The 5% American dues levy seems more likely to provoke hostility than to eliminate it. Nor has it had much influence upon British Equity's decision-making, since it has been in existence for about 50 years and British Equity's retaliatory 5% dues rate has existed almost that long.[4] Finally, on a narrower level, concerns about British Equity could hardly be relevant as a justification for charging higher dues to Brynner, who is a Swiss citizen and French resident and has never been either a citizen or a resident of Great Britain.

Equity next protests that this action is time-barred under § 10(b) of the Act,[5] since the present policy of charging differential dues is traceable to events that took place many years ago, long before commencement of the six-month period prior to the filing of charges against Equity with the Board, citing NLRB v. Auto Warehousers, Inc., 571 F.2d 860 (5th Cir. 1978). According to its reading of § 10(b) and Auto Warehousers, no action may be brought to protest an unfair labor practice more than six months after the first time the unfair labor practice took place, regardless of how many times the practice has been repeated or what present re-

[2] Although non-resident aliens who belong to Equity are also not allowed to vote or become union officials, the Board has made no effort here to attack these restrictions as violative of the union's duty of fair representation. Whether a union may impose such restrictions on employee rights remains a matter of dispute. Compare NLRB v. Miranda Fuel Co., 326 F.2d 172 (2d Cir. 1963), and NLRB v. Local 485, IUE, 454 F.2d 17, 21 n.6 (2d Cir. 1972), with Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 177–78, 182, 87 S.Ct. 903, 909–910, 912, 17 L.Ed.2d 842 (1967, and Local 12, Rubber Workers v. NLRB, 368 F.2d 12, 17 (5th Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 837, 88 S.Ct. 53, 19 L.Ed.2d 99 (1967). Instead, the Board limits its attack to Equity's alleged discriminatory failure to impose the uniform dues specifically required by the second proviso to § 8(a)(3). Nor does our opinion bear on the union's power to limit the number of aliens who perform on American stages by impeding their entry into the United States or into the union.

[3] Though British Equity serves both theatrical and film actors. unlike American Equity it does not impose differential dues on American movie actors, just as no American union imposes higher dues on British film actors.

[4] Equity places much emphasis on the statement by British Equity's General Secretary that British Equity would not necessarily feel bound to eliminate its 5% dues rate if the Board's enforcement petition is granted. Even assuming that British Equity would impose a non-reciprocal dues assessment on Americans after this case, this argument merely proves that British Equity acts independently of American Equity, shedding doubt on Equity's protest that its dues rates somehow affect British Equity's rates.

[5] Section 10(b), 29 U.S.C. § 160(b), provides in relevant part as follows:

> "[N]o complaint shall issue based upon any unfair labor practice occurring more than six months prior to the filing of the charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof upon the person against whom such charge is made * * *."

percussions the past practice causes. We firmly rejected such a reading of § 10(b) in NLRB v. Local 443, International Bhd. of Teamsters, 600 F.2d 411 (2d Cir. 1979), stating:

> "To the extent that * * * Auto Warehousers, Inc. * * * may be read to suggest that the maintenance of a super-seniority provision unsupported by a present adequate business justificatioin does not constitute a violation of the Act, we decline to follow the reasoning of that case." Id. at 413 n.4.

Here the discriminatory non-uniformity in dues charges is unsupported by any presently existing adequate business justification. Indeed, the need to look into the past arises only when Equity attempts to gloss its present practices with a historical justification. Equity's reading of § 10(b) would mean that no union member could challenge the validity of an existing disparate dues schedule where the practice had existed for more than six months prior to the filing of charges. We decline to adopt such a preclusive rule.

The union's remaining claims are equally meritless. Equity claimed before the Board that Brynner has no rights under the Act because he was a supervisor and not an employee according to the reasoning of NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 100 S.Ct. 856 (1980), after abandoning this argument before the administrative law judge. Apart from Equity's waiver of the right to make this argument here by abandoning it below, there is nothing in Brynner's contract with The King of Siam Company that gives him the authority or the trappings of a supervisor rather than an employee.

We also find no impropriety in the remedy imposed by the Board. Though the members of the class of aliens entitled to recover under the Board's order have not all been named, the class has been fully defined as those non-resident alien employees who paid more in dues than they would have paid as residents or citizens from April 6, 1976, to the present. No more is required for the Board to order classwide relief where, as here, at least one non-resident member of Equity incontestably paid higher dues than a citizen would have paid after April 6, 1976. Nor do we find the relief ordered punitive, as claimed by Equity, which relied on Local 60, United Carpenters v. NLRB, supra. This order does not require the repayment of all union dues paid under the invalid rule, as the Board's order in that case did. Rather, the wronged employees are being allowed to recover only the difference between what they paid and what they would have paid as American citizens. This reimbursement is clearly remedial and not punitive.

ORDER ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Naum Brothers, Inc.

637 F.2d 589 (6th Cir.), March 17, 1981—240 NLRB 311

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WEICK, ENGEL and BOYCE F. MARTIN, JR., Circuit Judges

590

PER CURIAM: This case is before the Court on the application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order.

Naum Brothers is a New York corporation which operates a chain of retail department stores in New York and Michigan. Its Drayton Plains, Michigan facility is the only store involved in this case. After Naum Brothers' acquisition of the store in 1976 the Union [1] began its efforts to organize the store's employees. A petition was filed with the Board and an election was held in which the Union did not receive a majority. The Union subsequently filed objections to the conduct of the election and an unfair labor practice charge, alleging various acts of coercion and interference with employee's protected rights in violation of § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Just prior to the election the Union had filed another unfair labor practice charge, alleging that the Company discriminatorily discharged employee Dean A. Martin in violation of § 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

The Board adopted, with certain modifications, the findings and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge. It found that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by: promulgating and maintaining an overly broad and unlawful prohibition against solicitation on behalf of the Union; interrogating employees about their union activities and desires; creating the impression that its employees' union activities were being kept under surveillance; soliciting employees' complaints and grievances and expressly or impliedly promising to provide remedies; indicating to employees that unionization would be futile and might lead to closure of the store; and promising and granting improved employee benefits and wage increases to discourage adherence to the Union. The Board further found that the Company violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging and refusing to reinstate employee Dean Martin in order to discourage union activities.

[1] Retail and Department Store Employees, Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO.

The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from committing unfair labor practices and to take the customary affirmative action. It also orders the Company to bargain with the Union, upon request, as the exclusive representative of all the employees in the bargaining unit.

The Company's first contention on appeal is that it did not violate § 8(a)(1) by prohibiting solicitation on behalf of the Union. We hold that the Board's finding on this issue is supported by substantial evidence. The record shows that the signs prohibiting solicitation were posted after the filing of the petition and removed after the election. It is uncontested that on at least one occasion the prohibition was repeated by a supervisor in the presence of an employee. Although the Company argues that everyone understood that the no-solicitation rule was aimed only at non-employee solicitation, there is no evidence which suggests such a limitation on the applicability of the rule. See Essex International, Inc., 211 N.L.R.B. 749 (1974).

The Company next contends that there is no substantial evidence supporting the finding that its company-wide increase in wages and certain other benefits violated § 8(a)(1). There is testimony in the record (of Susan Adkins, Margaret Bentley, and Richard Cassidy) relating to two meetings of employees and their supervisors which supports the Board's findings that the Company unlawfully solicited employee grievances and expressly or impliedly promised to provide remedies. See Landis Tool Co., Division of Litton Industries v. N.L.R.B., 460 F.2d 23 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 915, 93 S.Ct. 237, 34 L.Ed.2d 177 (1972). We also hold that the timing and manner of the wage increases and benefit improvements supports the conclusion that they were instituted by the Company to discourage union activity. See N.L.R.B. v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 84 S.Ct. 457, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964).

As for the discharge of employee Dean Martin, we find the conclusion of the Board that the Company violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) to be supported by substantial evidence. There is ample evidence in the record supporting the inferences drawn by the ALJ and her credibility determinations. That contrary inferences and credibility determinations may also be supported by the record, as the union Company argues, is not relevant on appeal. Our function is not to make a de novo review of the evidence. The decision of the ALJ recites substantial factual support for the Board's conclusion of unlawful discharge. We therefore must uphold that conclusion.

The Company argues that the additional § 8(a)(1) violations are not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. We find that the comments and question of Zipf, Tabb, and Charles Martin to employees provide the requisite support for the Board's finding of unlawful interrogation. We further agree with the ALJ's conclusion that Charles Martin was a supervisor and agent of respondent. Cf. Jay's Foods, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 573 F.2d 438, 444–5 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 859, 99 S.Ct. 176, 58 L.Ed.2d 167 (1978). We also note that the fact that Charles Martin's conversation with Olsen may have been "friendly" does not preclude the Board's conclusion. Cf. Seligman and Associates, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 639 F.2d 307 (6th Cir. 1981).

Similarly, we hold that there is substantial evidence of record, which is cited by the ALJ in her decision, supporting the Board's findings that the Company (a) created the impression that the employee's union activities were being kept under surveillance, and (b) indicating to employees that unionization would be futile and might lead to closure of the Drayton Plains store.

The Company's final contention is that the Board's decision to issue a bargaining order is not support by substantial evidence. The Company argues that neither the ALJ nor the Board engaged in the analysis required by N.L.R.B v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), before deciding that a bargaining order, rather than a second election, was the appropriate remedy. It contends that the unfair labor practices found by the Board were not egregious, pervasive, or of sufficient lasting effect to warrant a bargaining order.

This Court has refused to enforce bargaining orders in cases where the unfair labor practices would not, in our opinion, prevent a fair election. N.L.R.B. v. East Side Shopper, Inc., 498 F.2d 1334 (6th Cir. 1974). We have also endorsed the view that enforcement will be denied when the reasoning of the Board in ordering bargaining is "a litany, reciting conclusions by rote without factual explication." N.L.R.B. v. Essex Wire Corporation, 496 F.2d 862 (6th Cir. 1972), quoting from N.L.R.B. v. American Cable Systems, Inc., 427 F.2d 446 (5th Cir.) cert. denied, 400 U.S. 957, 91 S.Ct. 356, 27 L.Ed.2d 266 (1970)).

In the portion of her decision subtitled "The Remedy," the ALJ set forth her reasons for recommending a bargaining order: (1) The promise and grant of substantial wage increases and improved benefits given to virtually all of the members of the bargaining unit render it unlikely that a free election could be held; (2) the general and individual communications with employees regarding the possible closure of the store in the event of unionization are among the most flagrant means of interfering with the exercise of employees' § 7 rights; and (3) the discriminatory discharge of Dean A. Martin during the election campaign poses a warning to the employees of the potential high cost of supporting the Union. This is the kind of analysis which the Gissel case mandates. Since the Board adopted the ALJ's reasoning, its decision to require the Company to bargain was properly supported and within its power to order the appropriate remedy. Cf N.L.R.B. v. Delight Bakery, Inc., 353 F.2d 344 (6th Cir. 1965). Accordingly, the order of the Board is to be enforced.

NLRB v. Jaggars-Chiles-Stovall, Inc.

639 F.2d 1344 (5th Cir.), March 19, 1981—249 NLRB 697

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before POLITZ, TATE and SAM D. JOHNSON, Circuit Judges

1345

TATE, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of its order against Jaggars-Chiles-Stovall, Inc., a Dallas printing firm. The Board found that J-C-S, the employer, had committed an unfair labor practice in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (5)[1] of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5), in failing to provide the Union with certain requested wage data concerning (1) non-union unit members and (2) supervisory workers performing bargaining unit work. J-C-S refuses to furnish this information because (1) certain non-union unit members requested it remain confidential and (2) there is insubstantial evidence to establish the relevancy to the union of the wage data of the supervisory workers. Because we find the employer's refusal to furnish the requested wage data to be unwarranted, we grant the enforcement of the order of the NLRB.

Context Facts

In 1978, Dallas Typographical Union No. 173 [hereinafter referred to as the Union] and Jaggars-Chiles-Stovall, Inc., [J-C-S] signed a collective bargaining agreement to cover the period of February 21, 1977, to June 30, 1981. (General Counsel Exhibit 2). In this agreement, J-C-S recognized the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees covered by this agreement, i.e., the Union was to represent the collective bargaining unit.[2]

In February 1979, the Union representative at J-C-S, "Chapel Chairman" Bates,[3] requested Bob Stovall, president of J-C-S, to furnish monthly earnings figures for the month of January for all unit employees (whether union members or not), as well as for various supervisory employees. The Union sought this data in order to adequately monitor the agreement between the Union and J-C-S: specifically, the Union contended that (1) it needed the earnings data for all unit workers because it was the Union's responsibility to protect the contract's work and pay standards for all unit employees, whether union members or not, and (2) the wage data on certain supervisory personnel was needed because it was alleged that they were performing unit work perhaps in violation of the agreement.

[1] Section 8(a)(1) and (5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1)(5), provide:

"It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title."

[2] Article II, Section 1 of the agreement defined the bargaining unit:

Jurisdiction of the Union begins with the mark-up of copy and continues on through the printing press (but excluding the making of mats, stereotypes, plastic plates, photoengraving and finishing operations beyond the printing press run.) The appropriate bargaining unit consists of all employees performing such work.

[3] A chapel chairman is the equivalent of a shop steward.

J-C-S refused to furnish this information to the Union, and the Union subsequently filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board, which filed a complaint alleging J-C-S violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

A hearing was held before an administrative law judge. The ALJ determined that the information sought by the Union was indeed relevant for the Union to properly monitor the agreement. Furthermore, the ALJ concluded that the wage data was not confidential information, even if the non-Union unit employees had requested it to remain so. As a result, J-C-S was ordered to furnish the wage data sought by the Union. This recommended order of the ALJ was adopted by the NLRB, 249 NLRB No. 108, which now applies to this court for the enforcement of its order.

J-C-S opposes its enforcement for the following two contended reasons:

(1) Certain non-union unit employees specifically requested that their wage data remain confidential, and

(2) There is insubstantial record evidence to establish the relevance of wage data for supervisory personnel.

We disagree with both of these contentions.

Confidentiality

We first note that J-C-S does not challenge the relevancy of the wage data for non-union unit employees. See generally N.L.R.B. v. Brazos Electric Power Cooperative, Inc., 615 F.2d 1100 (5th Cir. 1980); San Diego Newspaper Guild, Etc. v. N.L.R.B., 548 F.2d 863 (9th Cir. 1977); N.L.R.B v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953 (6th Cir. 1969). However, J-C-S contends that, in situations where non-union unit members specifically request that their wage data remain confidential, employers are under no obligation to disclose this information, relevant or not, to the union.

This circuit has already addressed the issue of confidentiality of wage data. In National Labor Relations Board v. Item Company, 220 F.2d 956 (5th Cir. 1955), this court held that an employer had no confidentiality privilege[4] to withhold from the union relevant wage data, "which the union's own employee-members apparently refused to disclose to it." Id. at 959.

J-C-S maintains that Item is inapplicable to the instant factual circumstances because, there, no employee had asked the employer to withhold any information. We do not find this distinction to be persuasive.

The union representing a collective bargaining unit has the responsibility to represent both union and non-union members of that unit. Abilene Sheet Metal, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 619 F.2d 332 (5th Cir. 1980), In re Carter, 618 F.2d 1093 (5th Cir. 1980). This duty toward both union and non-union employees of the unit extends not only to the negotiations for an agreement, but also to the enforcement of the provisions of the agreement. Cox v. C. H. Masland & Sons, Inc., 607 F.2d 138 (5th Cir. 1979). A non-union segment of the bargaining unit, if its claim of confidentiality were recognized, could frustrate the union's attempt to fulfill its obligation to enforce the provisions of a collective bargaining contract intended to benefit both union and non-union employees. As stated in Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 87 S.Ct. 903, 912, 17 L.Ed.2d 1842 (1967), "[t]he collective bargaining system as encouraged by Congress and administered by the NLRB of necessity subordinates the interest of an individual employee to the collective interests of all employees in a bargaining unit."

Respondent J-C-S, in contending that the Union's right to information is not unlimited, cites Detroit Edison Co. v. N.L.R.B., 440 U.S. 301, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979). There, the court held that an employer could refuse to provide a union the results (linked with names) of aptitude tests taken by unit employees.[5] Detroit Edison Co. is, however, inapposite to the case before us. Wage data, concerning each employee, here involved, is not akin to the sensitive individualized test-result information, as to which a defense of confidentiality was recognized in Detroit Edison Co.; nor did that decision cast doubt upon the previously-cited consistent jurisprudence rejecting any claim of confidentiality, where relevant wage data was sought by the bargaining unit's representative.

Supervisory Workers

J-C-S correctly argues that wage data on employees outside the bargaining unit must meet a standard of relevance. Rockwell-Standard Corp., supra, 410 F.2d at 957. However, as this court has already noted, "[t]he Board's determination of the relevance of the information sought in a particular case must be given great weight by the court, if only because it is a finding of law and fact" within the expertise of the NLRB. NLRB v. Brazos Elec. Power Coop., Inc., 615 F.2d 1100, 1101 (5th Cir. 1980).

The Union sought the wage data on certain foremen and assistant foremen who occasionally performed unit work. The Union needed this information primarily to ensure that article II, section 6 of the agreement was not violated. This section read in pertinent part:

> Foremen may perform production work to expedite the production schedule, but will not perform such work to reduce overtime or to maintain a smaller work force than otherwise would be required. Assistant foremen doing journeymen's work shall be classified as hourly employees and shall be subject to all regulations applying to journeymen.

The Union argues that the earnings data for assistant foremen is necessary to verify the employer's records concerning the amount of overtime unit work performed by them.[6] Furthermore, although Chapel Chairman Bates admitted on cross-examination (Trial p. 64–68) that the amount of overtime hours worked by a foreman would be sufficient (because the foreman worked on a straight salary and received no overtime compensation), the earnings data is relevant as permitting verification that foremen were not being paid for additional hours for performing unit work, perhaps in violation of the agreement between the Union and J-C-S.

Thus, the ALJ and the NLRB properly held that the requested wage data on the foremen and assistant foremen who performed unit work is relevant information for the union's monitoring of the employer's performance of its obligations under the collective bargain contract with regard to the bargaining unit's work and pay standards. In addition to cases previously cited, see also: Curtiss-Wright Corp., Wright Aero. Div. v. N.L.R.B., 347 F.2d 61, 64 (3rd Cir. 1965); Hollywood Brands, Inc. and United Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 441-B, 142 N.L.R.B. 304, enforced. Hollywood Brands v. N.L.R.B., 324 F.2d 956 (5th Cir. 1963), rehearing denied, 326 F.2d 400, cert. denied, 377 U.S. 923, 84 S.Ct. 1221, 12 L.Ed.2d 215 (1964).

Conclusion

Under these circumstances, J-C-S was properly found to have committed an unfair labor practice in refusing to furnish the Union with relevant wage data it requested. The Board order will be ENFORCED.

ENFORCED.

> Assistant foremen are paid a percentage above journeymen wages. If he works overtime he's paid overtime on the basis of his pay, not journeyman scale, therefore, he would draw overtime on a—time and a half of his regular hourly wages. To know that he was being paid properly it would be necessary to know the amount. To know that the overtime was being distributed equitably we would need to know the number of hours. To compile as to whether the overtime pay and hours did correspond we would need to know them both.

SAROKIN,* District Judge

JAMES HUNTER, III, Circuit Judge: Petitioners United States Steel Corporation, Inland Steel Company, and Bethlehem Steel Corporation ("the steel companies") ask us to set aside an order and decision of the National Labor Relations Board ("the Board") requiring petitioners to bargain collectively with intervenor United Steel Workers of America ("the Union") with respect to wages and working conditions at a summer licensing school established by petitioners, intervenor District 2 Marine Engineers Beneficial Association-Associated Maritime Officers. AFL–CIO ("MEBA"), and intervenor District 2 Marine Engineers Beneficial Association-Associated Maritime Officers, AFL–CIO, Safety and Education Plan ("the Plan") to prepare unlicensed seamen for Coast Guard licensing examinations. The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order.[1] Because we find that the Board's order is not supported by substantial evidence, the petition for review to set aside the decision and order of the Board will be granted, and the Board's cross-application for enforcement will be denied.

I.

The steel companies operate fleets of vessels that carry iron ore from the northern Great Lakes ports to the steelmaking centers in the south. Crews on those vessels are classified as either licensed or unlicensed personnel. Licensed personnel include captains, mates, engineers, and stewards; unlicensed personnel include watchmen, deck hands, oilers, firemen, firemen-maintenance and wipers. Unlicensed personnel on petitioners' iron-ore vessels are represented by Local 500 of the Union. Licensed personnel are either unrepresented or represented by MEBA or the Masters, Mates & Pilots.

To supply petitioners and other employers with sufficient numbers of licensed personnel, MEBA and the Plan have annually operated winter schools in Toledo, Ohio to prepare employees to take Coast Guard licensing examination. Because of a shortage of licensed personnel, MEBA and the Plan had previously conducted summer licensing schools in 1973 and 1974.[2]

By 1978, there was once again a shortage of licensed personnel to operate the Great Lakes vessels. On June 22, 1978, the Joint Training Advisory Committee[3] ordered the establishment of a special summer school to commence on July 31, 1978 for a period of ten to thirteen weeks. Petitioners selected ten unlicensed employees (five from United States Steel, two from Inland, and three from Bethlehem) to attend the school.

There was no provision in the collective bargaining agreement between the Union and the steel companies regarding a special licensing school. Petitioners chose seamen for the school on the basis of recommendations from supervisors. Employees who attended the school were paid sixty percent of their regular wages; the steel companies retained forty percent, its payment contingent upon an employee's return for at least thrity days. Petitioners provided travel and subsistence expenses for employees enrolling in the school. Payment was made twice monthly, rather than once per month as when the employees were sailing. The time spent at the school accrued towards vacation and year end bonuses provided for in the collective bargaining agreement. Petitioners suspended their normal practice of either checking off, or issuing separate checks for, union dues of unlicensed personnel attending the summer school. After successful completion of the course and licensing examination, employees were not obligated to return to their former employers.

On July 19, 1978, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges against the steel companies for refusing to bargain over wages, hours and other conditions of employment for employees attending the summer school. A hearing was held before an administrative law judge ("ALJ") who, in a decision and order issued on September 28, 1979, dismissed the Union's complaint because: 1) employees attending the summer school had no community of interest with unlicensed personnel on petitioners' ships; 2) the summer school students fell outside of the certified bargaining unit; 3) the employees at the summer school were supervisory or managerial trainees, and hence outside of the bargaining unit; and 4) the terms and conditions of employment at the summer school did not vitally affect bargaining unit employees.

*Honorable H. Lee Sarokin, of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting by designation.

[1] Jurisdiction lies to enforce or review the Board's order under sections 10(e) and 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 160(e) & (f) (1976).

[2] Petitioners' obligation to bargain over wages and other terms and conditions of employment in the 1973 and 1974 summer schools is not at issue in the instant case.

[3] The 1968 collective bargaining agreements between the steel companies and MEBA provided for the establishment of a Joint Training Advisory Committee charged with the responsibility for the study and development of training for licensed personnel. The Committee consists of representatives from MEBA and various industry employers (including petitioners), but not the United Steelworkers of America.

In a decision and order of March 31, 1980,[4] the Board reversed the decision of the ALJ. The Board found

> [T]he students here involved did not cease to be employees of Respondents [below] during their summer training but remained members of the units of unlicensed personnel employed by these Respondents. Accordingly, we find that the terms and conditions under which they attended the summer training school were mandatory subjects of bargaining and that Respondents' unilateral actions with respect to such terms and working conditions constituted violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

248 N.L.R.B. No. 90 at 6, reprinted in Appendix for Petitioners at 465a.

The Board ordered the steel companies to bargain collectively with respect to wages and working conditions of the summer school.

II.

We must accept the Board's findings of violations of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act") 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) & (5) (1976), if they are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, even if we would have resolved the issue differently in first instance. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71. S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). We have examined the record in the case, but are unable to find substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that the students of the special summer school remained members of the units of unlicensed personnel employed by petitioners. Because we agree with the ALJ that there is no community of interest between the students attending the summer school and the shipbound employees, we decline to enforce the decision and order of the Board.

In our view, the students attending the licensing school were supervisory trainees[5] who lacked a community of interest with the unlicensed personnel remaining on petitioners' vessels. Our community of interest analysis is derived from a long line of decisions of the Board concerning the bargining unit status of supervisory and management trainees. In WTOP, Inc., 115 N.L.R.B. 758 (1956), the Board delineated the factors to be considered in evaluating the interest of supervisory trainees:

> [P]lanned supervisory training program for a definite period of time, selectiveness exercised by the Employer in the acceptance of applicants for this program and the fact that trainees do not continue with the Employer after completion of the training program unless retained as a supervisor.

115 N.L.R.B. at 759.

In Cherokee Textile Mills, Inc., 117 N.L.R.B. 350 (1957), supervisory trainees were found to be excluded from the bargaining unit because of their background and "expectation of supervisory status." In Diana Shop of Spokane, Inc. and Hughes Apparel, Inc., 118 N.L.R.B. 743 (1957), management trainees were excluded from a unit because of their supervisory training and the temporary nature of their employment. The Board in Montgomery Ward & Co., Incorporated, 131 N.L.R.B. 1436 (1961), held that management trainees have interests more closely allied with management than with rank-and-file employees. It also found management trainees to be excluded from a bargaining unit of banking employees in Banco Credito y Aharro Ponceno, 160 N.L.R.B. 1504 (1966), because they engaged in a formal training program of definite duration. Finally, in Curtis Industries, Division of Curtis Noll Corporation, 218 N.L.R.B. 1447 (1975), management trainees were once again found to be excluded from the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.[6]

[4] United States Steel Corporation, 248 N.L.R.B. No. 90 (March 31, 1980), reprinted in Appendix for Petitioners at 460a–472a.

[5] The students attended the school to obtain an original engineer's license or an original first class pilot's license which would enable them to become third assistant engineers or third mates. A number of courts have held that these officers are supervisors for the purposes of the Act. Newport Tankers Corp. v. NLRB, 575 F.2d 477 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 928, 99 S.Ct. 313, 58 L.Ed.2d 321 (1978); International Org. of Masters, Mates and Pilots v. NLRB, 539 F.2d 554 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 828, 98 S.Ct. 106, 54 L.Ed.2d 86 (1977); International Org. of Masters, Mates and Pilots v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 1271 (D.C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 956, 94 S.Ct. 1970, 40 L.Ed.2d 306 (1974).

The community of interest analysis developed in these cases was synthesized by the administrative law judge in Curtis Noll who concluded:

> From the above cases it appears that the factors which must be applied in the instant case are fourfold. First, selectivity in hiring based on the management trainee's possession of relevant education or experience; second, a specificity of future employment prospects, that is to say, the management trainees must be shown to have no alternatives other than to go into management ultimately or to leave the employ of the employer. If it appears that they would not be kept on as employees if they failed to qualify in the managerial jobs to which they are assigned, the factor is met. Third, there must be a planned management trainee program. It may be noted that the duration of such program does not appear to be much of a factor; the decisions range from several weeks to several years. Finally, the cases reveal that a considerable factor is a showing of a distinction of wages and working conditions between > the management trainees and the employees beside whom they worked.

218 N.L.R.B. at 1452.

Applying these four factors to the instant case, it becomes apparent that the students at the summer licensing school lacked a community of interest with the unlicensed seamen who would later be under their command. With respect to the first factor, selectivity, petitioners unilaterally selected employees for the licensing school on the basis of experience, past record and recommendations by supervisors.[7] Moving to the third factor, a planned training program, it is undisputed that the summer school was a formal ten-to-thirteen week course developed solely to prepare unlicensed seamen for the Coast Guard examinations. As to the fourth factor—the distinction between trainees' and other employees' wages and working conditions--students were physically separated from the unlicensed seamen and performed no bargaining unit work whatsoever. Students were paid only sixty percent of their normal wages and were paid on a different shorebased payroll.[8] Union dues were not checked off or collected from students as from unlicensed personnel. Moreover, and most significantly, students attended the school for the purpose of becoming licensed officers, that is, non-bargaining unit employees.

Despite this disparity between the interests of the students attending the summer school and the unlicensed seamen, the Board concluded that the absence of an "up-or-out" requirement, the second factor in the Curtis Noll analysis, allied the students' interests with those of bargaining unit employees. The Board distinguished the result in Curtis Noll and WTOP from the instant case on the ground that managerial and supervisory trainees in those cases had "no alternative other than to advance into management positions or to leave the employ of the employer,"[9] whereas unsuccessful applicants for licensed positions were free to return to their previous unlicensed positions.

We reject the Board's attempt to make one factor of the Curtis Noll analysis determinative of bargaining unit status. The ALJ's opinion [10] in that case clearly stated that all four factors discussed above were to be analyzed in evaluating the interests of managerial and supervisory trainees. The Board's novel interpretation of Curtis Noll [11] is not

[6] The Supreme Court has made it clear that all managerial employees are excluded from the protection of the Act. NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., 416 U.S. 267, 94 S.Ct. 1757, 40 L.Ed.2d 134 (1973).

[7] General Counsel's Exhibit No. 11, an internal United States Steel memorandum to masters and chief engineers concerning the establishment of the summer school, noted that "[s]election will be based on the individual's past record, the current recommendations, and the number of students we will be able to send." Chief engineers were requested to submit a list of unlicensed crew members expressing an interest in the school, and also to submit "the names of any individuals not expressing an interest in the program, but who the Chief feels would be a qualified engineer."

[8] Attendance at the school was included in the calculations of vacations and year-end bonuses and insurance benefits were retained.

[9] United States Steel Corporation, 248 N.L.R.B. No. 90 at 4 n.4, reprinted in Appendix for petitioners at 463a.

[10] The Board's decision in Curtis Noll affirmed the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the ALJ, and adopted his recommended order. 218 N.L.R.B. at 1447.

[11] The Board read Curtis Noll as devising a new test to evaluate the status of managerial trainees dependent solely upon the "up-or-out" requirement. As we have indicated, we believe that Curtis Noll is consistent with, not a departure from, the community of interest analysis developed by the Board in a long line of cases. We concur in the fifth circuit's opina substitute for a reasoned community of interest analysis.

Therefore, we believe that the Board's finding that there was a sufficient community of interest between the unlicensed seamen and the students at the summer licensing school to retain the latter within the bargaining unit is not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, and that there was no violation of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the Act.

Accordingly, we decline to enforce the Board's order and we grant the petition to review and set aside the decision and order.[12]

GARTH, Circuit Judge, concurring, with whom SAROKIN, District Judge, joins: I am in complete agreement with the majority's conclusion that the students attending the licensing school were supervisory trainees lacking a community of interest with the unlicensed personnel remaining on the vessels. Thus, I join in the result reached by the majority. I write separately, however, to emphasize that in my opinion the central inquiry in this matter is whether the students attending the summer school remained members of the bargaining unit. My reading of the record satisfies me that the Board improperly included them in the bargaining unit.

The record discloses that the expectations of both the steel companies and those employees selected to attend the school were such that the students involved would graduate to licensed positions. Assuming these expectations were fulfilled, the students would no longer be represented by United Steel Workers. As the majority points out those students who attended the school were paid sixty percent of their regular wages, with the remaining forty percent contingent upon their return to their former employers, in either a licensed or unlicensed capacity, for at least thirty days. Thus, although the students had no obligation to return to their former employers, and their former employers, in turn, did not have preferential hiring rights, the employers, in establishing this payment schedule, were clearly offering the forty percent payment as an incentive to both successful and unsuccessful students to return to their former companies.

Viewed in this light, the evidence is compelling that the steel companies at no time intended to maintain the students' status as bargaining unit employees. Given the companies' objective of encouraging qualified employees to participate in the licensing program, the adoption of incentives as well as provisions to insure that unsuccessful students would not be a in worse position than they were before entering the program, is perfectly understandable.

An examination of the language used by the Regional Director in certifying the Steel Workers as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees of the steel companies and the language found in the relevant collective bargaining agreements, reveals unequivocally that the students were outside the bargaining unit. Both the terms of the Board certification and the terms of the parties' agreements emphasize the physical presence of the employees on the vessel. Neither contemplates the inclusion in the bargaining unit of individuals who are not on board or employed on the vessels operated by their employers:

	NLRB Certification Language	Contractual Definition of Bargaining Unit
USS	"All unlicensed seamen on board the employer's vessels * * *" (App. 8; 13)	"All unlicensed personnel * * * employed on the fleet of Great Lakes vessels." (App. 9; 13).
Bethlehem	"All unlicensed personnel on board the vessels, presently operated by the employer * * *" (App. 9; 13)	"All unlicensed personnel * * * employed on all of the bulk freight vessels operated by * * *" (App. 10; 13).
Inland	"All unlicensed personnel on board all vessels owned and/or operated by employer Inland * * *" (App. 8–9; 13)	"All unlicensed personnel * * * employed on all bulk freight vessels * * *" (App. 10, 13).

Thus, the students who spent no time on board were clearly never intended to be members of the bargaining unit.

Moreover, the evidence in this record discloses that any student who successfully completed the

on that [t]he factors for establishing when participation in a 'managerial rainee program' will amount to managerial status did not originate in Curtis Noll, but as the decision itself shows, derive from a series of cases ecided by the Board many years earlier." NLRB v. Kent Corp., 564 F.2d 86, 188 (5th Cir. 1977) (footnote omitted).

program not only would become a member of a new and perhaps competing union, but also would assume supervision over Local 5000, United Steel Worker members. The Supreme Court, writing in a similar context, noted that severe internal conflicts might ensue if competing interests were represented in the same unit:

> Here, even if, as the Board found, active and retired employees have a common concern in assuring that the latter's benefits remain adequate, they plainly do not share a community of interests broad enough to justify inclusion of the retirees in the bargaining unit. Pensioners' interests extend only to retirement benefits, to the exclusion of wage rates, hours, working conditions, and all other terms of active employment. Incorporation of such a limited-purpose constituency in the bargaining unit would create the potential for severe internal conflicts that would impair the unit's ability to function and would disrupt the processes of collective bargaining. Moreover, the risk cannot be overlooked that union representatives on occasion might see fit to bargain for improved wages or other conditions favoring active employees at the expense of retirees' benefits.

(footnote omitted). Chemical Workers Local 1 v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 172, 92 S.Ct. 383, 394, 30 L.Ed.2d 341 (1971). The potential for conflict which could "impair the unit's ability to function and * * * disrupt the processes of collective bargaining is obvious under the instant circumstances. Taking into account these tensions, together with the lack of community interest discussed in the majority opinion, I conclude that the students were improperly included in the bargaining unit.

I therefore concur in the majority's decision to grant the companies' petition for review and set aside the Board's decision and order.

Anchor Inns, Inc., d/b/a Anchor Inn Hotel of St. Croix v. NLRB

644 F.2d 292 (3d Cir.), March 20, 1981—250 NLRB 767

On petition to review Board Order

Before Seitz, Chief Judge, Gibbons and Rosenn, Circuit Judges

Rosenn, Circuit Judge: On July 18, 1980, the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or "Board") entered an order finding Anchor Inns, Inc. ("Company" or "Employer") to have violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act ("Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (5) (1976), by refusing to bargain with the Gastronomical Workers Union of Puerto Rico, Local 610, Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO ("Union"). The Board ordered the Company to cease and desist in its violations, to post appropriate notices, and to recognize and bargain with the Union upon request. Anchor Inns filed this petition for review under 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976); the Board cross-applied for enforcement pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976).

Although Anchor Inns' petition formally seeks review of the unfair labor practice proceedings, it is not disputed that the Company refused to bargain with the Union. The Company's complaints are directed to events surrounding the representation election—alleged coercive activity by the Union, its agents, and adherents, and the Board's failure to deal appropriately with that activity. Because Congress has not provided for direct judicial review of Board representation proceedings, the Employer was compelled to expose itself to unfair labor practice charges in order to gain access to this court. The validity of the unfair labor practice charges depends on the legality of the Union's certification. Therefore, we may address the Company's claims concerning the representation proceedings in our treatment of its section 10(f) petition. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 61 S.Ct. 908, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941);

NLRB v. Sun Drug Co., 359 F.2d 408 (3d Cir. 1966). We deny enforcement and remand for an evidentiary hearing.

I.

Anchor Inns, Inc. operates the Anchor Inn Hotel in St. Croix, United States Virgin Islands. On October 27, 1978, the Union filed a representation petition with the Board, requesting certification as the exclusive bargaining agent of all service and maintenance employees at the Company's St. Croix hotel, excluding from the proposed bargaining unit office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors. Although the Company and the Union disagreed about the supervisory status of one employee, Hippolyte Victor, a consent election was held on December 15, 1978. Victor served as the Union's observer at the election. Six votes were cast: four in favor of the Union, one against the Union, and Victor's which was challenged and therefore not counted. Because Victor's vote was not determinative of the election, the challenge was not resolved.

On December 21, 1978, the Company filed objections to the election, claiming that certain Union proponents, notably Victor, had threatened or coerced its employees and thereby disrupted the free and fair atmosphere of the election. The objections were accompanied by an affidavit of Company owner Lon B. Southerland, through which Southerland related conversations between himself and three Anchor Inn employees. Employee Albert Hughes informed Southerland that Victor had told Hughes and other employees that if they did not vote for the Union, they would lose their jobs within 30 days. Employees Hermie Joseph and Lucille Dailey, when separately volunteering to Southerland that they preferred not to have a union despite Victor's pro-Union activities, "check[ed] to see that no one was listening and appear[ed] frightened and apprehensive."

The Board's Regional Director investigated the Company's objection and, without having held a hearing, issued his report and recommendations on March 20, 1979. In his report, the Regional Director concluded, on the basis of his interview with Victor, that Victor had told Hughes that if the Union won the election, Hughes would have to join the Union or lose his job within 30 days. This was inaccurate, the Regional Director found, because it omitted reference to the necessity for successful negotiation of a union security clause before conditioning employment on union membership. He further held that such a "statement made to one employee cannot be said to have interfered with free and unfettered choice by employees in the election." The Regional Director also noted that no evidence had been adduced or discovered that would indicate that Victor was an agent or employee of the Union. As to Southerland's reference to his conversation with employees Joseph and Dailey, the Regional Director found it unpersuasive, deeming it to be an offer of proof that the election results did not reflect the previously expressed views of the voters. For these reasons, the Regional Director recommended that the objection be overruled and the Union certified as the bargaining representative of the Company's employees in an appropriate unit.

The Company thereupon filed exceptions to the Regional Director's report. In essence, the Company urged that the Regional Director should at least have conducted a hearing on the objections tendered to the election. This was especially appropriate, the Employer argued, with respect to Victor's statement to Hughes, which Hughes had interpreted as a threatened loss of employment if he did not vote for the Union. The discrepancy between the evidence offered in support of the objection and the evidence discovered by the Regional Director's investigation demanded, it was urged, a hearing to determine the true nature of Victor's remarks. Next, the Company complained that it should not have been held responsible for failing to produce evidence of Victor's agency status with the Union. The strictures of section 8(a)(1),[1] it was argued, precluded the Employer from engaging in the type of investigation that would produce competent evidence of an agency relationship. Further, the Company claimed that even if Victor were not a Union agent, a hearing was required to determine Victor's supervisory status, for if he were found to be a supervisor, as the Company had consistently contended throughout the representation proceedings, his activities on behalf of the Union irreparable tainted the election process. Finally, the Company urged that the actions of Joseph and Dailey, in communicating with Southerland, indicated that more than one employee had been the target of Victor's "threats." Therefore, even absent Union agency or supervisory status, the widespread nature of Victor's coercive conduct raised a significant possibility that "a free expression of choice of representatives [was] impossible."

[1] Section 8(a)(1) provides that "[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section [7 of the Act]." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). Questioning employees about union sympathies or involvement may, under certain circumstances, constitute a violation of this section See Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305, 314 (3d Cir. 1980) (en banc).

The Board adopted the Regional Director's recommendations and certified the Union on May 8, 1979. The Board noted, however, that it was overruling the objection solely on the ground that the evidence presented by the Company did not establish that Victor was a union agent. Absent such agency, the Board held, a statement such as the one ascribed to Victor by the Regional Director was not grounds for setting aside an election.

On August 10, 1979, the Company filed a motion for reconsideration with the Board, claiming that "new and previously unavailable evidence" had been discovered which established that the employees had been unlawfully coerced in their choice of a bargaining representative and that the election should have been set aside. Attached to the motion for reconsideration were two affidavits. In one affidavit, employee Catherine Wade stated that Victor was the only employee with whom Ralph Mandrew, the Union organizer, had been in contact, and the Victor had advised all the hotel maids that he was the Union representative. The other affidavit, executed by Hermie Joseph, stated that although Victor had threatened her with physical harm and lies which would cause her to lose her job, she had not informed the Regional Director's investigator of the threats. She did not report this, she claimed, because Victor told her not to and she was "afraid" of him. Joseph also stated that Lucille Dailey had heard Victor threaten Albert Hughes because Hughes would not support the Union. The Board denied the Company's motion for reconsideration due to an "insufficient showing that the proffered evidence was previously unavailable and that, if considered, would require a different result."

Having exhausted its ability to initiate review of the representation proceedings, the Company thereupon refused to bargain with the Union. An unfair labor practice charge was then lodged against the Company, a complaint issued, and, on the General Counsel's motion, summary judgment was entered against the Company on July 18, 1980. We are now asked to review that judgment.

II.

The Company's arguments in this court are identical to those raised before the Board in the post-election proceedings. It insists that the evidence presented in the affidavits of Southerland, Wade, and Joseph was sufficient to warrant the setting aside of the election or, failing that, to require an evidentiary hearing on the factual issues raised. We believe the latter contention is meritorious.

A.

Congress has entrusted to the NLRB sole responsibility for conducting election proceedings to select collective bargaining representatives for workers. 29 U.S.C. § 159 (1976.) Courts, sharing only indirectly in the responsibility for monitoring that election process, have afforded the Board a "wide degree of discretion" in the conduct of the election and the attendant proceedings. NLRB v. A. J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946); NLRB v. El-Ge Potato Chip Co., 427 F.2d 903, 906 (3d Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 909, 91 S.Ct. 869, 27 L.Ed.2d 807 (1971). The administrative regulations provide that when a party objecting to an election raises "substantial and material factual issues" before the Regional Director or the Board, either may direct an evidentiary hearing. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(d) & (f) (1980). It is now well established, however, that the courts will insist on an evidentiary hearing when a party's objection raises substantial and material issues of fact. NLRB v. Campbell Products Department, 623 F.2d 876, 879 (3d Cir. 1980).[2] In Campbell Products, this court stated:

> A party is entitled to an evidentiary hearing where its objection raises substantial and material issues of fact. . . . As a corollary, no hearing is necessary where the Board assumes the truth of the party's contentions, and then rules as a matter of law that, assuming the facts alleged,

[2] Other courts of appeals have adopted the same rule. See NLRB v. Claxton Mfg. Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1365 (5th Cir. 1980); Methodist Home v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1173, 1178 (4th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. S. Prawer & Co., 584 F.2d 1099, 1102 (1st Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Bristol Spring Mfg. Co., 579 F.2d 704, 706–07 (2d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Medical Ancillary Serv., Inc., 478 F.2d 96, 98 (6th Cir 1973); Sonoco Prods. Co. v. NLRB, 399 F.2d 835, 839 (9th Cir. 1968); NLRB v. National Survey Serv., Inc., 361 F.2d 199, 206 (7th Cir. 1966).

Id. (citing NLRB v. Sun Drug Co., 359 F.2d at 414). In Campbell Products, the employer had alleged that a union supporter had been electioneering during the course of balloting. The Board assumed the allegation to be true and, relying on the traditional distinction drawn between activities undertaken by the parties to an election and those undertaken by rank and file employees, overruled the objection. This court upheld that action.

In order to obtain an evidentiary hearing, the objector's proffer of evidence must prima facie warrant setting aside the election. The proffer may not be conclusory or vague; it must point to specific events and specific people. On the other hand, an evidentiary hearing is not required when, if all the evidence proffered by the objecting party is accepted as true, no ground is produced which would warrant setting aside the election. Campbell Products, supra. In NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., supra, the Board, as in the case at bar, apparently believed that it was not required to decide whether the objector's affidavits raised substantial and material issues that prima facie warranted setting aside the election. Rather, the Board concluded that it might await the results of the regional director's exparte investigation and credibility determinations before deciding whether a hearing might be warranted. The Fifth Circuit rejected such a procedure and declined to enforce the bargaining order. 613 F.2d at 1373. We find the Fifth Circuit's approach persuasive in this case. It would of course serve no useful purpose to require the Board to hold hearings when the evidence proffered will not affect the validity of the election. However, in order to give the objecting party the full benefit of its statutory and constitutional hearing rights it is necessary that at some point the Regional Director or the Board, in determining the substantiality and materiality of the factual issues raised by an objection, assume that the allegations contained in that objection are true. This was not done in the case at bar. Had the allegations been taken as true, they may have warranted setting aside the election.

After the election, the Company timely filed an objection to claimed "threats by agents or employees of the [Union] to employees of Anchor Inn that if they did not vote for the Union they would lose their jobs," which allegdly affected the outcome of the election. In a supporting affidavit, Southerland, the Company's principal, stated:

> [O]n December 12, 1978, . . . a bargaining unit employee of Anchor Inn Hotel [Albert Hughes] stated to me that certain statements had been made to this Individual and to other employees by employee representatives of [the Union] that if the employees did not vote for the Union they would lose their jobs within 30 days.

The Regional Director investigated the objection and, in his report and recommendation, observed:

> The investigation revealed that approximately 4 days prior to the election herein, [Hippolyte Victor] engaged in a conversation with [Albert Hughes] during which [Victor] stated his belief that the [Union] was going to win the election and if the [Union] did so, [Hughes] would have to join [the Union] within 30 days or lose his job.

Because the Regional Director believed this statement to have been made to only one employee, Hughes, by one not shown to be a Union agent, he concluded that it had no effect on the employees' exercise of free choice in the election. Accordingly, he chose not to hold an evidentiary hearing and recommended to the Board that the Employer's objection be overruled. The evidence gathered in the Regional Director's investigation does not appear in this record.

A reading of the Regional Director's report demonstrates an inadequate treatment of the Company's objection to the election. As noted above, the allegations of the objecting party must be taken as true in reaching a determination whether or not "substantial and material factual issues" exist. In his treatment of Anchor Inns' objection, the Regional Director substituted "facts" gleaned from his ex parte investigation for the Company's allegations. Anchor Inns was entitled to considered evaluation of the legal effect of Victor's threats as recounted by Southerland, not merely as explained away by Victor himself. However, the Regional Director purposely reserved judgment on the question whether a hearing was justified until after obtaining Victor's statement. Thus, for all that is revealed by this record, Anchor Inns may have established the right to a hearing only to be deprived thereof by means of an ex parte administrative investigation. Had this deprivation occurred, the Board's order would not merit enforcement. "Once the right to a hearing is established, the investigation is not a substitute for it." NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d at 1366.

We need not actually decide what criteria are to be used by the Regional Director and the Board in determining whether issues raised by an objection are "substantial." However, we make the following observations in connection with certain arguments advanced on behalf of the Board in this case. In his brief to this court General Counsel argues that Southerland's affidavit was properly disregarded because of its hearsay nature. Although we can envision situations in which the inadmissibility of evidence offered in support of an objection would render the issues raised not "substantial," see, e. g., note 3 infra, we reject General Counsel's argument in this case for two reasons. First, neither the Regional Director nor the Board advanced this as a reason for ignoring the Employer's allegations and we " 'may not accept appellate counsel's post hoc rationalizations for agency action * * * .' " NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 380 U.S. 438, 444, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965) (quoting Burlington Truck Lines, Inc. v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168, 83 S.Ct. 239, 245, 9 L.Ed.2d 207 (1962)). Second, although some Board proceedings are to be conducted as nearly as practicable according to the Federal Rules of Evidence, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b), an outright rejectin of a hearsay affidavit in the context of an objection to an election is improper. As evidenced by the facts of this case, there are a variety of circumstances that would render the production of firsthand accounts of unlawful activity extremely difficult, if not impossible.

Here, the Employer alleges that Victor's threats to Anchor Inn employees were so persuasive and effective that one employee lied to the Regional Director's agent during the investigation of the Company's objection. If that allegation is correct, it is not surprising that the Company was unable to obtain signed and sworn affidavits detailing instances of alleged unlawful Union activity.[3] Similarly, unions that lose representation elections may find themselves with a decided lack of access to employees during the immediate post-election period in which objections must be filed. It is quite possible that a union seeking to vacate an election will be forced to rely on hearsay assertions by its organizers that the employer unlawfully coerced rank and file employees, the latter being unwilling to put their jobs in jeopardy for a union that has failed in its organization attempt.

The Board may properly insist on competent evidence at an evidentiary hearing, when its subpoena power is placed at the parties' disposal. 29 C.F.R. § 102.66(c) (1980). However, when material factual issues are raised in affidavit alleging specific instances of unlawful conduct by a party to an election, the allegations giving rise to those issues may not be disregarded, simply because of their hearsay nature, in favor of evidence gathered during an ex parte administrative investigation. Ignoring the Company's allegations was expecially inappropriate because it appears that the Regional Director's investigation corroborated Southerland's assertion that Victor had spoken with Hughes about the Union's ability to cause him to lose his job.

The Board repeated the Regional Director's error when it adopted his recommendation to overrule the objection to the election and certify the Union. Although the board overruled the objection on more narrow grounds than those on which the Regional Director predicated his recommendation, the Board relied on that version of the facts found in the ex parte administrative investigation. The Board stated:

[3] General Counsel argues that the Company should at least have made " 'some showing of reasonable effort and failure to obtain evidence, or a convincing demonstration that such efforts would necessarily involve risk of illegal action or inequitable or insuperable difficulty.' " Brief of NLRB at 7, citing NLRB v. National Survey Serv., 361 F.2d 199, 208 (7th Cir. 1966); NLRB v. Hepa Corp., 597 F.2d 166 (9th Cir. 1979). Even if this correctly represented the law of this circuit, neither case relied upon by General Counsel convinces us that such a showing was necessary in this case. In National Survey, the employer supoorted its allegation of Union electioneering with assertions that union agents " 'were observed in conversation with' " employees in the vicinity of the polls and that " '[i]t is apparent that the Petitioner was electioneering * * *.' " 361 F.2d 208. This is not hearsay, it is simply unfounded speculation and, thus, the court's treatment of it is not relevant to the present inquiry. In Hepa Corp., the affidavit revealed fifth-hand hearsay which is only probative in rare situations and certainly less worthy of reliance than the information contained in Southerland's affidavit.

> The sole objection is that approximately 4 days prior to the election one of the Employer's employees told another employee that *if the Petitioner [Union] won the election the employee would have to join the Petitioner within 30 days or lose his job * * . We find it unnecessary to reach the question of whether such a statement, when made by an agent of a labor organization, constitutes conduct which warrants setting aside an election. Here, the evidence fails to support the Employer's contention that the employee who allegedly made the statement was an agent of the Petitioner. While we adopt the Regional Director's recommendation that the objection be overruled, we do so solely because the statement in question, when made by one who is not an agent of either a labor organization or an employer, is not so aggravated as to create a general atmosphere of fear and reprisal and, thereby, render a free expression of choice impossible. See Central Photocolor Company, Inc., 195 NLRB 839 (1972).

Anchor Inns, Inc. v. Gastronomical Workers Union of Puerto Rico, Local 610, No. 24-2C-6207 (NLRB Decision and Certification of Representative, May 8, 1979) (emphasis added). That the board's decision rested on its estimation of the effect of Victor's statement as described by the Regional Director is evidenced by its reliance on Central Photocolor. Among other alleged instances of Union misconduct in that case were "statements that if the Union won the election it would pressure employees who voted against it to join the Union or lose their jobs." 195 N.L.R.B. at 839. The Board held that such statements, when not attributable to union agents or employees, are not sufficiently aggravated to upset the election.

The Company's objection entitled it to a fair determination of whether or not a hearing was warranted. The Board's failure to evaluate properly that objection deprived the Company of such a fair determination. However, because we agree with the Company that an evidentiary hearing should have been conducted with respect to the allegations contained in the motion for reconsideration, re-evaluation of the objection will be necessary only if the validity of the election is upheld after the hearing on the motion for reconsideration is concluded.

B.

Approximately three months after the Union was certified, the Company filed a motion requesting the Board to reconsider its decision. That motion was accompanied by two affidavits: Catherine Wade's asserting facts that would reasonably support an inference of Union agency on the part of Hippolyte Victor, and Hermie Joseph's, claiming among other things that she had lied to the Regional Director's investigator in early 1979, because Victor had threatened her with harm if she told the investigator the truth. The Board denied the Company's motion on the alternative grounds that there was not a sufficient showing of previous unavailability of the offered evidence and that the new evidence, even if believed, did not appear to warrant setting the election aside.

We can find no reasonable basis for the Board's conclusion that Hermie Joseph's affidavit did not contain "previously unavailable" evidence. It certainly was not available until the events it detailed had occurred, which was after the objection to the election had been filed. It is conceivable that the Board found a previous opportunity for the Employer to present this evidence when it filed its exception to the Regional Director's report and recommendation to the Board. However, the allegations themselves provided a compelling justification for their delayed submission—the witness feared for her personal safety. The substance of the charges demanded caution against casual dismissal: allegations of perjury during the course of an official investigation always deserve careful attention. In this case, the alleged perjury took on added significance because the evidence gathered by the investigator to whom Ms. Joseph lied formed the basis for the Regional Director's recommendation that the Company's objection to the election be overruled. In view of the gravity of the allegations, we conclude that the Board abused its discretion in refusing to consider them because of their delayed submission.

We also find ourselves unable to agree with the Board that these allegations, if true, would not affect the validity of the election. See generally Zeiglers Refuse Collectors, Inc. v. NLRB, 639 F.2d 1000 (3d Cir. 1981). In part, we decline to accept the Board's holding to this effect because that holding—like the one overruling the objection to the election—is premised on the Regional Director's rejection of Southerland's account of the Victor-Hughes conversation.

Further, the Board's rejection of the Company's "previously unavailable" evidence as immaterial is wholly incompatible with its professed intent "to provide a laboratory in which an experiment may be conducted, under conditions as nearly ideal as possible, to determine the uninhibited desires of the employees." General Shoe Corp., 77 N.L.R.B. 124, 127 (1948). See Zeiglers Refuse Collectors, Inc. v. NLRB, at 1004–1005. In establishing that goal, the Board charged itself with the "duty to establish those conditions [and the] duty to determine whether they have been fulfilled." General Shoe Corp., 77 N.L.R.B. at 127. Hermie Joseph's affidavit claims that Hippolyte Victor had threatened that "somebody" would get hurt if the Union was not voted in, that Victor and other hotel maids had threatened to lie to the Employer to cause Joseph to be fired, and that Victor had threatened harm to Albert Hughes both to his face and to the maids. This is certainly material because the Regional Director had based his recommendation on a finding that Victor had made improper remarks to only one employee.

In a proposed bargaining unit of five or six employees, campaign tactics directed at only two or three employees may still affect the outcome of the election. We believe that there is a substantial likelihood that such a disruption of the electoral process occurred in the case at bar. We will therefore remand the case to the Board for an evidentiary hearing on the allegations contained in the Company's motion for reconsideration.

III.

Accordingly, the Company's petition for review will be granted. The cross-application for enforcement of the order of the NLRB will be denied and the case remanded for an evidentiary hearing and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Costs taxed against respondent.

NLRB v. Charles Batchelder Company, Inc.

646 F.2d 33 (2d Cir.), March 23, 1981—250 NLRB 89

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FEINBERG, Chief Judge, NEWMAN, Circuit Judge, and MISHLER,* District Judge

35

MISHLER, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the "Board") petitions this court pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), for enforcement of its order issued against Charles Batchelder Company, Inc. (the "Company") on June 25, 1980.[1] The sole issue is whether the record contains substantial evidence to support the Board's findings: (1) that the Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3), by discharging one of its employees and by refusing to rehire another and (2) that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by promising and granting accelerated wage increases to its employees.[2] The Board, adopting in part the recommended order of the Administrative Law Judge (the "ALJ"), directed the Company to cease and desist from certain unfair labor practices and to take affirmative action to remedy its statutory violations. We grant the petition for enforcement only to the extent that the Board's order relates to the Company's promise and grant of accelerated wage increases to its employees.

FACTS

In April 1978 the Company[3] announced a break with tradition and informed its employees that the annual wage increases which were customarily effected every May 1 would be deferred until September 1978. The employees were advised that the change was being made in order to conform the timing of the wage increases to the Company's new fiscal year end but that the employees would not be penalized as a result since the increases would be retroactive to May 1. Nevertheless, employee objections ensued and employee Steven Carmichael, at the suggestion of fellow employee Edward Fleming, contacted Local 1040 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the "Union") on May 8, 1978 and met with a representative that same day.

*Honorable Jacob Mishler, Senior United States District Judge, Eastern District of New York, sitting by designation.

[1] The decision of the Board is reported at 250 NLRB No. 9 (1980).

[2] The provisions of the Act which are pertinent to our review of this unfair labor practice proceeding read as follows:

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of [Title 29 of the United States Code];
>
> * * * * *
> (3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *.

29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (3).

[3] Charles Batchelder Company, Inc. is a Connecticut corporation engaged in the smelting and manufacture of aluminum ingots. It has a work force of approximately 35 employees and its plant is operated during three separate shifts.

Within a few hours after Carmichael's meeting with Union representative Edward Iula, Carmichael met with Fleming and discussed what had transpired. The two agreed to initiate an organizational campaign and vigorously embarked upon that course through their concerted efforts. Between May 9 and May 12 both employees actively promoted the Union through their discussions with fellow employees and their solicitations of authorization cards.[4] In addition to setting up a meeting for the Company employees on May 14 with Union representative Iulo, Carmichael successfully engaged a fellow employee, Tom Elliot, to assist him in posting Union organizational literature in various locations around the shop, including the restrooms, and an area immediately adjacent to their work place.

Two of the unfair labor practice charges arise out of the discharge of Edward Fleming on the afternoon of Friday, May 12, after he threatened a fellow employee, Joseph Emanuelle, who had indicated that he would not attend the union meeting scheduled by Carmichael for the following Sunday. It is undisputed that Fleming responded to Emanuelle's rejection of his personal invitation by blocking his egress, coaxing him to come to the meeting by stating that it was for Emanuelle's own benefit, and threatening him with physical retaliation. As recounted by Emanuelle, Fleming stated that, "If you don't like it I'll take you out in the parking lot and kick your ass * * *." Emanuelle, who had been on friendly terms with Fleming prior to the May 12 incident, failed to return to his job and immediately reported the incident to shop foreman Plourde. Emanuelle testified that he had been frightened by his encounter with Fleming and this was corroborated by Plourde, who stated that Emanuelle was "shook up * * * pale and scared" at the time he reported the incident.

Plourde reported the incident to Ronald Beilin and Bruce Batchelder.[5] Thereafter Emanuelle repeated his account of what had just occurred and after hearing his statement Beilin and Plourde discussed Fleming in general. All parties then present were aware of Fleming's union activities. In the course of their conversation Beilin requested that Plourde comment specifically on Fleming's work record. He answered that Fleming was a fair worker but he ahd some problems with adsenteeism. Plourde ultimately recommended discharge and Beilin concurred. After Plourde had brought a police officer on the scene Fleming was summon into Plourde's office to render his version of the incident. The focus of the discharge interview concerned his threat against Emanuelle though the issue of Fleming's absenteeism record was also raised. Plourde rejected Fleming's version of the occurrence as did the ALJ,[6] and then advised Fleming that he was discharged. The police officer escorted him off the Company's premises.

Shortly thereafter Carmichael learned of Fleming's discharge and confronted shop foreman Plourde stating, "If Fleming is let go, I am leaving too." Plourde cautioned him that, "If you walk out now don't bother to come back," to which Carmichael acknowledged his understanding and left the plant. However, within one-half hour following his departure from the Company plant Carmichael telephoned Plourde requesting to have his job back and stated, "I want to apologize for my hasty decision, and see if I can come back to work." Plourde answered, "I [must] think about it * * *. Call me back Monday morning." When they next communicated on Monday morning Plourde stated that Carmichael could not have his job back. It is undisputed that Carmachael quit and was not discharged.[7] [4] All dates refer to 1978 unless otherwise indicated.

[5] The management personnel charged with supervising the daily operations at the plant and who were involved in the alleged unfair labor practices are: Ronald Beilin, the vice president of operations, Armand Plourde, the shop foreman and Bruce Batchelder, son of the president (employed in a supervisory capacity).

Approximately two years prior to the birth of union activity at the Company in 1978, at least one member of management, Bruce Batchelder, had expressed a strong anti-union sentiment to nonsupervisory personnel. When the first overt signs of union activity surfaced on the morning of May 12, Bruce Batchelder called a foreman's meeting "to find out what was going on."

[6] The ALJ found that "[a]s between Emanuelle and Fleming, the testimony of Emanuelle was the more believable." After examining the record, the Board found no basis for reversing the ALJ's credibility determinations, and in doing so, it recognized the great weight to which such determinations are entitled. NLRB v. Bausch & Lomb, Inc., 526 F.2d 817, 822 (2d Cir. 1975). Accordingly, we also accept this determination by the examiner who heard the testimony.

In the wake of these disputes the union meeting which had been scheduled for May 14 went forward as planned. Thereafter, union activity continued. Fleming and Carmichael filed unfair labor practice charges against the Company on May 22. The Board's consolidated complaint issued on June 30, 1978 and stated that the Act had been violated by their discharge in retaliation for their union activity. During the two to three week period following their discharge, Fleming and Carmichael handbilled the Company's plant with the assistance of union agents. Union related activity subsided after this effort and all overt activity cease by early June.[8]

In mid-June the Company notified all employees that the new wage increase would become effective July 1, rather than September 1 as announced prior to the advent of union activity. The proffered explanation for the implementation of accelerated benefits was that the Company desired to quell employee dissatisfaction arising from the uncertainty concerning the amount of wage increases which would be forthcoming.

The Board, in agreement with the ALJ, found that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by promising and granting wage increases to discourage employees from participating in union activity. Accordingly, the Board ordered the Company to cease and desist from promising and granting benefits for the purpose of inducing employees to refrain from engaging in union activity. However, the Board rejecting a portion of the ALJ's recommendation, found that the Company had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3), by discharging Edward Fleming and by refusing to reemploy Steven Carmichael because they engaged in protected union activity. In overturning the decision of the ALJ with respect to these charges, the Board determined that the asserted grounds for the respective discharge and failure to rehire were merely pretextual an that their employment difficulties sprung solely from their pro-union stand. The Board issued the traditional orders which would be expected in light of its findings and further ordered immediate and full reinstatement, retroactive to May 12, of Fleming and Carmichael.

DISCUSSION

In determining whether the findings of the National Labor Relations Board are supported by substantial evidence, a court "may not 'displace the Board's choice between two fairly conflicting views, even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo.' " NLRB v. Walton Manufacturing Co., 369 U.S. 404, 405, 82 S.Ct. 853, 854, 7 L.Ed.2d 829 (1962) (per curiam), quoting Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). We have examained the record keeping in mind this well established proposition.

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term of condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3).[9] However, even with the protection afforded by the Act to employees who organize and engage in union activities, an employer in the pursuit of the right to manage his enterprise is not left impotent to discipline an employee for misconduct in the course of employment or for other valid reasons.[10] See e. g., American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 311, 85 S.Ct. 955, 963–964, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965); Waterbury Community Antenna, Inc. v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 90, 96 (2d Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Advanced Business Forms Corp., 474 F.2d 457, 464, (2d Cir. 1973), citing NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 45–46, 57 S.Ct. 615, 628, 81 L.Ed. 893 (1937). There are of course restrictions on this power of management and the Board was corrected in identifying the issue of whether the Company's actions were motivated by lawful or unlawful reasons as the key question for their examination. See B. G. Costich & Sons, Inc., NLRB, 613 F.2d 450, 454 (2d Cir. 1980).

[7] At the hearing before the ALJ, the question of whether Carmichael was discharged or quit was hotly disputed. Carmichael contended that he had departed from the plant after inhaling noxious fumes which were emitted from his furnace and then becoming sick, i. e., he left work because he had fallen ill. The report by the ALJ stated that there was a sharp conflict in the testimony concerning the circumstances under which Carmichael had been terminated. At least five persons testified on this subject. After determining that Carmichael was "an unreliable witness, whose testimony was marked by important contradictions and * * * a lack of candor," the ALJ found that Carmichael quit in the face of Plourde's warning and had not been discharged.

[8] The Company contends that union activity and the union organizational campaign had abated some week before "early June." Their evaluation of the evidence contained in the record is reasonable, and perhaps, it is the preferable view of the facts. Nevertheless, the inference is available from the record that union activity continued through early June and that finding is supported by substantial evidence.

[9] With respect to the employee terminations the complaint also charged, and the Board found, a violation of section 8(a)(1). However, because the alleged violation of that section arises out of the same operative facts that surround the charged section 8(a)(3) violation, the ALJ, the Board, and the petitioner have not treated it discretely, apparently assuming that it stands or falls together with the 8(a)(3) charge. We agree.

When an employer has both valid and invalid grounds for disciplining an employee, commonly referred to as a "dual motive", any action taken against the affected employee will not constitute an unfair labor practice unless it is shown that there is " 'a reasonable basis for inferring that the permissible ground alone would not have led to the discharge, so that it was partially motivated by an impermissible one.' " Waterbury Community Antenna, Inc. NLRB, 587 F.2d at 98, quoting NLRB v. Park Edge Sheridan Meats, Inc., 341 F.2d 725, 728 (2d Cir. 1965). Under this test "[t]he magnitude of the impermissible ground is immaterial * * * as long as it was the 'but for' cause of the discharge." Id. at 98 (citations omitted). With respect to the instant controversy, the Board fond that the impermissible ground was the only basis 39 for the Company's action and that the ostensible justification offered by the Company for the respective discharge and refusal to rehire were merely pretextual.[11] The Board has defined a pretextual justification as follows:

> Examination of the evidence may reveal * * * that the [employer's] asserted justification is a sham in that the purported rule or circumstance advanced by the employer did not exist, or was not, in fact, relied upon. When this occurs, the reason advanced by the employer may be termed pretextual. Since no legitimate business justification for the discipline exists, there is, by strict definition, no dual motive.

Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150 (1980) (emphasis added). Accordingly, in reviewing the Board's findings we need not engage in the "but for" analysis since the question before the Board was not the extent to which the Company relied on valid grounds for its action, but whether the stated grounds were the real ones.[12]

Even though the Board accepted the ALJ's credibility findings, it nevertheless overturned the decision of the ALJ and found that Fleming's threat against Emanuelle was not the basis for his discharge. It relied on four facts and circumstances in finding that the discharge was motivated solely by anti-union sentiment. All but the first of these enumerated reasons—the fact that Fleming had been "a long-term satisfactory employee"—are unpersuasive of its conclusion. The Board found that the record was devoid of any indication that Fleming's language was more than a simple angry statement—that his statement was neither intended to be, nor reasonably could have been, interpreted literally. This view is contrary to Emanuelle's credited testimony that he had been frightened by the threat and had a reasonable basis for believing that [10] Further, as stated by Judge Friendly, "* * * if an employee is discharged for neglect or delinquency, there is no violation simply because he was engaged in organizing and the employer sheds no tears at his loss." NLRB v. Park Edge Sheridan Meats, 341 F.2d 725, 728 (2d Cir. 1965).

[11] The Board's Decision and Order states:

> [W]e must decide whether [the] circumstances support the conclusion urged on us by the General Counsel that Fleming was discharged for unlawful reasons, rather than for the lawful reasons advanced by Respondent.
> [W]e find * * * that the reasons given by Respondent for Fleming's discharge were wholly pretextual and that Fleming was in fact discharged for his prounion stand.
> [W]e find the reason given for the refusal to be pretext and that Carmichael was refused reemployment because of his prounion activity.

250 NLRB No. 9 (1980).

[12] Since the "in part" test is no longer the rule in this Circuit, we could not enforce the Board's order merely because we might conclude that the Company's actions were premised upon legal and illegal motivations. Without deciding whether we should apply the "but for" analysis to the record before us when the Board has not made the necessary findings under that test, we note that our conclusions today would remain unaltered if we were to engage in such an analysis.

Fleming would carry it out.[13] 250 NLRB No. 9 at note 1. Further, in discounting the seriousness of Fleming's threat the Board relied on the Company's settlement offer to hire Fleming made six months after his discharge to show that the Company never considered him to have violent tendencies. The subsequent offer, of doubtful admissibility as a settlement offer, does not provide a substantial basis for rejecting the bona fide belief six months earlier that Fleming's threat justified his discharge. Next, the Board noted that the decision to discharge Fleming was made without affording him an opportunity to present his version of the incident. Under the circumstances, this point warrants no discussion. Finally, the Board also relied on Plourde's reference to Fleming's absenteeism at the discharge interview as evidence of the Company's bad faith since his absentee record was not any worse that other employees who had not been discharged. However, as a matter of credibility, the ALJ found that comment to have been no more than a response to Beilin's inquiry about Fleming's work record and not an independent basis of causation for the discharge. And, the very discussion of Fleming's work record at the management conference prior to management's confrontation with him was relevant to the decision at hand and appropriate. See Illinois Ruan Transport Corp. v. NLRB, 404 F.2d 274, 280 (8th Cir. 1968). As stated earlier, only the fact of Fleming's status as a long-term satisfactory employee is persuasive of the Board's conclusion. However, this fact standing alone does not amount to substantial evidence in the face of evidence that the Company has not tolerated similar threats in the past. NLRB v. Park Edge Sheridan Meats, Inc., 341 F.2d at 728 (stating that the General Counsel "will normally lose if the employer can establish a record of discharge for similar conduct").

Our view of the record leads us to the conclusion that the Board's characterization of Fleming's threat and its finding that the threat was not the ground for discharge amounts to nothing more than the mere substitution of its hindsight judgment for a decision which is properly vested in management. the Board engaged in mere speculation when it concluded that the proffered ground for discharge was pretextual. Before an undisputed threat of violence to an employee can be written off as pretextual with the consequent impact of depriving the employer of his right of management, more evidence than is before us now must be presented.[14]

With respect to the unfair labor practice charge arising out of management's refusal to rehire Carmichael, the record is also devoid of substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion. It is undisputed that Carmichael quit after learning of Fleming's discharge. He abandoned the Company during mid-shift and in the face of Plourde's cautionary instruction not to quit. In doing so, Carmichael committed a serious breach of his employment obligation—the departure of Carmichael and Fleming, both furnace operators, left the Company with only one of the three furnaces attended by a furnace operator. The ALJ found that the Company's decision was not attributable, even in part, to Carmichael's union activity because the only basis for such an inference arises from his key role in the union organization campaign. Nevertheless, the Board found that he was denied reemployment for union-related reasons since the announced basis for the Company's refusal to rehire Carmichael was without a rational foundation.[15]

[13] In addition to Emanuelle's testimony that he had been scared by Fleming's threat, the record discloses the following answers given by Emanuelle at the hearing before the ALJ:

Q. Why [were you scared]?

A. Well, it's common knowledge at the shop that [Fleming is] an ex-con, and nobody to be messed with.

* * * * *

Q. Did you feel you were going to get hit then and there?

A. I was expecting it.

In face of this credited testimony, the Board suggests that the fact that Emanuelle and Fleming had been on friendly terms provides some showing that Emanuelle did not really fear Fleming. On the facts before us, we believe this inference must be disregarded since it is without a rational basis. See e.g., NLRB v. Local 50, American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Union, 339 F.2d 324, 328 n.4 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 827, 86 S.Ct. 62, 15 L.Ed.2d 72 (1965); NLRB v. Miranda Fuel Co., Inc., 326 F.2d 172, 184 (2d Cir. 1963) (Friendly, J., dissenting).

[14] It is interesting to note that Fleming testified that the union representative, Mr. Iulo, had told Carmichael that his signature on the union authorization card would immunize him from discharge. Based upon this representation, Fleming assumed he too acquired immunity by signing the union authorization card.

[15] The Company contends that the Board unfairly found a different violation than that which was charged in the Board's complaint—refusal to rehire rather than discharge. The transcript of the hearing before the ALJ indicates that the issue as to discharge was hotly contested. On the other hand, only one question at the hearing was directed to why the Company failed to rehire Carmichael. Though we have not been supplied with a copy of the Board's complaint our reading of the record and the report of the ALJ leads us to believe that the General Counsel raised this charge only after the hearing before the ALJ had been concluded. The

In arriving at this conclusion, the Board relied on three facts: that Carmichael was a satisfactory employee for many years; that the incident occurred shortly after Carmichael became involved in union activity; and that in the Board's view, Carmichael's indiscretion on May 12 which lasted no longer than one-half hour considered together with his prior resignation in 1976 for which he provided the Company with adequate notice did not render him a useless employee.[16] Based upon the foregoing, the Board found there was no justifiable basis for denying reemployment, and therefore concluded that the articulated basis must have been pretextual. We disagree. Carmichael's misconduct was serious [17] and there is no evidence that the Company ever condoned similar conduct. Nor was the Company's belief that Carmichael's history of quitting rendered him unreliable, and therefore "useless," without a rational foundation. There also is merit in the Company's point that it must have some capacity to back up the authority of its supervisors.

Simply stated, the Board has used speculation, rather than substantial evidence, in arriving at its conclusion. The record indicates only a weak showing of union animus at the time Carmichael quit. However, even if the Company had exhibited a somewhat stronger anti-union sentiment, Carmichael's union membership alone does not measure up to substantial evidence in support of the Board's order that Carmichael be reinstated.

As to the July 1978 wage increase, even though the question is a close one, we believe the Board's conclusion is supported by substantial evidence.[18]

The petition for enforcement is granted in part; the order of the Board is modified by vacating paragraphs 1(a), 2(a), and 2(b) thereof and by appropriately modifying the notice which must be posted.

NEWMAN, Circuit Judge, concurring: I concur in all of the conclusions reached in Judge Mishler's thorough opinion for the Court and in virtually all of his opinion, but add these additional views in an attempt to clarify analysis of employer motivation cases under §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, especially in the aftermath of the Board's significant opinion in Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150 (slip op. Aug. 27, 1980), [1980] Lab.L. Rep. (NLRB Dec.) (CCH) ¶ 17,356.

In Wright Line, the Board surveyed the assortment of pronouncements in prior decisions of the Board and the Courts of Appeals and concluded that the correct framework for determination of employer motivation is the model adopted by the Supreme Court in Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977). Applying Mt. Healthy to the context of a § 8(a)(3) claim, the Board announced that the General Counsel must make "a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected con-single question put to Plourde concerning why Carmichael was not permitted to return to work on May 12, in the context of the lengthy hearing before the ALJ, did not by itself provide adequate notice to the Company that this different charge had been placed in issue.

In part, the Board's decision with respect to Carmichael was based upon the fact that the Company failed to advance any reason for its refusal to reemploy Carmichael. However, by virtue of the allegations in the Board's complaint, see Decision of Adminstrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz (June 13, 1979), and by virtue of what was litigated at the hearing before the ALJ, the Company had no reason to offer evidence on this subject. After establishing that Carmichael in fact had quit on May 12 the Company adequately rebutted the charge in the Board's complaint. The prejudice to the Company in the Board's finding of a different violation is obvious. See Electri-Flex Co. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 1327, 1335 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 911, 99 S.Ct. 280, 58 L.Ed.2d 256 (1978); Engineers and Fabricators, Inc. v. NLRB, 376 F.2d 482, 485 (5th Cir. 1967); Steel-Feb, Inc., 212 NLRB No. 41 (1974); Glasgow Industries, Inc., 210 NLRB No. 22 (1974); see generally, Bernard Schwartz, Administrative Law, §§ 96–97 (1976).

Since we have not been furnished with a copy of the Board's complaint and amendments thereto, if any, we hesitate to deny enforcement on the ground that the Company was not properly apprised of the charge against it. However, it is unnecessary to resolve this point since the Board's order with respect to this charge is otherwise unenforceable for a lack of substantial evidence.

[16] On examination by the General Counsel, Plourde testified that he rejected Carmichael's rquest to return to work because his practice of quitting made Carmichael "useless to [him]."

[17] The Board implicitly finds that Carmichael's conduct was not a serious breach of his employment obligation by stating that he "was denied reemployment for a wholly unsubstantial reason." Its decision rejected the ALJ's explanation of the Company's refusal—that Carmichael's conduct threatened the viability of the Company's operations on May 12—since the Company itself did not offer the explanation in its own behalf. This logic is fatally flawed since it appears that the "refusal to rehire" was not litigated before the ALJ, see note 15, supra. Such evidence was not introduced since it was irrelevant to the charged unfair labor practice. Accordingly, the Board should not have discounted the seriousness of Carmichael's conduct to the point of ignoring it.

[18] See note 8, supra.

duct." Slip op. at 20–21, [1980] Lab.L.Rep., supra, at 32469. Thus, the Board has rejected all vestiges of the "in part" test of motivation and adopted the "but for" test, with the burden on the employer, after a prima facie case is shown, to establish that he would have taken the same action if only the valid ground had existed. If the employer fails to sustain his burden, then it can be concluded that he would not have acted "but for" the protected conduct, and only in that event is such conduct a legally significant cause of the employer's action; if the employer satisfies his burden, then he avoids liability, even though he may in fact have relied "in part" on the protected conduct when he decided to take action.

The Board suggests in Wright Line that "an additional benefit which will result from our use of the Mt. Healthy test is that the perceived significance in distinguishing between pretext and dual motive cases will be obviated." Slip op. 20 n.13, [1980] Lab.L. Rep., supra at 32472. That suggestion bears examination in this case, because Judge Mishler's opinion analyzes this case as one of pretext, rather than dual motive, thereby implicitly indicating that the distinction serves a useful purpose.

To see why this is so, at least to some extent, requires a clear understanding of the analytical processes involved (1) in examining whether a ground asserted by an employer is a "pretext" and (2) in applying the "but for" test to an employer's dual motivation. Simply stated, "pretext" analysis asks, "What happened?" "But for" analysis asks, "What would have happened?" When we say an asserted ground is a pretext, we mean that we do not believe the employer when he says that he relied upon that ground in taking the challenged action.[1] When we say an employer has not sustained his burden under the "but for" test, we mean that he has not proven that he would have acted the same way if only the valid ground had existed. Of course, "but for" analysis asks the hypothetical question as to what would have happened in order to reach a conclusion as to the legal significance of what did happen, but the fact that both approaches answer the same ultimate legal question should not obscure the different factual inquiries each pursues.

The Board is correct in suggesting in Wright Line that "but for" analysis can serve as the sole analytical model, but this does not eliminate the distinction between "but for" and "pretext" analysis. Relying on "but for" analysis subsumes "pretext" analysis within "but for" analysis in some cases and renders it unnecessary in others. In every case, the Board can ask, "Would the employer have taken the same action if only the valid ground had existed?" If the answer is no, the employer loses, and in that event the Board need not determine whether the employer really did rely on the valid ground in the actual case, or whether the employer really would have relied on the valid ground in the hypothetical case where only the valid ground existed. If the answer to the "but for" inquiry is yes, the employer wins, but in order to answer yes, the Board must have concluded that in the hypothetical case where only the valid ground existed, the employer really would have relied on it, and this conclusion will be reached only if the Board concludes that in the actual case the employer really did rely on the valid ground. Thus, to answer the "but for" questions in the employer's favor, the Board will have to have made a "pretext" analysis and found in the employer's favor.

Conversely, the Board can start with pretext analysis, in which event it will have to move on to "but for" analysis only in some cases. In every case the Board can ask, "Did the employer really rely on the asserted, valid ground?" If the answer is no, the employer loses, and the Board need never make the hypothetical inquiry necessary for "but for" analysis. If the answer to the "pretext" inquiry is yes, the case is then one of dual motivation, and the Board must then move on to "but for" analysis and ask, "Would the employer have relied on the valid ground if it had been the only existing ground?"

[1] In the Wright Line excerpt quoted by Judge Mishler, supra at ———, the Board maintains that the employer's asserted ground is pretextual if the ground either "did not exist, or was not, in fact, relied upon." It is probably not accurate and certainly not helpful to condsider as pretextual all situations where the employer asserts a ground that does not in fact exist. "Pretext" analysis focuses on the employer's thought process and inquires whether he is to be believed when he says that he relied on an asserted ground. If the employer believes the employee has committed some act of misconduct, and discharges him based on this belief, then the asserted ground is not a pretext, even if the employee in fact is innocent. Of course, the circumstances would have to provide substantial indication that the employee is not innocent before the employer's belief could be credited. However, where the asserted ground for the employer's action is some rule that does not in fact exist, "pretext" analysis is proper. If an employee is five minutes late and the employer discharges him, claiming he relied on a rule that such tardiness always results in discharge, evidence that such a rule does not exist obviously shows that the one instance of tardiness has been seized upon as a pretext for the discharge. Even in this example, the fact of tardiness exists; what does not exist is any rule concerning such tardiness. To say the fact of the rule does not exist is simply another way of saying the employer is not to be believed when he says he relied on the fact of tardiness.

The point is that the Mt. Healthy "but for" formula does not always eliminate the distinction between "pretext" and "dual motivation" cases. The further point is that analysis of any § 8(a)(3) case can begin with either the "pretext" inquiry as to what actually happened or the "but for" inquiry as to what would have happened. Whichever inquiry is first made, a no answer ends the case, and the employer loses; a yes answer obliges the Board to move on to the other inquiry, or implicitly to have considered it.

Moreover, as this case illustrates, it will sometimes be more sensible for the Board to start with "pretext" analysis. In this case the Board did not ask, "Would the employer have discharged Fleming if the only existing ground had been his threat to Emanuelle?" Instead the Board pursued "pretext" analysis and asked "Did the employer really rely on the threat episode?" The Board answered that qestion no, and therefore ruled against the employer. By using "pretext" analysis and inquiring as to what actually happened, the Board avoided the need to make the more speculative "but for" analysis and to inquire as to what would have happened if the threat episode had been the only existing ground. Had there been substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion, "pretext" analysis alone would have sufficed.

An additional complication arises when the Board's decision in a § 8(a)(3) case is reviewed on appeal. In this case, Judge Mishler's opinion for the Court suggests that since the Board used "pretext" analysis, we need not engage in "but for" analysis, supra at 39. I can agree that we need not, but I believe we should. Moreover, if contrary to my view, we do not engage in "but for" analysis, then the more appropriate disposition of the appeal would be a remand. To take the second point first, we all agree that the Board made a "pretext" analysis in concluding that the employer did not in fact rely on Fleming's threat when it decided to discharge him. We also all agree that the record lacks substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion, and we therefore decline to enforce the portion of the Board's order resting on that conclusion. However, if we were to end our consideration at that point, we would, in effect, have decided that the employer really did rely on Fleming's threat. As discussed previously, this yes answer to the "pretext" inquiry does not end the case; it simply requires moving on to the "but for" analysis, since at this point all we have decided is that the employer had two motives in mind, Fleming's threat and his protected organizing activity.[2] To sustain his discharge, it is necessary to find that the employer would have discharged Fleming if the threat had been the only existing ground. Therefore, if we are not going to make the "but for" analysis, we should remand to the Board to permit it to make that analysis and then review its conclusion to see if it is supported by substantial evidence.

However, I believe it is appropriate and preferable, at least in a case such as this, for the reviewing court to avoid the delay of a remand and move on to "but for" analysis. I think we can safely assume that since the Board concluded from the evidence that the employer did not really rely on Fleming's threat, the Board, if reversed on that conclusion and obliged to move on to "but for" analysis, would inevitably conclude that the employer would not have discharged Fleming if the threat had been the only existing ground. If the Board throught there was no reliance on this ground, it could hardly think there would have been independently sufficient reliance.[3] Having found no substantial evidence to support the Board's "pretext" conclusion, we should therefore assume the Board would also rule against the employer on a "but for" analysis and proceed to consider whether there is substantial evidence for that conclusion. As Judge Mishler's opinion points out, supra at 39 n.12, there is not substantial evidence for that conclusion either, and for that reason enforcement of the order concerning Fleming is properly denied, without the need for a remand. The same reasoning applies to the portion of the order concerning the failure to rehire Carmichael. For these reasons, I join the Court's opinion.

[2] In saying this, I assume we are not prepared to say that the record lacks substantial evidence to support a conclusion that Fleming's protected organizing activity was part of the employer's motivation in discharging him.

[3] Indeed, in some cases, when the Board applies "pretext" analysis and concludes that the employer did not rely on the asserted ground, it may have intuitively applied "but for" analysis and implicitly concluded that the employer would not have relied on the asserted ground, if it had been the only existing gound.

Precision Striping, Inc. v. NLRB

642 F.2d 1144 (9th Cir.), March 23, 1981—245 NLRB 169

On petition to review Board Order

Before SKOPIL and ALARCON, Circuit Judges, and REED,* District Judge

1145

SKOPIL, Circuit Judge: Precision Striping, Inc. ("Precision") petitions for review of a decision of the National Labor Relations Boad ("the Board"), 245 NLRB No. 34, 102 LRRM 1264 (1979). The Board cross-applies for enforcement of its order.

In March 1978, Precision informed the Painters' District Council No. 5 of the International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades ("the Union") that the Union had failed to establish majority support among the employees in the bargaining unit, and Precision was repudiating their bargaining agreement. The Union filed charges with the Board.

FACTS

Precision is a construction contractor. In June 1977 Precision signed an agreement with the Union effective through May 1980. This agreement succeeded two prior agreements, covering periods from April 1973 to June 1974, and from June 1974 through May 1977. Each of these contracts contained an eight-day union-security clause. There is some dispute regarding strict enforcement of the security clause. In July 1977 two of Precision's six employees were union members, and by September 1977, four of Precision's five employees were members. The Union never demonstrated that it represented a majority of Precision's employees, prior to the unfair labor practice proceeding.

In March 1978, Precision polled its employees to determine if they wanted to be represented by the Union. There is no dispute as to the lawful conduct of the poll. Four employees voted against such representation; one voted in favor. Precision repudiated the agreement. It ceased contributing to the pension and health and welfare trusts.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW

The Union filed unfair labor practice charges against Precision. The Board issued a complaint alleging violations of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act") in refusing to bargain and unilaterally changing conditions of employment.

The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") concluded that Precision had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) by repudiating a collective bargaining agreement without establishing a good faith doubt, based on objective factors, of the Union's majority status. Precision filed exceptions.

The Board affirmed. It based its conclusion on a finding that:

> When Respondent polled its employees and withdrew recognition from the Union in March 1978, four of the five employees were union members in good standing. It therefore follows that the Union, possessing majority support from Respondent's employees at that time, was their collective-bargaining representative as defined in Section 9(a) of the Act, and was entitled to the irrebuttable presumption of majority status flowing from a valid labor agreement in such circumstances. Respondent thus did not have the right to repudiate its contract with the Union, or to poll its employees on the issue of continued Union representation, irrespective of whether it had a reasonable doubt, based upon objective considerations, of the Union's majority status. We therefore find entirely inapposite, and do not adopt, the Administrative Law Judge's discussion regarding whether respondent's poll was prompted by a reasonable doubt of the Union's majority support grounded in objective criteria.

102 LRRM at 1265.

Precision argues that the Board erred in finding that the Union possessed majority support and that Precision was therefore prohibited from repudiating the bargaining agreement.

ISSUE

Did the Board err in finding that Precision committed an unfair labor practice in repudiating its agreement with the Union?

DISCUSSION

I. Standard of Review

The rule adopted by the Board is judicially reviewable for consistency with the Act, and for rationality. If it satisfies those criteria, the Board's application of the rule, if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, must be enforced. Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB ,437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978); NLRB v. International Harvester Co., 618 F.2d 85, 87 (9th Cir. 1980). The Board's interpretation of the Act is entitled to considerable deference. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 497, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1849, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979); International Harvester Co., supra.

II. The Nature of the Agreement

The agreements entered into between Precision and the Union are "pre-hire agreements," permitted in the construction industry by section 8(f) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(f). Such agreements allow an employer to bargain with a union before the union has attained majority status under section 9 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159. to avoid imposing union representation on non-consenting employees, the Act provides that the agreements shall not be a bar to decertification petitions filed pursuant to section 9(c)(1)(A) of the Act. 29 U.S.C. § 158(f). Such agreements permit use of eight-day union security clauses, such as the one used here. Id.[1]

III. Effect of the Section 8(f) Agreement

An employer's duty to bargain and honor a section 8(f) agreement is contingent upon the Union's obtaining majority support in the bargaining unit.[2] NLRB v. Local 103, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Ironworkers ("Higdon"), 434 U.S. 335, 345, 98 S.Ct. 651, 657, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978); Authorized Air Conditioning Company v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 899, 907 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 950, 100 S.Ct. 1598, 63 L.Ed.2d 785 (1980).[3] When the Union obtains majority support, the parties' pre-hire agreement becomes a collective-bargaining agreement executed by the employer with the Union representing a majority of the employees in the unit. Higdon, 434 U.S. at 350, 98 S.Ct. at 660; Authorized Air Conditioning, 606 F.2d at 905. The pre-hire agreement is thus transformed into a section 9(a) contract. Upon transformation the contract bar rule applies. That rule prohibits challenges to an incumbent union's majority status during the term of an agreement of three years or less. Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835, 838 (9th Cir. 1978).

In this case the Board determined that the Union possessed majority support among Precision's employees because a majority of those employees were union members. The Union contends it was entitled to an irrebuttable presumption of majority status flowing from the existence of a valid labor agreement. We disagree. This position is inconsistent with the Act, inconsistent with prior decisional law, and irrational.

The Board has previously concluded that "there is no basis, either in logic or in policy, to extend to the union which is party to [a section 8(f) agreement] an irrebuttable presumption of majority status. Indeed, we conclude that any such presumption, would be irreconcilable with the final proviso to Section 8(f)." R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 691, 695 (1971), enforcement denied, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C.Cir.1973), remand accepted, 208 NLRB 615 (1974).[4] The Board also recognized that: "It is possible that, in some situations, at least a rebuttable presumption of majority will arise from an 8(f) contract. This might occur, for example, when a union-security agreement is present in the 8(f) contract and has been enforced." Id. at 695 n.5.

[1] The Board's General Counsel argued below that the latest agreement was not a section 8(f) agreement, but does not press that claim here.

[2] The Board's amended complaint alleged, as alternatives, two appropriate bargaining units. One unit consisted of Precision alone. The other was a multi-employer unit. Precision admitted the appropriateness of a single employer unit in its answer. The Board does not contest the issue here, and apparently assumes that the single employer unit is appropriate.

[3] The instant case was brought as an unfair labor practice proceeding. We need not decide whether the union may be entitled to enforcement of the contract under Section 301(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 185. See Contractors Health & Welfare Plan v. Associated Wrecking Co., 638 F.2d 1128 (8th Cir. 1981).

[4] The Board may change its mind, but when it does so it is "obliged to set forth its reasoning in favor of the change in order to avoid the appearance of arbitrariness." NLRB v. Mercy Hospitals of Sacramento, Inc., 589 F.2d 968, 972 (9th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 910, 99 S.Ct. 1221, 59 L.Ed.2d 458 (1979). See NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 380 U.S. 438, 443, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965); Monmouth Medical Center v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 820, 823 (3d Cir. 1979); Bay Medical Center v. NLRB, 588 F.2d 1174, 1177 (6th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 827, 100 S.Ct. 53, 62 L.Ed.2d 35 (1979); Retail Clerks Local 560 v. NLRB, 510 F.2d 802, 807 (D.C.Cir. 1975). The Board has not attempted to do so in this case.

Courts have followed the Board's position that a majority of the employees having become union members pursuant to a union security clause creates only a rebuttable presumption of the union's majority status. Higdon, 434 U.S. at 351 n.12, 98 S.Ct. at 660 n.12; Authorized Air Conditioning, 606 F.2d at 905–06.[5]

It is irrational to hold that majority union membership obtained pursuant to a union security clause creates an irrebuttable presumption of majority union support. A union security clause operates "to compel new employees to join the union," because union membership is the price for obtaining a job. NLRB v. Forest City/Dillon-Tecon Pacific, 522 F.2d 1107, 1109 (9th Cir. 1975). This court has previously stated that: "It is well established that union membership is not always an accurate barometer of union support." Authorized Air Conditioning, 606 F.2d at 906; NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., 584 F.2d 293, 307 (9th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 921, 99 S.Ct. 2847, 61 L.Ed.2d 289 (1979); Sahara-Tahoe Corp. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 767, 772 (9th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 917, 99 S.Ct. 2837, 61 L.Ed.2d 284 (1979). In this case the existence of majority union membership is insufficient by itself to raise an irrebuttable presumption of majority support. See NLRB v. Band-Age, Inc., 534 F.2d 1, 4 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 921, 97 S.Ct. 318, 50 L.Ed.2d 288 (1976).

CONCLUSION

The rule adopted by the Board, that majority union membership obtained pursuant to a union security clause creates an irrebuttable presumption of majority union support, is inconsistent with the Act. Precision's petition for review is granted. The Board's cross-application for enforcement of its order is denied. We remand to the Board for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

[5] Our decision is not inconsistent with NLRB v. Irvin, 475 F.2d 1265 (3d Cir. 1973). In that case, the pre-hire contract was deemed binding only at those projects at which the union had secured a majority. There is no indication that majority union membership itself raised an irrebuttable presumption of majority union support. Id. at 1271. See Higdon, 434 U.S. at 345–46, 98 S.Ct. at 67–58.

NLRB v. Trident Seafoods Corp.

642 F.2d 1148 (9th Cir.), March 23, 1981—244 NLRB 566

On petition to enforce Board Order

1149

FLETCHER, Circuit Judge: This is an application for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board requiring respondent Trident Seafoods to cease and desist its unfair labor practices, to post appropriate notices, and to reinstate with back pay certain striking employees. We enforce the Board's order.

FACTS

Trident operates a seafood processing plant aboard a vessel permanently moored in Akutan Bay, Alaska, a remote area in the Aleutian Islands. The employees involved in this proceeding were hired for the 1978 king crab season. On October 15, 1978, midway through the two-month season, thirteen employees went on strike demanding higher wages. The striking employees rejected Trident's compromise wage offer. Management thereupon discharged twelve of the employees for refusal to work and informed them that they would be ineligible for rehire. The thirteenth striker returned to work. The discharged employees returned to Seattle.

By letter dated October 18 and received by the employees about October 20, Trident informed the discharged employees that it had been mistaken in describing their cessation of work as a discharge and in informing them that they were ineligible for rehire. The letter assured the employees that they would be accorded all rights due strikers under the NLRA.

The employees filed an unfair labor practice charge with the NLRB. The Administrative Law Judge found, and the Board agreed, that Trident had violated § 8(a)(1) of the NLRA by discharging its striking employees. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). That finding is not challenged here. The Board issued a cease and desist order and awarded the employees back pay from the date of discharge until the date they received Trident's letter. Determination of the amount of the back pay award was left for later compliance proceedings.

*The Hon. William J. Jameson, Senior United States District Judge for the District of Montana, sitting by designation.

The Board here petitions to have its order enforced; Trident contests only the award of back pay to the striking employees.

ANALYSIS

Trident argues that it is entitled to a hearing on the propriety of a back pay award as to each employee before the Board's order is enforced, rather than at the stage of compliance proceedings.

A. The Abilities & Goodwill Rule

The Board awarded back pay from the date of discharge, in accordance with its recent change in policy articulated in Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB No. 5, 100 LRRM 1470 (1979), enforcement denied on other grounds, 612 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1979). Prior to that case, discharged strikers were required to make an unconditional request for reinstatement before becoming entitled to back pay, unless such a request was shown to be futile. NLRB v. Ramona's Mexican Foods Prods., Inc., 531 F.2d 390, 395 (9th Cir. 1975); see also NLRB v. Southern Greyhound Lines, 426 F.2d 1299, 1303–04 (5th Cir. 1970). Employees discriminatorily discharged, on the other hand, were not required to request reinstatement in order to trigger the employer's liability for back pay. See Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 NLRB No. 5, 100 LRRM 1470 (1979).

The effect of this change in Board policy is to shift to the employer the burden of proving that the employee would not have accepted a timely offer of reinstatement, had one been made. This court had approved such an approach long before the Board decision in Abilities & Goodwill. Shelly & Anderson Furniture Mfg. Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 497 F.2d 1200, 1204–05 (9th Cir. 1974); accord, NLRB v. Valmac Indus., Inc., 533 F.2d 1075, 1077 (8th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Southern Greyhound Lines, 426 F.2d 1299, 1303 (5th Cir. 1970). The rule is a reasonable one, well within the Board's discretion to establish. NLRB v. J.H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 396 U.S. 258, 262–63, 90 S.Ct. 417, 419–420, 24 L.Ed.2d 405 (1969).

B. The Bifurcated Proceedings

Trident argues that the Board's refusal to take testimony on Trident's possible defenses to the individual back pay awards goes to its liability for back pay, not simply to the amount. Therefore, it contends, the Board's order cannot be enforced unless and until the employees have shown that they would have returned to work had they been offered reinstatement. We disagree.

The Board's right to defer the determination of the amount of back pay liability until after its award has been enforced has long been recognized:

> The Board's procedure in unfair labor practice cases is first to hold a hearing to determine whether an unfair labor practice was committed, and, if it was, whether it would "effectuate the policies" of the Act for the Board to order reinstatement with back pay of any employees who were discharged. In such a proceeding the Board does not concern itself with the amount of back pay actually owing. This is excluded from the proceeding in the interest of the efficient administration of the Act. The determination of specific liabilities may involve a protracted contest. . . . Since the determination that the discharge was wrongful is subject to review, extensive proceedings to determine the amount of liability may be rendered superfluous by reversal. And if the determination is sustained and becomes final, it may be expedient for a respondent to reach agreement and avoid further litigation. The propriety of this established two-stage procedure of the Board in these back-pay cases is not questioned.

NLRB v. Deena Artware, Inc., 361 U.S. 398, 411, 80 S.Ct. 441, 447, 4 L.Ed.2d 400 (1960) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (citations omitted). Accord, UFI Razor Blades, Inc. v. District 65, Wholesale, Retail, Office & Processing Union, 610 F.2d 1018, 1023 (2d Cir. 1979); NLRB v. J.S. Alberici Constr. Co., Inc., 591 F.2d 463, 468–69 & n.6 (8th Cir. 1979). In Great Chinese American Sewing Co. v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 251, 255–56 (9th Cir. 1978), this court held that:

> We agree with the Board that questions relating to the exact amount of back pay owing (including whether discharged employees made reasonable efforts to secure employment, and whether at some reasonably determinable date employment with [the employer] would not have been available because [its] operations would have ceased * * *) are prematurely raised in this enforcement petition. Those issues may be explored in a compliance proceeding.[1]

In this case, as in Great Chinese American Sewing Co., the Board's order makes it very clear that Trident will have an opportunity at the compliance proceedings to present all of its objections to the individual back pay awards.[2]

Accordingly, we conclude that the Board's back pay order was proper and should be ENFORCED.

[1] Our decision in NLRB v. Fort Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596, 602–03 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 915, 100 S.Ct. 1275, 63 L.Ed.2d 599 (1980), is not to the contrary. There we refused to enforce a Board order for reinstatement where:

> The precision in the * * * Board's order makes it clear that no further proceedings were contemplated regarding the number of employees to be reinstated.
> Enforcement of an order so specific would deny the company an opportunity to show that fewer than 72 jobs would have been available regardless of its unfair practices. The reinstatement order therefore cannot stand.

Id. at 603 (citation omitted).

[2] The Board's decision reads in pertinent part:

> Respondent [Trident] has excepted to the failure of the Administrative Law Judge to permit it to question each striker at the hearing as to whether he or she would have agreed to continue working or to return to work if Respondent's notice of separation had merely stated that they were on strike and remained eligible for rehire. Because there has already been a hearing in this matter, we find that this question is best left for the compliance stage of this proceeding and thus we will allow Respondent to put this question to the dischargees then.

NLRB v. North Electric Company, Plant No. 10

644 F. 2d 580 (6th Cir.), March 26, 1981—240 NLRB 220

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Brown and Jones, Circuit Judges, and Phillips, Senior Circuit Judge

Bailey Brown, Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on the petition of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order to North Electric Company, Plant No. 10 (North) to bargain with the Communications Workers of America (Union). The Board's decision and order are reported at 240 N.L.R.B. No. 32.

In October, 1974, a representation election was held at North's plant in Gray, Tennessee. The Union lost the election by a two-to-one margin, 1441 to 762. The Union then filed unfair labor practice charges against North, alleging that North had engaged in prohibited activities that undermined the fairness of the election and demanded a new election. A complaint was issued by the General Counsel and a hearing was held before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ). The ALJ found that North had committed no unfair labor practices during the election campaign and dismissed the complaint. The Board, however, concluded that North had committed unfair labor practices during the campaign, reversed the ALJ and ordered a new election. 225 N.L.R.B. No. 53. This court enforced the Board's order. NLRB v. North Electric, 588 F.2d 213 (6th Cir. 1978).

The second election was conducted on October 6 and 7, 1976. This time the Union won by a vote of 682 to 679. There were five void and two challenged ballots. North filed timely objections to the election on the grounds that (1) employees were unlawfully threatened by Union supporters, and (2) material misrepresentations were made on the eve of the election by the Union to employees at a time when North was unable to effectively reply. The Regional Director, in the exercise of his reasonable discretion decided not to conduct a hearing on North's objections, but he did conduct an administrative investigation pursuant to 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(d). On the basis of his administrative investigation the Regional Director issued a report in which he recommended that North's objections be overruled and the Union be certified. The Board adopted the Regional Director's findings and certified the Union.

North then refused to bargain with the Union. In the unfair labor practice proceeding that followed North acknowledged that it had refused to bargain with the Union, but denied that it had violated Section 8(a)(5) because, North argued, the Board had improperly certified the Union. The Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment and this proceeding followed.

The purpose of North's refusal to bargain was to obtain judicial review of the Board's decision to overrule North's election objections. Here North raises both substantive and procedural complaints about the Board's decision to adopt the Regional Director's report, overrule its objections and certify the Union. The substantive complaint is that the Board, as a matter of law, incorrectly decided the two issues raised by North in the representation proceedings; i. e., employees were unlawfully threatened and material misrepresentations were made by the Union on the eve of the election. The procedural complaint is that the Board did not have the entire record before it when it decided to adopt the Regional Director's report. Since we agree with North that proper procedures were not followed we do not deal with the substantive issues at this time.

The procedural problem with which we are confronted is one that has been recurring with some regularity in the last few years. There seems to have been a rash of cases in which the Regional Director has failed to transmit the record to the Board along with his recommendations. As noted earlier, the Regional Director did not hold a hearing on North's election objections but conducted an administrative investigation. In the process of making his investigation the Regional Director collected and considered a variety of documentary evidence. This evidence is discussed in the Regional Director's report, and, indeed, is relied upon to support the report's conclusions. The Regional Director did not, however, transmit this evidence to the Board as part of the record. The documents that were not transmitted to the Board include a copy of the Union's election eve mailing that North argues contains material misrepresentations, a Union leaflet containing statements related to the mailing, affidavits taken by Board agents of employees who were allegedly threatened and the statement of an employee who was allegedly threatened. Therefore, in considering North's election objections the Board did not have the benefit of actually reviewing the documents in the record. North argues that this was a violation by the Board of its own regulation (29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g)) as well as a denial of procedural due process.

We have considered this issue several times in the past two years and are now called upon to clarify the scope of our prior desisions. The question with which we are confronted is as follows: does 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g) require the Regional Director to transmit the entire record to the Board in cases in which there is only an administrative investigation and no hearing. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g) provides:

> (g) The notice of hearing, motions, rulings, orders, stenographic report of the hearing, stipulations, exceptions, documentary evidence, together with the objections to the conduct of the election or conduct affecting the results of the election, any report on such objections, any report on challenged ballots, exceptions to any such report, any briefs or other legal memoranda submitted by the parties, the decision of the regional director, if any, and the record previously made as described in § 102.68, shall constitute the record in the case. Materials other than those set out above shall not be a part of the record; except that in a proceeding in which no hearing is held, a party filing exceptions to a regional director's report on objections or challenges, a request for review of a regional director's decision on objections or challenges, or any opposition thereto, may append to its submission to the Board copies of documents it has timely submitted to the regional director and which were not included in the report or decision. Immediately upon issuance of a report on objections or challenges, or both, upon issuance by the regional director of an order transferring the case to the Board, or upon issuance of an order granting a request for review by the Board, the Regional Director shall transmit the record to the Board.

The plain language of the regulation seems to require the Regional Director to transmit the entire record to the Board in all cases. The Board argues,[1] however, that the Regional Director is required to transmit the entire record only in cases in which there was a hearing. For this proposition the Board relies on the second sentence of 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g), which provides that in [1] It should be noted that the Board did not bother to brief this issue so we only have the benefit of the thoughts of the Board's counsel at oral argument. The Board's counsel was, however, prepared to, and did, discuss this issue at oral argument.

cases in which no hearing is held the objecting party may submit copies of documents to the Board that were submitted to the Regional Director. The Board's position is that if the Regional Director were required to transmit the record in all cases this provision would be meaningless. The Board also points out that it is not required to hold a hearing on all election objections, nor is it required to make a de novo review after the Regional Director has conducted an administrative investigation.

It is clear that a party objecting to an election has the right to have its objections reviewed by the Board. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69. Simply because a party objects to the conduct of an election does not, however, mean it has the right to a hearing. Under Board regulations either the Regional Director or the Board may determine, in the exercise of reasonable discretion,that a hearing is warranted. On the other hand, after reviewing the objections and the evidence, they may decide that no hearing is necessary. Nothing said here should be taken to indicate that the Board is required to hold a hearing in every case raising election objections. In proper cases election objections may be resolved on the basis of an administrative investigation alone. NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 388, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967).

The present case was decided on the basis of an administrative investigation. North's primary argument is not that it was wrongfully denied a hearing, although that argument is raised, but rather that the Board failed to consider the evidence in the record. The Board argues that it need not review the evidence considered by the Regional Director, and that it may confine its review to the Regional Director's report and the briefs submitted by the parties. We note, though, that even under the Board's interpretation of 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g), while the Regional Director is not required to transmit the record, the objecting party can submit to the Board all the documentary evidence submitted in this fashion.

We reject the Board's interpretation of 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g) and hold that the regulation requires the Board to review all the evidence relied upon by the Regional Director. If the Board's interpretation was accepted we think serious due process problems would be presented. Prestolite Wire Division v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302 (6th Cir.1979) established generally that 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g) requires the Regional Director to trasmit the record to the Board in cases in which no hearing is held. Although Prestolite did not expressly hold that the Regional Director must transmit the record in all cases, it is clear that the court felt the burden was on the Regional Director to do so.

> Without expressly ruling that the Regional Director is invariably required under Section 102.69(g) to transmit to the Board all of the materials considered by him (although the language says "shall"), we think that the better practice is to do so and we are unable to fault the company for having failed to anticipate that this procedure would not have been followed here. It is true that subsection (g) does permit the party filing exceptions to "append to its submission to the Board copies of documents it has timely submitted to the regional director and which were not included in the report or decision." We cannot, however, construe this language to shift from the Regional Director to the petitioner the responsibility for assembling and transmitting the record. The mechanics for such a transmission are lacking and we believe that the Board's review would be more reliably facilitated by following the plain language of its rule. In addition, the petitioner would be entirely without power to transmit the employee affidavits which the investigating officer had obtained.

Id. at 305. The Prestolite reasoning was given its logical extension in NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir.1980) (per curiam). There we stated as a blanket rule:

> This Court also holds that the Board abuses its discretion by adopting the report > of the Regional Director when the Regional Director fails to transmit to the Board the evidence relied upon by the Regional Director.

Id. at 1029.

Without reviewing the evidence it is impossible for the Board to determine whether the Regional Director's recommendations should be followed or set aside. We view the Board's position that it does not have to review the documentary evidence as an abdication of its responsibilities under the National Labor Relations Act. If the Board does not look at the evidence it can do nothing but rubber stamp the Regional Director's decision. Meaningful review is impossible without a review of the evidence. In addition, if the Board does not review the evidence and make it part of the record, it is impossible for a court to review the Board's action, since there is no record to review. We hold that it is an abuse of discretion for the Board to adopt the report of the Regional Director without reviewing the documentary evidence relied upon by the Regional Director.

We further hold that the burden of transmitting the record to the Board lies with the Regional Director. Prestolite outlined all the reasons why the responsibility for transmitting the record to the Board should lie with the Regional Director. 592 F.2d at 305. We think the reasons stated in Prestolite are persuasive and the responsibilty for transmitting the record should be with the Regional Director. Therefore, we confirm the extension of Prestolite that we made in Curtis Noll and require the Regional Director to transmit the record, as defined in the first sentence of 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g), to the Board with the report and recommendations on election objections. This burden is a very slight one and we cannot see that any difficulty will be encountered in complying with it.

Finally, we must determine the appropriate remedy for this violation of procedure by the Board. In both Prestolite and Curtis Noll the procedural posture of the case was identical to the present case: the Board certified the union over objection by the employer, without conducting a hearing or reviewing the evidence relied upon by the Regional Director in making his recommendations. In both of those cases we remanded to the Board with instructions to conduct a hearing on the employer's election objections. Despite the fact that the procedural posture of these cases is identical, we do not think we should order the Board to conduct a hearing in this case.

We have stated previously where, over objection, the Board certifies the union without the benefit of either a hearing or the full record, we will construe the well-pleaded factual assertions in the employer's objections most favorably to the employer. Prestolite Wire Division v. NLRB, 592 F.2d at 306–07. Nonetheless, the question whether a hearing is compelled is to be determined on a case by case basis. In both Prestolite and Curtis Noll, the employer's objections, on their face, raised material factual disputes with the Regional Director's report, and, as a result, the denial of a hearing was an abuse of discretion.

We have carefully reviewed North's objections to the election and its exceptions to the Regional Director's report. Even construing the objections most favorably to North, the objections do not, on their face, raise such material factual disputes to warrant an order to the Board to conduct a hearing. The problem here is more that of interpreting and giving weight to the evidence developed by the Regional Director. Whether these objections, when reviewed with the documentary evidence in the record[2] will be sufficient to require a hearing is a matter better left for the Board to determine. We think the Board is the appropriate body to make this determination in the first instance under these circumstances.

Since the Board adopted the Regional Director's report without viewing the documentary evidence relied upon by the Regional Director, we deny the Board's Petition to Enforce, set aside the certification and remand with instructions to the Board to reconsider the Regional Director's report with the evidence in the record.

Nathaniel R. Jones, Circuit Judge, concurring: Contrary to Circuit precedent, the majority opinion holds that the "plan language" of 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g) requires the Regional Director to transmit to the Board the entire record of documentary evidence compiled in his administrative investigation. As was aptly stated in Randall, Burkhart/Randall Division of Textron, Inc. v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 957 (6th Cir. 1981) at 960–61:

> The regulations that the Board has allegedly violated are found at 29 CFR §§ 102.68 and 102.69(g). Together they state that stipulations, documentary evidence, transcripts of oral arguments before the Regional Director, exhibits, affidavits, etc., are all considered part of the [2] Although North has appended the documents in question to its brief, we do not consider this to be a satisfactory method of augmenting an otherwise incomplete record. Therefore, we do not consider the documents properly before us to review.

record to be transmitted to the Board. This court has on several recent occasions condemned the NLRB practice of refusing to have the full record transmitted, for, even if it does not expressly violate the regulations, the practice allows the Board greater opportunity to abuse its discretion and complicates the problems faced by the reviewing court. Prestolite Wire Div. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302 (6th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. RJR Archer, Inc., 617 F.2d 161 (6th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir. 1980). (emphasis added)

Nor do I believe that due process mandates the majority's construction of 29 CFR § 102.69(g). Such a holding, merely hinted at in the majority opinion, would render their opinion unnecessary and, indeed, misleading. The majority's opinion as currently written "invites" the Board to rewrite 29 CFR § 102.69(g) to clearly require a party other than the Regional Director to transmit to the Board pertinent parts of the documentary evidence compiled in his administrative investigation. At that point, our Court is left where we started.

Because I prefer that we avoid that sense of déjà vu, I would hold that "the Board abuses its discretion when the Regional Director fails to transmit to the Board the evidence relied upon by the Regional Director." NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir. 1980), at 1029.

Because I believe we are bound by the decision in Curtis Noll, I concur in the judgment of the Court. I also concur in the majority opinion's articulation of the appropriate appellate remedies when the Board abuses its discretion.

Karl Kallmann; d/b/a Love's Barbeque Restaurant, No. 62 v. NLRB

640 F.2d 1094 (9th Cir.), March 30, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied September 18, 1981—245 NLRB 78

On petition to review Board Order

Before Goodwin and Boochever, Circuit Judges, and Harris,* District Judge.

Boochever, Circuit Judge: Karl Kallmann, d/b/a Love's Barbeque Restaurant (Kallmann), seeks to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board (Board). The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. The Board found that Kallmann was a successor to Love's Wood Pit Barbeque Restaurant (Love) and that Kallmann had violated section 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a), by refusing to hire the former Love employees because of their union affiliation and by harassing the former employees during their picketing of Kallmann's restaurant. Consequently, the Board ordered that all forty former employees be reinstated and given back pay. We affirm the part of the Board's order finding violations of the Act, but remand for further proceedings on reinstatement and back pay.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

The Hotel, Motel & Restaurant Employee & Bartenders Union (Union), intervenors in this suit, filed an unfair labor practice suit against Love and Kallmann. The following facts were presented at a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ).

Love, a California corporation, operates and franchises restaurants. Love opened Love's Wood Pit Barbeque Restaurant (Restaurant) as a franchise. From 1973 until September 1977 Love operated it as a company-owned restaruant. In 1977, a collective bargaining agreement was in effect between the Union and Love.

In May of 1977, Ronald Mesker, Love's Vice President, spoke with Kallmann regarding the possibility of purchasing the Restaurant. Mesker informed him that Love had a collective bargaining agreement with the Union covering employees at the Restaurant. Franchising negotiations continued during the summer. Love closed the Restaurant at the end of the business day on September 25. The employees were first notified of the closure on September 26. On September 28, Kallmann and Love entered an agreement under which Kallmann became the owner of the Restaurant on a franchise basis.

While the Restaurant was being cleaned, Kallmann prepared to reopen. He rented two rooms at a hotel for interviewing job applicants and advertised at two local colleges and in two newspapers. He interviewed at the hotel for two and one-half days, commencing on October 12. Thereafter, he interviewed at the Restaurant and the advertisements were changed so that the name and address of the Restaurant were provided for the first time. Kallmann conducted all the interviews at the hotel, but David Sebben, assistant manager, conducted some at the Restaurant.[1] Of the 200 applicants, 125 were interviewed. Before October 17, all available positions were filled.

*The Honorable Oren Harris, Senior District Judge, District of Arkansas, sitting by designation.

Seven former employees of the Restaurant applied for positions, but none was hired. Each indicated on the employment application that he or she was a former employee. The seven were: Malone-Morris, Porter, Hansen, Boyd, Logan, Wadsworth and Bishop.[2] Of these seven, four were interviewed.

Porter applied to be a waiter or cook (he had been the head cook). Kallmann testified that although he initially thought that Porter might be a good employee, he subsequently remembered the filthy condition of the kitchen and decided that he did not want that type of employee working for him.

Wadsworth and Logan applied for both dishwasher and cook jobs. Logan testified that after Kallmann read that Logan had previously worked at the Restaurant, Kallmann indicated that there were no positions open except possibly as a dishwasher. After Logan said that he would take a job as a dishwasher, Kallmann told him that he was pretty certain that it was taken. Wadsworth was offered a job as a busboy, but told Kallmann that he was not interested because his seniority warranted a better job. Hansen stated that after she told Kallmann that she had worked at the Restaurant, he exclaimed, "Oh, you were one of them." Kallmann said that he would check her qualifications.

Kallmann initially hired approximately thirty employees, but no former employees were hired. Kallmann established new wage rates and other benefits for his employees. They were lower than those provided to the former employees.

On October 21, the day after the Restaurant reopened, the Union commenced picketing the Restaurant. Although the Union wanted to negotiate a contract, Kallmann declined to discuss the matter. Pingree, a former employee, testified that while she was picketing, Kallmann asked her to lay down her sign and come to work. He said that he would hire her at Union wages, "but it would not be Union."

After the picketing had concluded one day, Logan and Wadsworth were sitting in a car parked near the Restaurant. Sebben, the assistant manager of the Restaurant, testified that he took their picture because he saw the pair rolling what he believed to be marijuana cigarettes.

The ALJ concluded that: (A) by telling employees he did not intend to operate a unionized restaurant and taking pictures, without a valid reason, of employees who had been picketing, Kallmann violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act; (B) Kallmann was not a "successor" to Love; and (C) Kallmann had not violated sections 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act. Both sides filed exceptions to the decision of the ALJ. The Board upheld the ALJ's decision that Kallmann had violated section 8(a)(1) by it actions during the picketing. It reversed the other findings and concluded that: (A) Kallmann was a successor employer, and therefore violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) when he refused to recognize and bargain with the Union, and (B) by refusing to hire the former employees because of their Union affiliation, Kallmann violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3). Kallmann petitioned for review of the Board's order and the Board filed a cross-application for enforcement.

A. KALLMANN'S ACTIVITIES DURING THE PICKETING

Kallmann contends that his statement to Pingree and Turner, that he would hire Pingree under the same conditions as before but that the Restaurant "will not be Union," is not a violation of section 8(a)(1)[3] because it was one of fact and one expressing his view and opinion of the status at the time the statement was made. Section 8(c) protects such an expression if it "contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." 29 U.S.C. § 158(c).

[1] Kallmann testified, however, that Sebben did not interview anyone.

[2] Shawver applied after the Restaurant opened. Roy inquired about employment as a hostess, but Sebben told her the position was filled. Although she did not fill out an application immediately, she testified that on the day the Restaurant reopened she left an application with the hostess.

[3] Section 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), provides:

(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

Kallmann, however, was not merely expressing a view of the status at the time he made the statement. One reasonable inference from the remark is that the Restaurant would remain non-union in the future. Moreover, the statement promised Pingree that benefits (i.e., union wages) would be provided even without union protection.

> [S]tatements * * * made to employees informing them that the company would never bargain with the union and that benefits would be given by the company even without the union * * * violated section 8(a)(1) * * *.

Ingress-Plastene, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 430 F.2d 542, 545 (7th Cir. 1970). There was sufficient evidence from which the Board could find a violation of section 8(a)(1).[4] Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 491, 71 S.Ct. 456, 466, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951) (substantial evidence test for agency findings).

Kallman next contends that Sebben's photographing of Logan and Wadsworth was not a violation of section 8(a)(1) because it was to show that they were rolling a marijuana cigarette, not to harass them for union activity. Neither the ALJ nor the Board, however, believed Sebben's testimony. Thus, there is no basis for overruling the finding that Sebben's actions violated section 8(a)(1). The Board reasonably concluded that such conduct subjected the former employees to harassment.[5]

B. KALLMANN'S FAILURE TO HIRE ANY FORMER EMPLOYEES

The ALJ found that Kallmann did not deliberately refuse to hire the former employees because of their union affiliation. The Board, however, reversed this finding thereby concluding that Kallmann violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3).[6]

Kallmann contends that the Board's finding is not supported by substantial evidence. Moreover, he contends that where, as here, the Board disagrees with the ALJ's findings the evidence supporting the Board's determination must be stronger. This court has rejected Kallmann's second contention.

> The fact that the Board's findings disagree with those of the ALJ does not change this [substantial evidence] standard. The deference accorded to the findings runs in favor of the Board, not the ALJ. It is well settled that we may not substitute our choice between two fairly conflicting interpretations of the facts where the Board's choice is supported by substantial evidence. True enough, the ALJ's determinations on credibility "weigh heavily" in the court's review of the Board's findings contrary to the ALJ's. However, * * * the Board is to be accorded special deference in drawing derivative inferences from the evidence.

Even though the ALJ believed that "Kallmann was not a credible witness when testifying with respect to this very subject [the hiring procedure]," the ALJ found that Kallmann did not refuse to hire the former employees because of their union affiliation. The ALJ based this finding on several factors. First, there was no basis for concluding that any problems between the Union and Love had been brought to Kallmann's attention so that he would be reluctant to hire employees with union sympathies. Second, although Kallmann's testimony was not generally credible, he did appear credible when he stated his belief that when he took over the Restaurant, it would be his choice whether or not there was a union. Thus, Kallmann had no reason to refuse to hire union employees. Third, Kallmann did not refuse employment to all former employees because Wadsworth, and probably Logan, were offered jobs as busboys. Fourth, even though Kallmann's initial advertisements did not list the name of the Restaurant, Kallmann did not interview at the Restaurant during the initial two and one-half days of interviewing, and Kallmann did not give an explanation for these procedures, the ALJ refused to infer that Kallmann was attempting to conceal the reopening from the former employees. Fifth, Kallmann had a valid business reason for not hiring former employees because he felt that the Restaurant had been left in a dirty condition.

Interstate 65 Corp.*, 453 F.2d 269, 274 (6th Cir. 1971) (manager's statement that "there would be no union at the motel" and conditioning employment on willingness to work without a union was sufficient to support violation § 8(a)(1)). Cf. Overnite Transportation Co. v. Fort Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596, 599 n.1 (9th Cir. 1979) (even if the statements were capable of non-coercive interpretation, this court will not weigh differing interpretations as long as the inference drawn by the Board is reasonable).

[5] In the absence of proper justification, the photographing of pickets violates the Act because it has a tendency to intimidate. See N.L.R.B. v. Associated Naval Architects, Inc., 355 F.2d 788, 791 (4th Cir. 1966).

[6] Section 8(a)(3) makes it an unlawful labor practice for an employer:

> by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *.

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3).

[7] When, however, testimonial inferences (credibility determinations based on demeanor) are at issue, the Board's finding will not be sustained when it rests solely on testimony discredited by the ALJ. Even if there is independent evidence, the Board's finding will be more carefully scrutinized. Loomis Courier Serv., Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 595 F.2d 491, 495–96 (9th Cir. 1979). For an extensive discussion of this issue, see Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 565 F.2d 1074 (9th Cir. 1977). It has been stated that " '[w]hile the standard set forth * * * is imprecise, it provides as much clarity as the area affords.' " Id. at 1087 (Duniway, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting N.L.R.B. v. Interboro Contractors, Inc., 388 F.2d 495, 499 (2d Cir. 1967)).

The Board noted that although the ALJ discredited Kallmann's testimony regarding the hiring procedures, the ALJ nevertheless refused to draw the permissible inference that the hiring actions were taken for an unlawful reason—to conceal the reopening. Finding that Kallmann had deliberately refused to hire the former employees because of anti-union animus, the Board took a contrary view. First, Kallmann's statement that he did not intend to let the employees be represented, far from being a mere opinion, supported a finding of unlawful motive. Second, the Board found that Kallmann's "unusual" hiring procedures, which he failed to explain, were designed to conceal the availability of jobs from the former (Union) employees. Third, it also found that Kallmann made no "offers" to former employees because: (A) the offer to Pingree was itself a violation of the Act; (B) the offer of a "possible" busboy position to Wadsworth was not an offer since it was merely an "expression of a possible potential offer" which Kallmann never actualized, and in any event he knew that Wadsworth applied for the cook position; and (C) there was no basis for inferring that Kallmann offered Logan a position.[8] Fourth, the Board found that there was no valid business reason for not hiring the former employees because Kallmann did not offer the uncleanliness of the Restaurant as a defense at the proceedings before the ALJ.[9] Finally, it noted that Kallmann had violated the Act by photographing picketers and making unlawful statements.

The Board did not disagree with the ALJ's assessment of witness credibility,[10] rather it drew different inferences from the testimony itself. The Board has special expertise in drawings these kinds of inferences, and its determinations are entitled to judicial deference. N.L.R.B. v. Tischler, 615 F.2d 509, 511 (9th Cir. 1980).

The record as a whole indicates that the Board's finding that Kallmann refused to hire former employees because of their union affiliation is supported by substantial evidence. Kallmann's discriminatory refusal to hire constituted a violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (3). N.L.R.B. v. Tragniew, Inc., 470 F.2d 669, 675 (9th Cir. 1972); K. B. & J. Young's Super Markets, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 377 F.2d 463, 465 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 841, 88 S.Ct. 71, 19 L.Ed. 2d 105 (1967).

C. KALLMANN AS A SUCCESSOR EMPLOYER

When employees have a collective bargaining agreement and a change in ownership occurs, the new owner must recognize and bargain with the employees' union if the new owner is found to be a "successor employer." N.L.R.B. v. Edjo, Inc., 631 F.2d 604, at 606–607 (9th Cir. 1980); Bellingham Frozen Foods, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 626 F.2d 674, 678 (9th Cir. 1980). The new owner is a successor employer if: (A) the employer conducts essentially the same business as the former employer, and (B) a majority of the new employer's work force are former employees or would have been former employees absent a refusal to hire because of anti-union animus. Id.; Pacific Hide & Fur Depot, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 553 F.2d 609, 611 (9th Cir. 1977). The Board found that Kallmann was a successor employer who violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5)[11] by disavowing Love's obligation to the Union.

[8] The ALJ reasoned that because Logan was interviewed at the same time as Wadsworth and Wadsworth was offered a job, Logan was offered a job.

[9] There was little testimony regarding the Restaurant's cleanliness. The ALJ apparently relied on Kallmann's asserted justification for not hiring Porter.

[10] The ALJ discredited Kallmann's testimony, although the ALJ did believe his testimony regarding his belief that it was his choice whether there would be a union. In reaching its conclusions, the Board did not disagree with the ALJ's assessment of that testimony but drew a different inference, namely that Kallmann, in violation of the Act, did not intend to allow a union.

Kallmann concedes that he conducted essentially the same business as Love. He argues, however, the Board erred in finding that he was a successor employer because the Board impermissibly assumed that "but for * * * Kallmann's unlawful * * * [hiring discrimination], the Union's status as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative would have survived * * * Kallmann's takeover of the Hayward Restaurant." Kallmann contends that this "bootstrap argument" cannot be made without some evidence that Kallmann would have had the opportunity to hire the requisite number of former employees in the absence of his allegedly unlawful conduct. At most, only nine former employees applied for the twenty-eight to thirty available positions. Therefore, Kallmann contends that there was not substantial evidence to find that the Union's majority status would have continued.

Kallmann's argument has been rejected by several courts.[12] For example, in N.L.R.B. v. Foodway of El Paso, 496 F.2d 117 (5th Cir. 1974), Foodway purchased a grocery store from Allied. Foodway refused to hire any former Allied employees because of their union memberships. Foodway contended that it was not a successor employer with a duty to bargain because the evidence did not show that the union represented a majority of the employees. The court rejected this argument stating:

> It is manifest that but for Foodway's discriminatory refusal to offer employment to Allied's unit employees, the Union would have continued to enjoy a majority representative status. We decline to permit an employer to rely upon its own wrongdoing and thus avoid its legal responsibilities.

Id. at 120. Where, as here, a successor employer unlawfully discriminates in hiring, an appropriate remedy is reinstatement for all the former employees. Packing House and Indus. Services v. N.L.R.B., 590 F.2d 688, 697–98 (8th Cir. 1978). See N.L.R.B. v. Tragniew, Inc., 470 F.2d 669, 675 (9th Cir. 1972).

> With such reinstatement ordered, continuity in the identity of the work force may be presumed to follow and an order to recognize and bargain with the union as representative of the present work force is appropriate.

K. B. & J. Young's Super Markets, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 377 F.2d 463, 465 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 841, 88 S.Ct. 71, 19 L.Ed.2d 105 (1967). The Board properly assumed a majority would have survived the takeover but for Kallmann's discrimination. We conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that Kallmann was a successor employer and thus violated the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union.[13]

[11] Section 8(a)(5) provides that it it unlawful for an employer:

> to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title.

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5).

N.L.R.B.*, 377 F.2d 463 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 841, 88 S.Ct. 71, 19 L.Ed.2d 105 (1967) (majority status may be presumed where successor employer discharged former employees to evade bargaining obligations); Barrington Plaza and Tragniew, Inc., 185 N.L.R.B. 962 (1970), enforced in part, N.L.R.B. v. Tragniew, Inc., 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972).

[13] Kallmann's reliance on Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 97 S.Ct. 1843, 52 L.Ed.2d 396 (1977), is misplaced. In Teamsters, the employer committed unlawful discrimination in failing to promote minority employees to certain preferred truck driving positions. The government contended that since all non-applicants were employees, it is likely that they were aware of the futility of applying and, absent the prospect of discriminatory rejection, they would have applied. The court rejected this argument because there were such differences between the "preferred" jobs (those that paid more) and the others that "the desirability of the [former] is not so self-evident as to warrant a conclusion that all employees would prefer [the preferred job] if given a free choice." Id. at 369, 97 S.Ct. at 1871–1872. Because the Supreme Court pointed out that Title VII remedies are modeled after the National Labor Relations Act, id. at 366, 97 S.Ct. at 1870, Kallmann contends that the reasoning of Teamsters is applicable to this situation. Here, however, it is reasonable to assume that the former employees would have desired to remain in their existing jobs at the same benefit level. The Teamsters court also noted that the non-applicants might not have possessed the necessary qualifications. Id. at 369, 97 S.Ct. at 1871–1872. Here, it is proper to assume that the former employees were qualified to perform the jobs they previously held.

D. THE BOARD'S ORDER OF REINSTATEMENT

Kallmann contends that the portion of the Board's order directing him to reinstate the forty former employees to their old jobs, or to substantially equivalent jobs if the old jobs no longer exist, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings suffered as a result of the discrimination, is punitive and therefore unenforceable. See N.L.R.B. v. Fort Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596, 602 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 915, 100 S.Ct. 1275, 63 L.Ed.2d 599 (1980).

The Board's order requires Kallmann to offer all forty former employees reinstatement. Kallmann argues that this is punitive because he only hired twenty-eight to thirty total employees when he reopened the Restaurant.[14] Kallmann relies on Vancouver, id. In Vancouver, the company was a worker-owned corporation. Not all the workers, however, were shareholders. Three of the seven directors (also worker-shareholders) advocated ending the employment of non-shareholders altogether. Eventually, the three convinced another director to join with them and on that day all seventy-two non-shareholders then employed were fired. The court upheld the Board's findings that the firings were for anti-union reasons and that the company unlawfully refused to recognize the nonshareholders' union. The court refused to enforce, however, the Board's remedial order, similar to the order here, that required the rehiring of all seventy-two non-shareholders. The company contended that eventually it would have eliminated or drastically reduced the non-shareholder work force regardless of unionization, and therefore the Board improperly gave the discharged employees more than they would have received without the violation. The court agreed, stating:

> [T]he Board has a duty to consider how many employees, if any, the company would have continued to employ but for the unfair labor practices, and for how long. The record indicates that * * * the Board in review gave [no] consideration to whether some or all of the temporary employees eventually would have lost their jobs for acceptable business reasons.

Id. at 602.

The Vancouver court also rejected the argument made by the Board here, that the exact terms of the reinstatement order are properly left for subsequent determination, and do not affect the order's enforceability. Id. at 603. It noted that the order required the reinstatement, not just of some non-shareholders, but of exactly seventy-two discharged workers, and this precision made it clear that no further proceedings were contemplated regaarding the number of employees to be reinstated. Because the order was so specific, it denied "the company an opportunity to show that fewer than 72 jobs would have been available regardless of its unfair practices." Id. Therefore, the remedial order of reinstatement was unenforceable.[15] Similarly here, the order requires that Kallmann hire all forty former empmloyees without providing him with the opportunity to show that fewer than forty jobs would have been available. the Vancouver decision compels the conclusion that the board's order regarding reinstatement is unenforceable[16] and a remand is necessary.

E. THE BOARD'S BACK PAY ORDER

Kallmann also contends that the order mandating back pay is unenforceable because it requires Kallmann to pay more than he would have paid the former employees. After the takeover, Kallmann established wages and benefits which were less than the former union wages and benefits. The Board ordered Kallmann to pay back wages and benefits at the rate existing immediately before the takeover, after finding that Kallmann violated section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally reducing rates of pay and benefits provided in the collective bargaining agreement. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)5. A back pay award is appropriate where a successor refuses to hire fromer employees because of anti-union animus.[17] The only question is whether the award at the higher union rate is a penalty.

[14] We reject the Board's contention that Kallmann has waived the right to raise this argument on appeal because Kallmann, as the prevailing party before the ALJ, had no remedial order to object to before the Board. See AMCAR Division v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1344, 135 n.8 (8th Cir. 1979).

[15] See also Florsheim Shoe Store Co. v. N.L.R.B., 565 F.2d 1240, 1247 (2d Cir. 1977) (where jobs affected by illegal activities would have been phased out regardless of the activities, Board must tailor its remedy to reflect the situation). But cf. Packing House and Indus. Services v. N.L.R.B., 590 F.2d 688, 697 (8th Cir. 1978) (where substantial evidence supported the Board's finding that successor refused to hire any former employees because of anti-union animus, the court affirmed the Board's order requiring successor to offer employment to all 83 former employees). The successor made no contention, however, that it intended to reduce the work force. The concurring opinion noted that the Board stated that at the compliance hearing it would determine whether the employees were not rehired "because of legitimate considerations [such] as a reduction in force * * *." Id. at 700 (Ross, J., concurring) (quoting the Board).

[16] The board asserts that Vancouver is distinguishable because in the instant case no evidence in the record suggests the company "would not, at least initially, have retained all 40 former employees." The Board found, however, that Kallmann initially hired "approximately 30 employees." Excerpt of Record 97. See also Excerpt of Record 27; III Reporter's Transcript at 724, 731.

The Board recognized that, under N.L.R.B. v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972), a successor employer is ordinarily free to set initial hiring terms without preliminary bargaining with the incumbent union. Where, however, "it is perfectly clear that the new employer plans to retain all of the employees," id. at 294–95, 92 S.Ct. at 1585–1586, the successor must consult with the union before altering the terms and conditions of employment. N.L.R.B. v. Edjo, Inc., 631 F.2d 604, at 607 (9th Cir. 1980). The Board found that this exception applied because any uncertainty regarding whether substantially all[18] the former employees would have been retained had to be resolved against Kallmann because he could not benefit from his unlawful conduct. As we have noted, when a successor employer has discriminated in hiring, the appropriate remedy is to offer reinstatement to all the former employees. With such reinstatement ordered, it can be presumed that substantially all the former employees would be retained. We also agree with the Board that the emmployer should not be permitted to benefit from his illegal conduct. Consequently, we hold that Kallmann violated the Act when he unilaterally reduced wages.

Nevertheless, we disagree with the extent of the remedial order. Even though under the facts of this case Kallmann had a duty to consult with the union before unilaterally changing the terms of employment, as a successor employer he had no obligation to accept his predecessor's labor agreement. Edjo, at 606–607. The effect of the Board's order is to force Kallmann to abide by the terms of his predecessor's contract with the employees for the entire period of time Kallmann has owned the enterprise. In N.L.R.B. v. Dent, 534 F.2d 844, 846–47 (9th Cir. 1976), this court considered a similar remedial order. The successor employer in Dent retained all the former employees, but violated the Act by unilaterally reducing wages. The Board ordered back pay at the pre-reduction levels for all hours worked since the reduction. This court refused to enforce the order because enforcement would, in effect, cause the successor employer to be bound by its predecessor's collective bargaining agreement for the three and one-half years that the successor owned the company, a period longer than the contract period in the union's agreement with the predecessor. We also believe that to the extent that a back pay order requires payment at the higher rate for the entire period of ownership, it acts as a penalty.

The function of the remedy in unfair labor cases is to restore the situation, as nearly as possible, to that which would have occurred but for the violation. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). We recognize the difficulty in reconstructing the situation in the present case. For guidance, we believe, that an appropriate back pay remedy cannot require Kallmann to pay the higher rate beyond a period allowing for a reasonable time of bargaining. The facts demonstrate that Kallmann would not have agreed to union demands to pay the higher rate. Kallmann's refusal would not be unlawful. In all probability it would have led to an impasse allowing Kallmann to reduce wages. See N.L.R.B. v. Acme Wire Works, Inc., 582 F.2d 153, 156–57 (2d Cir. 1978). After a reasonable period for bargaining, Kallmann would be required to pay only at the rate he set.[19]

We remand this case to the Board to determine the appropriate rate of pay and the number of employees that are entitled to reinstatement. In the Board's discretion, resolution of these issues may be left to bargaining between the parties. We order that the Board's order be enforced in part and denied in part.

NLRB v. Borden, Inc., Borden Chemical Division

645 F.2d 87 (1st Cir.), March 31, 1981—248 NLRB 387

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before COFFIN, Chief Judge, ALDRICH and WINTER,* Circuit Judges

88

COFFIN, Chief Judge: We previously remanded this case to the NLRB for decision as to whether respondent's failure to pay vacation benefits to strikers was an unfair labor practice. NLRB v. Borden, Inc., 600 F.2d 313 (1st Cir. 1979). We now decide that substantial evidence supports the Board's decision that it was.

The collective bargaining contract in general provided that workers had to take a "vacation" before they could collect vacation pay. See id. at 318–19. The workers in this suit informed management that they intended to vacation the first week in October 1976. A strike began on the first day of that month. On October 7, workers asked for their vacation pay. The company replied that it would not give vacation pay to employees on strike. On December 26, 1976, however, the company did pay accrued vacation compensation to the still-striking workers (with one exception not relevant here). See generally id. at 319.

The Board ruled that the delayed payment constituted an unfair labor practice. We remanded for the Board to assess respondent's justification for the delay under NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 671 (1st Cir. 1979). 600 F.2d at 320–21.

On remand respondent confined its evidence of legitimate business justification to the claim that its reasonable reliance on the terms of the collective bargaining agreement explained its behavior. It argued that strike participation could not constitute a "vacation". Since the workers had taken no qualifying "vacation", respondent concluded that its October 7 refusal to pay vacation benefits was justified by legitimate motivation.

The Board ruled that this logic did not explain the delay in payment. It added that respondent's argument that striking did not constitute "vacationing" was undercut by respondent's past indifference as to the nature of "vacations" so long as employees left work and thus did not claim double pay. The Board therefore reaffirmed its finding of an unfair labor practice.

Before us respondent offers no other explanations for its behavior apart from reliance on the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. It likewise does not demonstrate why contract reliance accounts for both its October 7 refusal to pay benefits as well as its December 26 decision to pay benefits. The late payment, made while the strike was still in progress, was explained on the ground that "the contractual vacation period" had expired. But this fact could not convert a "strike" into a "vacation" on respondent's theory. In oral argument respondent described this contradiction as a "difficulty" in its position. Since we agree with this assessment, we hold that the Board's rejection of this illogical justification was supported by substantial evidence.

Respondent further argues that the Board has not proved that respondent's action was improperly motivated as respndent asserts the Board must do when the employer advances a legitimate and substantial justification for its conduct. Because in this case the employer's response to the Board's initial showing of discrimination, see 600 F.2d at 320, does not prove a legitimate business justification, however, the Board is entitled to prevail on its initial showing. See id., Eastern Smelting, 598 F.2d at 670 & 671.

The petition for enforcement is granted.

On petitions to review Board Order

Before COFFIN, Chief Judge, CAMPBELL, Circuit Judge, and JULIAN, Senior District Judge*

COFFIN, Chief Judge: The question in these petitions for review is whether an employer may, consistent with its collective bargaining duties, insist that a union copy grievance-related documents by hand rather than by mechanical means. The National Labor Relations Board determined that this practice violated §§ 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act and ordered the employer to make photocopies available in future cases at the union's expense. We have consolidated the petitions for review filed by the employer and the union, and the Board's cross-application for enforcement of its order. Our curiosity piqued by the stance of a giant of high technology atavistically insisting on a quill and scroll ritual, we have searched diligently for the underlying justification of law or policy. We have found none.

I

At all relevant times, the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, Long Lines Department (the company) and Local 1051, Communications Workers of America, AFL–CIO (the union) were parties to a collective bargaining agreement, which provided for a multi-level grievance process culminating in arbitration. For many years the company has maintained a policy of refusing to provide, or to permit the union to make, exact copies of grievance-related materials. Instead, the company requires union representatives to handcopy documents in the presence of a supervisor or to take notes while a supervisor reads from the employee's personnel file. The policy was announced in the company's Labor Relations Handbook and reiterated in several "policy letters". One such policy letter created an exception to the "no photocopy" rule if the relevant data were so complex and voluminous that the union could not comprehend the information without a copy. It appears, however, that this standard has never been met to the company's satisfaction. One of the company's district operations managers testified that in 16 years the union had not once been supplied with a photocopy. Two lower level managers explained their understanding of the 925 company policy as: no photocopies for the union "in any case". Time spent copying documents on behalf of the union is compensable by the company only when "clearly incidental to a grievance meeting in progress", although the practice of individual managers varies somewhat.

The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) considered the "no photocopy" rule as applied to four different grievances.[1] In each case the union's request for photocopies of relevant portions of the employee's personnel file was refused, although the company ultimately offered to make all of the requested documents available to the union for the purpose of handcopying.

Company employees David Gagne and Richard Bennett were each disciplined in June 1978 for poor attendance. The union did not accept the company's offering of handcopying, but pressed its request for copies of the two men's attendance records. Gagne's records covered nine years of employment with the company and consisted of 16 pages of partially encoded forms and 7 pages of comments. Bennett's records covered six years of employment and consisted of 11 pages of forms and 12 pages of comments. The ALJ found that it would have required several hours in each case to handcopy the records, that the material was easily susceptible to errors in copying and that, at least in Gagne's case, the company refused to commit itself to pay for copying time.

Employee Eva White was suspended in January 1977 and later discharged in June 1978 for poor attendance. After the initial suspension, two union representatives spent six hours handcopying White's attendance records, which consisted of several pages of comments and 27 typewritten attachments. They worked in a company office under the supervision of an operations manager who put his surveillance time to use in reading a newspaper. The company paid half-wages for the time spent copying but paid nothing for typing the 54 pages of handwritten copies. After grieving White's discharge in June 1978, the union renewed its request for photocopies and once again was offered handcopying. By this time, the file had grown considerably, containing, by the company's reckoning, thirteen additional full pages of information. The union continued to press its demand for copies at higher level grievance meetings, but to no avail.

[1] Although it is featured prominently in the company's brief, the grievance of a fifth employee, Glennon, formed no part of the decision of the ALJ or the Board.

Employee William Benson was suspended in January 1979 for unauthorized presence in a company cafeteria. At first the company grievance representative refused to permit even handcopying but had operations manager Murphy read the eight relevant pages of Benson's file aloud while the union representatives took notes. Murphy later testified that his reading was "95 per cent verbatim". The company failed to respond to a written request for photocopies submitted by the union that explained in detail the union's need for exact copies and offered to reimburse the company's copying expenses. At a later meeting, the union questioned the accuracy of Murphy's original rendition. After some hesitation, the company agreed to another reading, which proved to be different than the first. Faced with the possibility of a "tie-breaker" third reading, the company finally relented and permitted union representatives, on their own time, to inspect the original documents and make handcopies. That process required another six hours of unpaid union time, including typing.

II

We emphasize at the beginning of our analysis that we are concerned only with means by which the union could copy grievance-related materials supplied by the company. Specifically, we are not concerned with relevance. The General Counsel's complaint did not allege a failure to provide relevant information and the company, having provided for handcopying all of the information requested by the union, may not now argue that it had no duty at all to disclose the requested material. Nor is there any issue as to who should bear the cost of photocopying. The Board's order provides that the union shall bear the reasonable cost of furnishing photocopies and the union objects only to the Board's failure to set a figure for reasonable copying costs. Thus, the narrow question for review is whether the company could lawfully prohibit the union from obtaining, at its own expense, photocopies of documents provided to it pursuant to the company's statutory duty to furnish relevant information.

During the terms of a collective bargaining agreement an employer must provide information requested by the union that is relevant and necessary to the union's prosecution of employee grievances under the agreement. Failure to do so violates §§ 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Western Massachusetts Electric Co. v. NLRB, 589 F.2d 42, 46 (1st Cir. 1978); Puerto Rico Telephone Co. v. NLRB, 359 F.2d 983, 986 (1st Cir. 1966). In this case, the Board concluded that the company's ban on photocopying impeded the grievance process and therefore violated §§ 8(a)(5) and (1).

The ALJ's essential findings, adopted by the Board, were first, that the union required accurate and complete copies of relevant personnel records to represent properly grieving employees and second, that handcopying is substantially more prone to error, more expensive and more time-consuming than photocopying. The company does not seriously dispute the finding that it was necessary for the union to make accurate and complete copies in order to fulfill its function as grievance representative. The union must somehow transmit information it has acquired from the company from one stage of the grievance process to the next. Lacking originals, the obvious choice for the union is to send copies and preferably, as the company does, to send photocopies of the original documents. The company's labor relations manager and the union's president both testified to the importance of having an accurate statement of the facts in grievance cases. Union witnesses placed particular emphasis on their need to have an exact account of supervisors' file comments in order to check them against other descriptions of the same events and supporting data for discrepancies.

There was testimony, if any were needed, that handcopying is a laborious process that tends to generate transcribing errors, especially when copying numbers or company codes unfamiliar to the copier. As to cost, the union was required to pay the handcopiers half-pay in one case and full pay in another for several hours of work, as well as to arrange for the handwritten notes to be typed. While these expenses alone certainly exceeded the cost of photocopying, the price of the "no photocopy" rule was still greater for the company, which had to pay a supervisor to observe the union copiers, and representatives for both the union and the company for excess grievance time devoted to reading personnel documents aloud and verifying handcopies. The ALJ found further evidence of the burdensomeness of handcopying in the fact that in no other context, outside of collective bargaining, does the company insist on doing business by way of handcopies.

We are satisfied that there is substantial evidence to support the Board's decision that the company rule impeded the grievance process in these four cases. The evidence establishes that the "no photocopy" rule made it expensive and time-consuming, if not impossible, for the union to obtain the reliable copies it required to discharge its duties as bargaining representative. The rule plainly disadvantaged the union in evaluating and prosecuting grievances and was likely to discourage resort to the grievance process at all in some cases.

In view of the company's vigorous defense of its ban on photocopies, we find it perplexing, to say the least, that it has neglected even to assert a legitimate business justification for its policy. Despite repeated inquiries by the ALJ, the company declined during the hearing to disclose the reason for its rule, and has continued on appeal to rely on its bare legal right to determine, as it chooses, how information will be disclosed to the union. As we said in NLRB v. Borden, Inc., Borden Chemical

Division, 600 F.2d 313, 318 (1st Cir. 1979), management's prerogative to determine the form of information disclosure is not a license to put the union "through the hoops": "The union is under no obligation to utilize a burdensome procedure of obtaining desired information where the employer may have such information available in a more convenient form" (quoting The Kroger Company, 226 N.L.R.B. 512, 513 (1976)). We held in Borden that management could not refuse to supply the union with insurance cost data because the same information could be had by polling the employees. We see no reason to accord greater deference to management prerogative, if any exists, when, as here, the employer supplies information in the requested form (original documents) but seeks to limit the means by which the union may make copies. We affirm the Board's decision that application of the "no photocopy" rule in these cases unnecessarily impeded the grievance process.[2]

III

The company's second line of defense is that the union waived its statutory right to receive copies of relevant documents by raising and then abandoning the issue during contract negotiations. The company concedes that the union may relinquish a statutory right only by "clear and unmistakable" waiver. See NLRB v. Perkins Machine Co., 326 F.2d 488, 489 (1st Cir. 1964); Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 325 F.2d 746, 751 (5th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 971, 84 S.Ct. 1135, 12 L.Ed.2d 85 (1964).

The issue of photocopies of grievance-related documents was discussed briefly on three different occasions spanning a three-month period during the 1977 contract negotiations. Number 28 of the union's 42 bargaining demands was for "exact copy of all pertinent local grievance information upon request." At the first bargaining session on June 8, 1977 the following discussion occurred:

> "Company: We already have a big xerox bill.
> Union: We'll be willing to give you three cents a copy.
>
> Company: I'm afraid the cost goes much deeper than that. If you are serious about this demand then we might have to include a company demand to have copies of Union documents.
> Union: Well, we're serious about this one."

A month later, on July 7, the negotiators returned to the subject of photocopies:

> "Union: I'm sure [the Union] will pay for the cost of the paper. And it is ridiculous that we have a hassle over a sheet of paper when xerox machines are readily available. Hassle is the way we get the information. Let's clear it up.
> Company: Tie this Demand to Company Demand #1 [a new strike clause]. Otherwise we are not receptive to discussing it.
> Union: I hear you, but we are not ready to tie anything together."

---

[2] In Abercrombie & Fitch Co., 206 N.L.R.B. 464 (1973), relied upon heavily by the company, the Board summarily affirmed an ALJ's decision that a single failure to provide copies of some 3½ pages of uncomplicated records did not violate the Act. That case is readily distinguishable from this one by the amount and complexity of the requested data. Further, in that case no mention was made of a need for exact copies by the union nor does it appear that the union sought to make handcopies or offered to pay for photocopies. The union representative, rather, "believed that he had been given an adequate opportunity intelligently to consider and evaluate the requested information." The burden imposed on the grievance process by the company's rule in this case far exceeds the de minimis level present in Abercrombie & Fitch.

Finally, on August 13, the company declared its unwillingness to discuss the issue any further:

> "Company: Let me respond to Union Demands 22, 22A, 17, 20, 23, 28, 31, 32, 34 and 36, not by just saying 'no', but by saying 'hell, no.' We plan no movement and I'm sure you are not surprised. With the objective of moving on, I thought I would group these together and address other items that need further discussion * * *."

928

This sparse bargaining history, which is all that was said on the issue, comes closer to demonstrating a refusal to bargain by the company than it does a "clear and unmistakable" waiver by the union. Based on these few exchanges, the union would no doubt be surprised to learn that it had traded away its valuable statutory right in return for "no movement" on the part of the company. Where a statutory right is involved, the law of this circuit is that "a waiver should be express, and that a mere inference, no matter how strong, should be insufficient." Perkins Machine Co., supra, 326 F.2d at 489.

Nor is the requirement of an express waiver satisfied by the standard "zipper clause" included in the final agreement signed by the union and company. The clause provided:

> "The Contract is in final settlement for its duration of all demands and proposals made by either party during negotiations and constitutes the entire understanding between the parties."

The contract, as far as we are informed, is silent on the question of waiver. This clause, which is intended to avoid the implication of contractual rights, is particularly ill-suited to an attempt to infer from the union's lack of success at the bargaining table an affirmative contractual waiver of a statutory right. The record establishes that the union proposal was rebuffed without serious discussion. We affirm the Board's conclusion that the union did not waive its right to obtain photocopies of grievance-related documents.

The company's final challenge is that the Board's order impermissibly sets down a per se rule requiring photocopies in all future cases without regard to the facts of particular grievances. Such a rule, the company urges, conflicts with the Supreme Court's statement in Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 314–15, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1130, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979) that, "[t]he duty to supply information under § 8(a)(5) turns upon 'the circumstances of the particular case', NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 at 153, 76 S.Ct. 753, 756, 100 L.Ed. 1027, and much the same can be said for the type of disclosure that will satisfy that duty."

In Detroit Edison the union sought the test battery used by the company to evaluate applicants for promotion. The company resisted turning over the test questions directly to the union because of the risk that the secrecy of the test questions would be compromised and the test rendered useless. The company offered to disclose the test questions to an independent psychologist selected by the union who would guarantee the confidentiality of the questions. In this manner the union could obtain an expert evaluation of the validity of the test and the company would be protected against the expense of validating a new test battery.

As we have already observed, characterizing the "no photocopy" rule as going to the form or type of disclosure lends the rule undeserved dignity. Unlike the company's offer of indirect disclosure in Detroit Edison, the "no photocopy" rule does not determine the content of the information actually disclosed to the union, but relates simply to the physical "form" of copy which the union may create. Even in this superficial sense, the company's rule does not affect the form of disclosure, but rather limits the ability to take advantage of it. We may assume that with sufficient skill, patience and time a union copier could create a facsimile that, in form, exactly resembled the original supplied by the company.

More fundamentally, the company misapprehends the significance of the discussion of fact-sensitivity in Detroit Edison. The passage quoted only in part by the company continues:

> "Throughout this proceeding, the reasonableness of the Company's concern has been essentially conceded. The finding by the Board that this concern did not outweigh the Union's interest in exploring the fairness of the Company's criteria for promotion did not carry with it any suggestion > that the concern itself was not legitimate and substantial [footnote omitted]." 440 U.S. at 315, 99 S.Ct. at 1131.

The fact-sensitivity of the duty to disclose thus derives from a balancing process in which the union's interest in disclosure is harmonized with the company's interest in maintaining confidentiality. In contrast to the legitimate and weighty rationale asserted by the employer in Detroit Edison, the company in this case has offered no reason to justify its ban on photocopies. Whether the actual reason is simply to make life difficult for the union, or some unknown justification, there is no basis on this record from which to argue that the strength of the company's rationale for not permitting photocopies is variable depending on the facts of each case. Common sense suggests that the burden of permitting photocopying will never exceed that of overseeing union scribes.

There is substantial evidence supporting the Board's conclusion that the union's need for photocopies would in every case outweigh the company's simple wish to deny them. In no reasonably foreseeable set of circumstances could it be said that handcopying is superior to photocopying in terms of efficiency and reliability of duplication. The continued restriction of relevance and the fact that the union must shoulder the cost of copying assures the company that it will not be forced to subsidize fishing expeditions. In sum, we cannot say that the Board exceeded its broad discretion to formulate remedies by concluding that in every situation that might arise between this company and union, a refusal to permit photocopying of information otherwise available to the union would unjustifiably impede the grievance process.

An alternative ground supporting the Board's remedy is what it described as the now nearly universal use of photocopies in business affairs by this employer and other companies. See NLRB v. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 266, 95 S.Ct. 959, 968, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975) ("The responsibility to adapt the Act to changing patterns of industrial life is entrusted to the Board"). Where only the bare mechanics of collective bargaining are involved, it is reasonable to expect of the company a standard of conduct comparable to that which it brings to other important business affairs. Cf. J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., Inc., 86 N.L.R.B. 470, 506 (1949). We see nothing at odds with the policy of the Act in the Board's order directing the company to take affirmative action to remedy its double standard. Accordingly, we enforce the Board's order in its entirety.[3] [3] The union objects to the Board's modification of the ALJ's proposed order deleting a requirement that the company provide copies of witness statements in future cases and requiring the parties to bargain over the reasonable cost of copying to be assumed by the union, rather than imposing the figure of 10 cents per copy set by the ALJ. We believe that by raising these points in its reply to the company's exceptions, the union preserved its appeal rights, but find its objections are plainly without merit. The union's first argument—that by disclosing witness statements in one case the company has forever given up the right to withhold them—borders on the nonsensical. The second point—that the Board erred in refusing to set a reasonable figure for copying costs—cuts against the generally recognized principle that the terms of collective bargaining are to be left, to the greatest extent possible, to the bargaining parties. We see no basis for upsetting the Board's choice of remedies in this case. If the company refuses to bargain in good faith, that is a matter appropriately left to contempt proceedings.

Hall-Brooke Hospital, a division of Hall-Brooke Foundation, Inc. v. NLRB

645 F.2d 158 (2d Cir.), March 31, 1981—250 NLRB 505

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before LUMBARD, VAN GRAAFEILAND and KEARSE, Circuit Judges

159

LUMBARD, Circuit Judge: Hall-Brooke Hospital, a division of Hall-Brooke Foundation, Inc., petitions us to deny enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board dated July 10, 1980, requiring Hall-Brooke to bargain with Connecticut Health Care Associates ("the Union") as the exclusive bargaining representative of an approved unit of Hall-Brooke's employees. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. We deny Hall-Brooke's petition and grant the Board's application for enforcement of its order.

I.

On January 5, 1979, the Union filed a representation petition with the Board seeking certification as the collective bargaining representative of Hall-Brooke's non-supervisory employees.[1] Pursuant to

---

[1] The agreed upon unit consisted of:

a stipulation by the parties, the Regional Director conducted an election on March 8, 1979 to determine whether the Union was the desired representative of the bargaining unit. The Union won the election by a vote of 27 to 18.

Immediately following the election, Hall-Brooke filed objections with the Board, including an objection that the Union had issued campaign literature that had created the impression that the Board endorsed the Union's position in the election. The material objected to was a three-page leaflet which the Union had mailed to the eligible voters. The first page of the leaflet was reproduction of a portion of the Board's official election notice entitled "Rights of Employees," which described various employees rights protected by the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) and listed various employer practices which are prohibited and may cause an election to be set aside. The notice, near the bottom, states: "The National Labor Relations Board as an agency of the United States Government does not endorse any choice in the election." The name and official seal of the Board appear at the very bottom.

The second two pages of the leaflet consisted of a series of typewritten questions and answers which were favorable to the Union's position. At the conclusion of the questions and answers were the words "March 8th—Vote Yes for CHCA!" Under that were the words "Your Committee to Elect CHCA." At the very bottom of the last page was the full name of the Union and its address.

Following an administrative investigation of Hall-Brooke's objections, the Board's Acting Regional Director issued a report that found, as to the objection relevant here, that "the document in issue did not compromise the Board's neutrality nor give the impression of Board endorsement" of the Union. The report therefore recommended that the Board overrule the objections and certify the Union. Hall-Brooke filed exceptions to the report, but the Board, after consideration by a three-member panel, adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations. One member of the panel dissented. The Union was therefore certified as the exclusive bargaining representative.

In October of 1979, the Union attempted to bargain with Hall-Brooke. Hall-Brooke, however, chose not to bargain with the Union in order to obtain judicial review of the certification decision.[2] The Board's general counsel thereupon issued a complaint against Hall-Brooke for violations of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), 158(a)(5) (1976), for refusing to bargain with a certified representative. In its defense, Hall-Brooke raised the same objections to the Union's certification as before. The matter came before the same three Board members who had initially certified the Union. Once again, by a 2–1 margin, the Board held for the Union and ordered Hall-Brooke to bargain. Hall-Brooke then petitioned this court for review.

II.

Hall-Brooke argues that the Board erred in failing to set aside the election because the circulated leaflet tended to mislead employees into believing that the Board supported the Union's position, thereby destroying the "laboratory conditions" necessary to ensure a fair representation election. Cf. General Shoe Corp., 77 NLRB 124, 127 (1948). Moreover, Hall-Brooke argues that in so doing the Board acted contrary to its own precedent. In reviewing the Board's action, we are mindful that the Board is entrusted with broad discretion in creating and enforcing standards to ensure fair representation elections. See, e. g., NLRB v. A. J. Towers Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327, 91 L.Ed 322 (1964); NLRB v. Waterman S. S. Corp., 309 U.S. 206, 226, 60 S.Ct 493, 503, 84 L.Ed. 704 (1940); see also NLRB v. Olson Bodies, Inc., 420 F.2d 1187, 1189 (2d Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 954, 91 S.Ct. 966, 28 L.Ed.2d 237 (1971). Careful judicial scrutiny of the Board's action is necessary, however, in the face of accusations of failure to abide by precedent since the courts have an obligation to ensure that administrative agencies adhere to enunciated policies and procedures. See, e. g., NLRB v.

All full time and regular part-time mental health workers, activity workers, cooks, food service workers, dietary aides, general maintenance workers, grounds men, carpenters, painters, and housekeepers, employed by the Hospital at its facility in Connecticut, excluding guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees.

[2] Certification decisions are not "final orders" under §§ 10(e) and (f) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. §§ 160(e), 169(f) (1976), and are therefore not judicially reviewable. See A. F. L. v. N.L.R.B., 308 U.S. 401, 60 S.Ct. 300, 84 L.Ed. 347 (1940). Instead, to obtain judicial review, aggrieved employers can refuse to bargain with certified representatives, thus subjecting themselves to unfair labor practice proceedings. See, e.g. Lipman Motors, Inc. v. NLRB, 451 F.2d 823, 825 n.3 (2d Cir. 1971).

Osborn Transportation, Inc., 589 F.2d 1275, 1279 (5th Cir. 1979); Memorial Hospital of Roxborough v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 351 (3d Cir. 1976).

Specifically, Hall-Brooke argues that the decision here is flatly inconsistent with the Board's decisions in Allied Electric Products, 109 NLRB 1270 (1954), Rebmar, Inc., 173 NLRB 1434 (1968), and GAF Corp., 234 NLRB 1209 (1978). In Allied Electric, the Board held that it would set aside any election in which the prevailing party had distributed, as part of its campaign literature, a document purporting to be a sample official ballot which was marked with a vote in either box or which contained similar alterations. In Rebmar, the Board set aside an election where the union had circulated a reproduced portion of the Board's official election notice—the same portion at issue here. The circulated document in Rebmar, however, was altered by addition of a line at the bottom saying "The Government propects your right to organize yourself in a union." On the reverse side of the document was an explanation of the functioning of a union and of the collective bargaining process. There was no indication as to authorship of the additions to the document. The Board stated that duplication of an official document with a partisan message that might be interpreted as an endorsement by the Board would require that an election be set aside. 173 NLRB at 1434. More recently, in GAF, the Board held that placement of the official Board name and seal on a distributed campaign pamphlet entitled "It's the Law" setting out the legal rights of employees, although signed by the Union, created an "ambiguity" as to the Board's neutrality and required invalidation of the election.

In this case, the Regional Director, whose report and recommendations were adopted by the Board, stated that in general the Board will not condone any attempts to suggest Board support for either party. Here, however, the Regional Director found that the mailing of a portion of the "Rights of Employees" could not reasonably be said have created an impression of Board endorsement. First, the document merely set out legal duties of the Board and certain unfair labor practices. Second, it was unaltered and contained no added union propaganda. Third, the document itself stated that the Board endorsed neither party in the election. Fourth, the attached Union material was clearly identifiable as the Union's partisan campaign material. It specifically gave the source of the leaflet as "Your Committee to Elect CHCA" and set forth the full name of the Union and its address. Finally, the Board's complete "Rights of Employees" notice was posted prior to the election so employees could tell it was part of an overall government document and not an endorsement of either party. Therefore, the Regional Director concluded that the circulated materials did not compromise the Board's neutrality or give the impression of Board endorsement.

Given the ample reasons for the Regional Director's finding that the Board's neutrality was not compromised, we cannot say that the Board erred in failing to set aside the election. Moreover, we conclude that the Board's ruling was consistent with its precedents. It is true, as Hall-Brooke asserts, that Allied Electric, Rebmar and GAF suggest that the Board will not tolerate the use in campaign material of the Board's name or of Board documents in a manner which suggests Board endorsement of either side in an election. Nevertheless, in this case, as the Regional Director found, there was no reasonable suggestion of Board endorsement. This result is supported by a number of other Board decisions in which the use of Board documents in campaign materials was not regarded as grounds for setting an election aside.

In Rett Electronics, 169 NLRB 1111 (1968) and Associated Lerner Shops of America, Inc., 207 NLRB 348 (1973), objections based upon use of a reproduced sample ballot were rejected. Despite the seeming breadth of the Allied Electric rule regarding reproduction of sample ballots, in these cases it was held that there was no reasonable possibility that employees were misled into believing that the Board's neutrality was violated. In Rett the reproduction was considerably reduced in size without all the language of a ballot, and it appeared as part of a pictorial pamphlet distributed by the union explaining voting procedures. In Lerner Shops, although an arrow had been drawn under the reproduced ballot pointing to the "NO" box with the message that a no vote was a vote against the union, the Board found that the document was clearly part of the employer's campaign propaganda and therefore did not suggest Board endorsement.

Even more relevant is the decision in A. Brandt & Co., 199 NLRB 459 (1972), order to bargain, 204 NLRB 636 (1973), enforced, 496 F.2d 876 (5th Cir. 1974), in which the Board refused to set aside an election where the union had distributed a reproduction of a Regional Director's decision involving the employer on which were added numerous anti-employer notations as well as a concluding plea for a vote for the union. The Board stated that the added comments could not reasonably be construed as part of the official decision, but instead were readily identifiable as partisan commentary. 199 NLRB at 459. Finally, in two very recent cases, Alyeska Pipeline Service Co., 236 NLRB 1082 (1978) and Monier Roof Tiles, 249 NLRB No. 92 (1980), the Board has refused to set aside elections in circumstances quite similar to those in this case. In Alyeska the Board's "Rights of Employees" document was attached to a four-page campaign pamphlet which was distributed by the union at a pro-union meeting. In Monier the "Rights of Employees" document itself contained added pro-union comments, but they were clearly attributed to the union.

Despite this wealth of support for the Board's action,[3] Hall-Brooke argues that the full Board in GAF had adopted an extremely broad reading of Allied Electric and Rebmar to be followed in subsequent cases. Moreover, Hall-Brooke notes that members Penello and Jenkins dissented in GAF, yet they have formed the majority in the three member panels in this case, Alyes- ka and Monier, in all of which Chairman Fanning dissented. Hall-Brooke also points to Monmouth Medical Center, 234 NLRB 328 (1978), order to bargain, 236 NLRB 960 (1978), enforcement denied, 604 F.2d 820 (3d Cir. 1979), in which both members Jenkins and Penello participated. In Monmouth the employer had objected to a number of different campaign materials. One was a Board pamphlet which contained added pro-union comments. The Board found that the comments did not suggest Board endorsement as they were separated and readily identifiable as union propaganda. The Third Circuit, although reversing on the basis of campaign material other than the altered pamphlet, noted that it had difficulty reconciling the decision on that issue with the thrust of the decision in GAF. 604 F.2d at 826–27. The court also pointed out the presence of the GAF dissenters on the Monmouth panel.[4]

We disagree both with the proposition that GAF represented a significant broadening of restrictions against the use of Board documents in campaign materials and with the suggestion that members Penello and Jenkins have failed to abide by GAF's strictures. Although Chairman Fanning, by his numerous dissents, appears to oppose any use of Board documents in campaign literature, nothing in GAF suggests that the Board was departing from its previous approach of attempting to determine, in each case, whether the use of Board documents would reasonably suggest the Board's endorsement of a particular party in an election. GAF states that an "ambiguity" regarding the Board's position created by use of Board materials is enough to set an election aside, yet that does not require that elections be set aside where comments added to Board documents are clearly separated and attributed to one of the parties.[5] Moreover, we see no merit to the suggestion that two NLRB members are refusing to adopt the position of the full Board.[6] Such a suggestion should not be made or accepted lightly, and we see no reason for overcoming the strong presumption against it. We also note that proposed decisions of three-member panels are circulated to the entire Board, and any non-participating Board member may request that a case receive full Board consideration if the member disagrees with the proposed result.[7]

[3] The Regional Director's report in this case, adopted by the Board, placed specific reliance upon Brandt and cited many of the other decisions discussed here.

[4] The court did not note, however, that member Murphy, who dissented in Monmouth, did so on the basis of the other campaign material, so that all three Board members agreed as to overruling the objection to the altered Board pamphlet.

[5] The majority in GAF plainly stated that its continued concern was with the possible impact on voters of campaign materials using the Board's name, 234 NLRB at 1210, and that, given the facts of the case, the use of the Board's name tended to mislead employees into believing the Board supported the Union's position. Id. at 1210 & n.1. The majority explicitly gave its support to the employer's position that the leaflet there in question, "so structured" with the Board's name, gave the appearance of Board support for the Union. Id. at 1209. We therefore do not read GAF as establishing a new per se approach invalidating any election where campaign material included any reproduction of the Board's name or of a Board document.

[6] Section 3(b) of the NLRA authorizes the Board "to delegate to any group of three or more members any or all of the powers which it may itself exercise." 29 U.S.C. § 153(b) (1976). Congress added this provision to the NLRA to enable the Board to handle an increasing caseload more efficiently. See S.Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 8 reprinted in I NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act 407, 414 (1947); II NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act 983, 1011 (1947) (remarks of Senators Morse and Taft).

For the foregoing reasons, the Board's order is hereby enforced.

[7] We also reject Hall-Brooke's argument that the decision be set aside for failing to articulate the reasoning supporting the Board's divergence from prior holdings. As noted above, we find the Board's decision consistent with Board precedent, and the Regional Director's report, adopted by the Board, clearly explained the basis for his recommendations while making reference to prior Board decisions.

J.J. Newberry Co., a wholly owned subsidiary of McCrory Corporation v. NLRB

645 F.2d 148 (2d Cir.), March 31, 1981—249 NLRB 991

On petition to review Board Order

Before MOORE, MANSFIELD and MULLIGAN, Circuit Judges

MANSFIELD, Circuit Judge: J.J. Newberry Company ("the employer") proceeding under § 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq. ("the Act"), has petitioned for review of a decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board. The Board in turn has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order under § 10(e) of the Act. The Board's decision and order, reported at 249 N.L.R.B. No. 126, found that the employer had committed certain unfair labor practices during the course of an organizational campaign conducted at the employer's Green Acres store in Valley Stream, Long Island, by Local 1102, Retail, Wholesale, Department Store Union, AFL-CIO ("the Union"). The campaign led to a Board-supervised election among the Green Acres store employees, resulting in a 44–44 tie vote. The order requires the employer to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices, to post notices, to make whole all employees who lost earnings as a result of what the Board determined was an unlawful withholding of a planned wage increase and, finally, to recognize and bargain with the Union.

The employer challenges the Board's finding that it committed unfair labor practices. It also contends that the Union's majority showing was tainted by the use of supervisory employees to obtain authorization cards and that a bargaining order is not an appropriate remedy. With the exception of the withholding of the preplanned wage increase we find the Board's unfair labor practice determinations to be supported by substantial evidence. The cease and desist and notice aspects of the order are therefore enforced to that extent. The requirements that the employer make whole the employees for lost wages and bargain with the Union are, however, improper. The bargaining order is vacated and the case remanded so that a return election may be held.

The employer operates numerous retail department stores throughout the country. In July of 1977, the Union began an organizing campaign at the employer's Green Acres store. The bargaining unit at the store consisted of about 105 employees and by August 3, 1977, the Union had obtained signed authorization cards from 73 of those employees. On the basis of this showing the Union petitioned for a representation election. Approximately 34 of the 73 cards had been collected by two individuals named Muriel Hirst and Diane Puglia. The employer, believing these two women to be supervisors, moved on August 12, 1977, to dismiss the election petition on the ground that the Union's showing of interest was tainted by supervisor-participation. This motion was eventually denied by the Regional Director and then by the Board. The election was held on October 28, 1977, with the direction that the votes of Hirst and Puglia be challenged and their supervisory status determined in a post-election hearing if necessary. The result was a 44–44 tie vote.

After the election the Union filed objections and unfair labor practice charges alleging that the employer violated the Act by having granted a wage increase some three weeks before the election and by various instances of interrogation, solicitation of grievances and accusations of disloyalty. A hearing was held before an administrative law judge (ALJ) during which the Union's complaint was amended by the Regional Director to add an allegation that the employer had improperly withheld a wage increase. The ALJ found that certain conversations which the Green Acres store manager, Mr.

Sweetser, and other higher level company officials had had with employees Rosenburg, Caraprese and Hayes violated § 8(a)(1) and that the employer had also violated § 8(a)(1) by unlawfully granting a wage increase prior to the election. However, the ALJ also found that Hirst and Puglia were supervisors, that the withholding of the wage increase had not been unlawful and that a bargaining order was not warranted.

Upon review a three-member panel of the Board agreed with the ALJ as to the minor § 8(a)(1) violations and the unlawful grant of a wage increase. All three members, however, held that the ALJ had erred in finding that Hirst and Puglia were supervisors and that the withholding of the wage increase had been proper. A two-member majority then concluded that a bargaining order was required. Member Penello, agreeing with the ALJ, dissented from this aspect of the Board's ruling.

The wage increase dispute, which is the linchpin of the Board's case, stemmed from a decision made by the employer in July of 1977, before the beginning of the Union's organization drive, to raise wages at all Long Island stores. The decision was prompted by an expected rise in the minimum wage (which it had always been the employer's policy to anticipate) and by the fact that the employer had opened a new Long Island store in Holbrook where the company found it necessary to pay higher wages to attract employees, which led employees in other Newberry stores to expect comparable increases. No fixed date for the implementation of the wage increase at the Green Acres store was set, but it was expected to occur during August.

Both sides agree that the decision to increase wages had been made by the company without regard to any union considerations. The controversy revolves around the timing of implementation. The employer, on the advice of counsel, did not grant the increase in August or September, since its motion to dismiss the election petition was pending before the Regional Director. On October 3, 1977, after being informed that the Regional Director had upheld the Union's showing of interest and had directed that an election be held on October 28, 1977, counsel advised management that the wage increase could be implemented at the Green Acres store. On October 6, 1977, Vice-President Elliott visited the Green Acres store and in the context of what the Board and the ALJ describe as an "anti-union" speech, announced the wage increase. The speech itself was not found to be an unfair labor practice.

DISCUSSION

1. The Unfair Labor Practices

The Board's finding, in agreement with the ALJ, that management's interrogation and solicitation of employees Rosenburg, Caraprese and Hayes amounted to § 8(a)(1) violations is supported by substantial evidence. However, for reasons noted infra, these violations were minor and would in no event support a bargaining order or an award of back pay. Although the question is a close one, substantial evidence also supports the Board's acceptance of the ALJ's conclusion that the timing of the employer's eventual announcement and grant of the wage increase was a violation of § 8(a)(1), even though the employer's initial decision to raise wages was perfectly legitimate. The Board's conclusion, which disagreed with the ALJ, that the employer's previous withholding of the increase violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (3), however, is not so supported.

Having previously decided to increase wages, the employer in August 1977 was in the position of being forced to tread on eggshells, being caught in a potential "damned if you do, damned if you don't," situation. NLRB v. Dorn's Transportation Co., 405 F.2d 706, 715 (2d Cir. 1969). The predicament is one in which the employer's motives play an important part in judging the legality of its actions.

> "Employers, with some justification, have argued that there is a potential for confusion and unfairness in rules that may make it illegal, on the one hand, to withhold and, on the other hand, to grant, a wage increase. But neither course has been declared illegal per se. It becomes so only if the employer is found to be manipulating benefits in order to influence his employees' decision during the union's organizing campaign." NLRB v. Otis Hospital, 545 F.2d 252, 255 (1st Cir. 1976).

See also, Free-Flow Packaging Corp. v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1124 (9th Cir. 1978); Dorn's Transportation, supra, 405 F.2d at 715 ("The issue under the Act is therefore whether in form and in purpose the withholding or conferring of economic benefits was to discourage and frustrate the statutory right of employees freely to organize and bargain collectively.")

In this case, 20-20 hindsight supports the view that because the employer's decision to increase wages was made prior to and independently of any union activity, it would have gone ahead and implemented the raise in the face of the union drive. But if the employer did so it faced the serious risk, as its attorneys recognized, that an increase in wages so soon after the Union petitioned for an election would lead to an unfair labor practice charge. It seems more than likely that if the employer had raised wages in August, the Union would not have conceded that the employer was merely implementing a predetermined, non-discretionary, benefit. Thus, in this context the employer's mere withholding of a raise in the face of a union campaign does not automatically amount to an unfair labor practice. The purpose and effect of the employer's action must first be ascertained.

The ALJ concluded that the purpose and effect of the withholding were legitimate. He noted first that the employer had relied on the advice of its lawyers and stated, correctly in both respects, that "while it is clear that Respondent is not relieved from any liability on the grounds that it acted pursuant to the advice of counsel, [NLRB v. Hendel Manufacturing Co., Inc., 483 F.2d 350, 353 (2d Cir. 1973)], this is nevertheless a factor to be considered in determining whether Respondent's motivation was unlawful." 249 N.L.R.B. No. 126 at 25. He then went on to observe that the record was "absolutely barren" of any evidence indicating that the decision to increase pay had ever been communicated to the employees prior to its being implemented at the various stores or that the Green Acres employees were ever aware of management's decision to grant and subsequently withhold a pay increase. "Therefore," the ALJ concluded, "it cannot be said that the Respondent made any effort to capitalize on the initial decision to grant or the subsequent decision to withhold the wage increases from Green Acres employees. In these circumstances, it can hardly be said that the Respondent was seeking to interfere with the employees' freedom of choice . . . by deciding to withhold the wage increases from the employees. [Citations omitted]." Id. at 26.

The Board rejected this approach, concluding instead that > "it is reasonable to presume that Respondent's decision to withhold the August increase at Green Acres was not only likely to become known to the Green Acres employees but also to be understood by such employees as interference with their organizational activities. Thus, the absence of a specific announcement that the increase was being withheld at Green Acres—but being granted at all other Long Island stores operated by Respondent—does not alter the conclusion that Respondent's withholding of the wage increase violated the Act." Id. at 7.

The record does not support this presumption. The bulk of the testimony cited by the General Counsel in support of the Board's position reflects only management's knowledge of a general employee awareness that higher wages were being paid at the company's new Holbrook store. It does not indicate that the employees knew of the decision to increase their wages or of the subsequent decision to withhold the increases at Green Acres. Only one somewhat confused letter might be construed as supporting the proposition that the employees knew that decisions had been made to grant them increases and then to withhold the raise because of their union activity. As against this confusing letter it appears very probable that if the employees had such knowledge the Union would surely have objected on the ground that a benefit had been unlawfully withheld. But it did not. More important, although the Board's General Counsel called numerous Green Acres employee witnesses, he did not elicit testimony from any of them that they knew during August and September that they were being deprived of a planned increase. On this record the Board's contrary presumption is not supported by substantial evidence.

In light of the undisputed circumstances—the employer's inability to predict with any degree of certainty whether an implementation in August of its previously adopted raise would be viewed by the Board as lawful, its reliance on the good faith advice of counsel, its pains to refrain from capitalizing on the withholding, and the Union's failure to complain of the withholding—we agree with the ALJ that the withholding did not have an anti-union purpose or effect and was thus now shown to be unlawful.

2. The Bargaining Order

As we have recently reiterated, a rerun election and not a bargaining order is the preferred remedy for employer misconduct which taints a union election. NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 632 F.2d 208, 212 (2d Cir. 1980). The issuance by the Board of a bargaining order in lieu of a new election is "only proper if, after an objective review of all of the relevant surrounding circumstances, including the nature of the employer's misbehavior and any later events bearing on its impact on the employees, it may reasonably be concluded that the employees will be unable to exercise a free choice in a Board-supervised rerun election." Id. We cannot agree with the Board that such a conclusion can reasonably be reached in this case.

The employer's initial withholding of the wage increase was not an unfair labor practice. The interrogations of the three employees, though technically § 8(a)(1) violations, were very minor infractions which could never support the issuance of a bargaining order. As Member Penello correctly observed in his dissent, these violations "involved only 3 employees in a unit of about 100, took place over a period of several months, and would not tend to have a lasting effect on the employees." 249 N.L.R.B. No. 126 at 15 n. 14. Additionally, there is no evidence that the violations were ever communicated to other employees. Thus, the only employer conduct which could possibly provide a framework for a bargaining order in this case was the employer's implementation of the wage increase. That the Board majority did base its decision primarily on that action is revealed by its statement, "Respondent's grant of a substantial wage increase to all unit employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act is sufficient to render it unlikely that a fair election could be held." Id. at 8–9.

It is true that the improper grant of significant economic benefits to employees is often characterized as a "hallmark" unfair labor practice which will justify a bargaining order in the absence of mitigating circumstances or evidence showing that the conduct is not as serious as it may seem. See, Jamaica Towing, supra, 632 F.2d at 212–13. The mere presence of such a violation, however, does not automatically preclude a fair second election or mandate the issuance of a bargaining order. Circumstances may exist where grants of economic benefits, even combined with additional unfair labor practices, are insufficient to support a bargaining order. See, e.g., First Lakewood Assn. v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 416 (7th Cir. 1976); Donn Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 162 (6th Cir. 1980). Rather than react in knee jerk fashion to the presence of a hallmark violation, the Board must still analyze the nature of the misconduct and the surrounding and succeeding events in each case in an effort to assess the potential for a free and uncoerced election under current conditions. Undertaking such an analysis here, it is clear that, in the language of Jamaica Towing, more than one "significant mitigating circumstance exists," 632 F.2d at 212, both with respect to the violation itself and later events, which render a bargaining order both unnecessary and inappropriate.

In the present case it is undisputed that the employer's decision to raise wages had been made independently of any union considerations and that the earlier withholding was not motivated by anti-union purposes. The normal inference of anti-union animus is difficult to draw from the increase in these circumstances. Nor do they indicate any substantial likelihood that anti-union conduct will be repeated, which is a usual inference from an improper benefit grant. As the ALJ said:

> "Although the granting of the wage increases was found to be unlawful under the circumstances, its history cannot be ignored; i.e., the decision to grant the wage increase was made prior to the advent of the organizing campaign, and the > Respondent withheld the wage increase after the filing of the Union's petition in order to avoid an unfair labor practice charge while contesting the validity of the authorization cards." 249 N.L.R.B. No. 126 at 28.

In addition, the ALJ specifically found that the October decision to go ahead with the increase was premised on an "honest but misconceived judgment of counsel." Id.

The undisputed surrounding circumstances here further dispel the notion that the wage increase might have a coercive impact on Green Acres employees or be viewed by them in the future as a deterrent against their embracing the Union. The Green Acres employees, aware that the employer had been required to pay higher wages to those at Holbrook, could hardly have viewed the increase as largesse designed to impress them with the enthusiasm for union representation. On the contrary, they understood when the increase was announced that it had been delayed only by reason of the Board's election proceedings. As Member Penello of the Board observed in his dissent:

> "In announcing the raise, Respondent stated that the employees would not receive the increases they deserved. The majority concludes that the employees at the Green Acres store were aware that employees at the other stores had already received raises. Thus, the Green Acres employees would be less likely to see the raise as an inducement to vote against the Union. When informing its employees that the 'logjam' was finally broken, Respondent, in fact, placed the onus for the delay on the Regional Director and the timing of the Decision and Direction of Election rather than blaming employees' union sentiments or activities. While I have no doubt that these actions of Respondent are violations of the Act, they are not of the type to preclude employees' free choice in the election process." Id. at 15.

Finally, despite the Board's apparently continuing refusal to consider subsequent events and current conditions in weighing the need for bargaining orders, we hold that both are relevant. Jamaica Towing, supra, 632 F.2d at 214–15. In this case there has been a particularly high employee turnover. As of October 6, 1980, only 38 of the 105 employees (or less than 37%) who voted in the original election are still working at Green Acres. The effect of a bargaining order could thus easily be to impose upon the employees a union not desired by the great majority of them. Where, as here, there is no indication that the employer in any way deliberately created delay in order to profit from it and, since the unfair labor practice involved was not egregious in the first place, the risk of this unwanted imposition is unwarranted.

The preferred remedy remains a new election. Only where there is a substantial danger that employees will be inhibited by the employer's conduct from adhering to the union should a bargaining order issue. The Board errs in taking the view that bargaining orders should liberally be granted as remedies despite evidence that a new election would suffice.

3. The Supervisory Issue

Finally, the Board's finding that Hirst and Puglia were not supervisors, though in contrast to the ALJ's determination, is supported by substantial evidence. The Board's statement that Hirst, "while an experienced and trusted employee, does not possess any indicia of supervisory status," 249 N.L.R.B. No. 126 at 3, and its characterization of Puglia as a "nonsupervisory leadman," id. at 5, both appear to be fair interpretations of the facts. The rule with respect to supervisory determinations is that

> "the Board's findings in this area are entitled to 'special weight,' Amalgamated Local Union 355 v. NLRB, 481 F.2d 996, 999–1000 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1002 [94 S.Ct. 357, 38 L.Ed.2d 238] (1973), in light of the Board's expertise 'in evaluating actual power distributions which exist within an enterprise,' NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 405 F.2d 1169, 1172 (2d Cir. 1968)." NLRB v. Porta Systems Corp., 625 F.2d 399, 401 (2d Cir. 1980).

The employer's claim that the Union's card majority was tainted by supervisory solicitation is accordingly rejected.

4. Relief

The cease and desist order as it related to unfair labor practices based on the solicitation and interrogation of employees and grant of benefits is enforced. The bargaining and make-whole orders are vacated and the case is remanded to the Board with directions to order a rerun election.

On petitions to review Board Order

Before TAMM, ROBB and MIKVA, Circuit Judges

MIKVA, Circuit Judge: These cases are petitions for review of two separate orders of the National Labor Relations Board (Board). In No. 80–2085, the Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment in favor of the union, awarding the union all the relief it sought. The union filed a petition for review in this court alleging that it was aggrieved by the failure of the Board to rule specifically on the union's motion for summary judgment. In the consolidated cases Nos. 80–1746, 80–2152 and 80–2278, the Board gave another union all the relief sought from the Board save an award of attorney's fees. The union filed a petition for review in this court, alleging that it was aggrieved by this refusal of the Board to grant special relief to the union.

In both cases, the employer moved to transfer the proceedings to another circuit pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a) (1976).[1] Because neither union was "genuinely aggrieved" by the Board order of which it sought review, this court transferred No. 80–2085 to the Ninth Circuit and Nos. 80–1746, 80–2152 and 80–2278 to the Second Circuit "[f]or the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice."

I. FACTS.

A. No. 80–2085.

On the basis of an unfair labor practice charge filed March 17, 1980 by the Amalgamated Transit Union, Local 1309 (Local 1309), the Board on April 15 issued a complaint and notice of hearing, alleging that Bayshore Transit Management (Bayshore), had refused to bargain with Local 1309 as the certified representative of its employees. On May 9, 1980, Local 1309 filed with the Board a motion for summary judgment, alleging in support that:

(1) Bayshore was seeking to litigate issues in the unfair labor practice proceeding which were or could have been litigated in prior representation proceedings;
(2) Bayshore did not assert the existence of any recently discovered facts or special circumstances justifying litigation; and
(3) Bayshore admitted in its answer that it had refused to bargain at all with Local 1309.

One week later, May 16, 1980, the General Counsel of the Board also filed a motion for summary judgment. Its allegations were identical to those contained in Local 1309's motion for summary judgment.

The Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment, August 27, 1980, for precisely the same reasons put forward by both Local 1309 and General Counsel. It ordered Bayshore to cease and desist from its unfair labor practice, to bargain collectively with Local 1309 upon request, and to post notice. Decision and Order, Bayshore Transit Mngmt., Inc., and Amalgamated Transit Union, 251 N.L.R.B. No. 136 (August 27, 1980).

Local 1309 filed in this court a petition to review the Board's order, September 9, 1980. Bayshore filed its petition to review the order September 22, 1980, in the Ninth Circuit (9th Cir. No. 80–7513). On November 3, 1980, the Board filed the certified record with this court as the court of first filing, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a) (1976).

[1] Section 2112(a) provides, in relevant part,

> If proceedings have been instituted in two or more courts of appeals with respect to the same order the agency, board, commission, or officer concerned shall file the record in that one of such courts in which a proceeding with respect to such order was first instituted. The other courts in which such proceedings are pending shall thereupon transfer them to the court of appeals in which the record has been filed. For the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice such court may thereafter transfer all the proceedings with respect to such order to any other court of appeals.

Bayshore intervened in this court and on October 23, 1980, filed its motion to dismiss or transfer this case to the Ninth Circuit. The gist of Bayshore's motion was that Local 1309 was not a "person aggrieved" within the meaning of § 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976), and therefore lacked standing to petition this court for review. Alternatively Bayshore sought to have this case transferred under authority of 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a) to the Ninth Circuit "for the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice." Bayshore pointed out that, as the truly aggrieved party, it had properly filed a petition to review the Board's order in the Ninth Circuit. Both the company and Local 1309 are located in San Diego, California, where the alleged unfair labor practice took place. The law firms engaged by the parties to represent them are also located in San Diego. There do not appear to be any countervailing considerations.

B. Nos. 80–1746, 80–2152, 80–2278.

On September 21, 1979, an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) found that the unilateral promulgation of new c. o. d. collection procedures by liquor wholesalers imposed substantial additional duties and burdens on the wholesalers' liquor salesmen. The ALJ found this unilateral change in working conditions to violate §§ 8(a)(1), (a)(5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (a)(5) (1976). The Board on June 30, 1980, affirmed the findings of the ALJ and adopted her recommended order, which directed the companies to cancel the new working conditions, restore the status quo ante, make whole the employees for loss of time and expenses incurred as a result of the working conditions, rescind any disciplinary action, bargain with Liquor Salesmen's Union Local 2 (Local 2) upon request, and post the appropriate notice, Decision and Order, Charmer Industries, Inc., et al. and Liquor Salesmen's Union, Local 2, 250 N.L.R.B. No. 31 (June 30, 1980). The Board did not specifically address, and therefore left undisturbed, the finding of the ALJ that, because the facts did not support the allegation of frivolous litigation, Local 2 was not entitled to attorney's fees.

Local 2 filed in this court on July 3, 1980, a petition to review the order of the Board denying attorney's fees to the Union. (D.C. Cir. Docket No. 80–1746). On July 29, 1980, Charmer Industries, Inc., and four other liquor wholesalers (the Companies) filed a petition to review the Board's order in the Second Circuit. By stipulation of the parties this later-filed petition was transferred to this court, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a). (D.C.Cir. Docket No. 80–2152). A later petition in the Second Circuit filed by Park & Tilford & Motel & Club, Divisions of Knickerbocker Liquor Corp., was transferred to this court October 20, 1980 by the Second Circuit. (D.C.Cir. Docket No. 80–2278). This court consolidated all three cases.

The Companies intervened in No. 80–1746 and on October 21, 1980, moved to transfer the consolidated proceedings to the Second Circuit. The Companies argued that this court should not respect Local 2's first-filed petition because Local 2 was not "genuinely aggrieved." The Second Circuit, the Companies insisted, is a more convenient forum. The Companies and Local 2 are located in New York, counsel for both parties reside in New York, and the alleged unfair labor practices took place there as well.

II. SECTION 2112(A) AND THE FORUM PREFERENCE IN LABOR CASES

These cases graphically illustrate a problem which has plagued the federal courts for years and which now approaches epidemic proportions: the forum shopping inherent in judicial review of administrative action. A party who has substantially if not completely prevailed before the agency files a petition for review—ofttimes within seconds of the agency order—solely to guarantee that review will occur in the forum of its choice. This initial filing automatically triggers 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a), the venue provision governing judicial review of administrative action, requiring the agency to file its record in the court of first filing, and directing all other courts of appeals to transfer to the court of first filing any later-filed petitions for review of the same order. Although the court of first filing is authorized to transfer the petions to any court of appeals "for the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice," the transfer authority is not always exercised, even when appropriate.

It is a commonly held belief among members of the bar that the courts of appeals read into § 2112(a) a rebuttable presumption that the court of first filing will also decide the case. Whether or not this view is an accurate one, all too often the court of first filing unwittingly allows § 2112(a) to be used as a tool by private parties to forum-shop among the circuits. We take this opportunity once again[2] to express our disapproval of this "unseemly" practice, and make clear that this court intends to utilize the statutory and inherent authority at our disposal to curb this abuse.

Where a party aggrieved by an order of the Board seeks review of that order, the court will generally respect the petitioning party's choice of forum. But where there are two petitions for review of the same order filed in different circuits, the wishes of both parties cannot, of course, be accommodated. Section 2112(a) permits the court of first filing to transfer the entire proceedings to any other court of appeals "for the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice." Although transfer is discretionary with the court, this discretion is in large part guided by a set of criteria established by case law.

In reviewing orders of the NLRB, the courts of appeals have placed special emphasis on the choice of forum of the truly aggrieved party. Where two parties are genuinely aggrieved by the Board's order, but one manages to race to the courthouse ahead of the other, the rationale for preferring a party's choice of forum found in many § 2112(a) decisions disappears. Nonetheless, the forum preference persists. Employer, union and Board alike perceive that the court of first filing will hear the case absent a good reason to transfer it elsewhere. This accurate perception has encouraged if not demanded a fierce race to the courthouse. The higher the stakes are thought to be by petitioners, the more sophisticated (and certainly the more expensive) the race.

This court has respected and will continue to respect an aggrieved party's choice to file a petition for review in this circuit. Congress, in enacting § 10(f) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976),[3] "place[d] this court on a par with the courts of appeals for the circuits in which the alleged unfair labor practices occurred." International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers v. NLRB, 610 F.2d 956, 962 (D.C.Cir.1979). This is in contrast to § 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), which authorizes the Board to seek enforcement of its order only in the circuit in which the unfair labor practice allegedly took place, or in which the respondent resides or transacts business. "By not eliminating, but expressly acknowledging, the District of Columbia as an alternative forum, the apparent aim of Congress is to ease the situation of a losing party desiring review. It affords the losing party a choice denied the Board when it proceeds under section 10(e)." Ball v. NLRB, 299 F.2d 683, 688 (4th Cir. 1962), quoted in International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 610 F.2d at 962 n.49. This respect due an aggrieved party who chooses to file in this court emanates from the congressional desire to assist the losing party. No such respect is due a person who has substantially prevailed before the Board.

It must be emphasized that § 2112(a) is a mechanical device to determine which court will determine venue, not which court will ultimately hear the case. Transfer is entirely discretionary with the court of first filing.[4] The courts have developed a set of factors to consider when presented with a motion to transfer brought under § 2112(a). In fleshing out the phrase "for the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice," the courts have considered the location of counsel, location of the parties, whether the impact of the litigation is local to one region, whether one circuit is more familiar with the same parties and issues or related issues than other courts, the caseloads of the respective courts, and whether there is but one truly aggrieved party.[5]

[3] That section provides, in pertinent part, that

> Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in any United States court of appeals in the circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing in such a court a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or set aside.

[4] Even without § 2112(a), the courts of appeals have the inherent power to transfer a case to another court of appeals. Abourezk v. FPC, 513 F.2d 504, 505 n.1 (D.C.Cir.1976) Bazelon and Wright, JJ., concurring); Eastern Air Lines, Inc., v. CAB, 354 F.2d 507, 510 (D.C.Cir.1965). The criteria used in evaluating the propriety of the transfer are largely the same.

In Public Service Commission v. FPC, 472 F.2d 1270, 1272 (D.C.Cir.1972), this court observed that any preference for the forum in which the first petition was filed is subject to certain exceptions, including one "[f]or a case where the first petition to review is filed by a party who is not substantially aggrieved, in effect undercutting the assumption of a good faith petition to review." [6] We are presented in these cases with examples of this exception. In UAW v. NLRB, 373 F.2d 671, 673 (D.C.Cir.1967), the case relied on by the court in Public Service Commission, this court stated that "§ 2112(a) requires respect for the forum where the Union filed its petition for review, since that was the first petition for review filed, and we cannot say either that the Union's claim is frivolous or that it is not genuinely aggrieved." But the court noted that

> [w]e do not think a party's selection of forum is necessarily controlling if it has received substantially all the relief contemplated, and any shortfall is inconsequential even though it does not eliminate the technical status of "aggrievement."
> [T]he possibility of a transfer on this ground is not to be taken as permitting trial by affidavit on the issue of motivation. It is reserved for the special case where the "inconsequential" character of the deficiency in findings or relief is established by the petitioner's own stipulation * * * or other pleading or representation.

373 F.2d at 674 (citation omitted).

As this court emphasized in UAW and reiterated in International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers v. NLRB, 610 F.2d 956, 962 (D.C.Cir.1979), Public Service Commission, 472 F.2d at 1272 & n.2, Municipal Distributors Group v. FPC, 459 F.2d 1367 (D.C.Cir.1972), and Truck Drivers & Helpers Local No. 728 v. NLRB, 386 F.2d 643, 644 (D.C.Cir.1967), only in the "special case" will transfer be warranted for this reason.

The courts are loathe to examine the merits of the case in order to decide this question. Certainly it is inappropriate to compare the relative aggrievement of the union and the company, where both are substantial.[7] It is normally assumed that the union filed its petition because it was aggrieved, not for the purpose of forum shopping. If it appears from the insubstantiality of the pleadings that the union filed first largely to secure a forum believed favorable to it, then such first filing will be disregarded. With these relatively clear guidelines appropriate for application, we turn to the cases at hand.

III. ARE THE UNIONS GENUINELY AGGRIEVED?

A. No. 80-2085

This case is a particularly egregious example of filing solely to forum-shop. It taxes the imagination to find a basis for Local 1309's standing to file a petition for review of the Board's order.[8] Both [6] The court's discussion of § 2112(a) suggests that, in the absence of those exceptions, the statute does create a presumption in favor of review in the court of first filing. None of the most recent opinions of this court which discuss § 2112(a) refers to any sort of presumption or forum preference, although the language in Public Service Commission has not been disapproved. See International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers v. NLRB, 610 F.2d 956, 961 (D.C.Cir.1979); Industrial Union Dept., AFL–CIO v. Bingham, 570 F.2d 965 (D.C.Cir. 1977); American Public Gas Ass'n v. FPC, 555 F.2d 852 (D.C.Cir.1976); Abourezk v. FPC, 513 F.2d 504, 505 n.1 (D.C.Cir.1975) (Bazelon and Wright, JJ., concurring).

[7] See also United Steelworkers of America v. Marshall, 592 F.2d 693, 696 (3d Cir. 1979). It appears that not all circuits have been as reluctant to weigh the comparative aggrievement of the parties. ITT World Communications, Inc. v. FCC, 621 F.2d 1201, 1208 (2d Cir. 1980) ("It is a well recognized principle that the interests of justice favor placing the adjudication in the forum chosen by the party that is significantly aggrieved by the agency decision."); J. L. Simmons Co. v. NLRB, 425 F.2d 52, 55 (7th Cir. 1970) ("The aggrievement, if any, suffered by the company as a result of the Board's order, which granted substantially all the relief requested, is insignificant when compared with that claimed by the union."); Chatham Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 404 F.2d 1116, 1118 (4th Cir. 1968).

> Even if the party first filing a "petition for review" has some legitimate complaint about the board's order, but is substantially the prevailing party, the court has the discretionary right under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2112(a) to transfer the proceedings to any other court of appeals when such a transfer would be for the convenience of the parties and the interest of justice.

[8] Section 10(f) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976), allows "any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board" to petition a court of appeals for

Continued

Bayshore and the Board argue that Local 1309 has received all the relief it requested from the decision of the Board. Local 1309 does not really contest this. Instead, it claims that the failure of the Board to pass specifically on Local 1309's motion for summary judgement has "aggrieved" Local 1309 within § 10(f). This argument is so gossamer that it affords no cover for the union's attempt to place venue in this court for ulterior purposes.

Local 1309 reads Sections 102.24, 102.25, and 102.50 of the NLRB's Rules and Regulations to require the Board to "issue a written decision with respect to any motion submitted to it."[9] In a burst of hyperbole Local 1309 concludes that "[t]he entire concept of due process as it is expressed in our legal system is based upon the fact that a party making a motion has a right to have a ruling on that motion." If indeed the Board is required to rule on this motion, either by its own regulations or the "entire concept" of due process, then this appears to be the classic case of harmless error.[10]

Local 1309 has failed to point out to this court any additional or different relief the Board or this court can award it, apart from this abstract obligation of the Board to answer all motions in writing.[11] Under these circumstances, the test set out in UAW has been satisfied. Local 1309's choice of forum is thus entitled to no weight.

A canvass of the factors which courts employ in discretionary transfer cases brought under § 2112(a) leads to the ineluctable conclusion that the Ninth Circuit is the appropriate forum to hear the case. Bayshore is the truly aggrieved party, and has properly filed there a petition for review of the Board's order. Both the company and the union local are located in San Diego, California, where the alleged unfair labor practices took place.[12] The law firms engaged by the parties to represent them are located in San Diego. Convenience of the parties, and more importantly, convenience of counsel are relevant factors in deciding whether to transfer.[13] The Board itself suggested that this case be transferred to the Ninth Circuit: It is done.

review of that order. (All the courts of appeals have jurisdiction to review and enforce orders of the NLRB. Section 10(f), which designates the proper fora for review of a Board's order, is concerned only with venue. NLRB v. Wilder Mfg. Co., 454 F.2d 995, 998 n.12 (D.C.Cir. 1972), and authorities cited therein.) In Retail Clerk's Union 1059 v. NLRB, 348 F.2d 369, 370 (D.C.Cir. 1965), this court held that one has standing to appeal an order of the Board within the meaning of § 10(f) if there is demonstrated an "adverse effect in fact" on the petitioner. The refusal to rule specifically on Local 1309's motion for summary judgement arguably does not even amount to technical aggrievement as it is not clear how Local 1309 is adversely affected by such refusal.

If Local 1309 lacks standing to petition this court for review of the Board's order, it would be proper to dismiss the petition. We prefer not to dismiss this petition, however, but to follow precedent and to transfer the Union's petition to the Ninth Circuit where that court may determine, as relevant, the issue of Local 1309's standing.

In Insurance Workers International Union v. NLRB, 360 F.2d 823, 827 (D.C.Cir.1966), this court held that because the Union was afforded all the relief it had sought, it was not "such a person aggrieved as to be entitled to seek review of the Board's order in this court * * *." The court did not grant the motion to dismiss, however, but transferred the proceedings to the Seventh Circuit.

> Our denial will be without prejudice to renewal by the [movant] in the transferee court. We should not and we do not undertake to bind the Seventh Circuit on the Union's claim that it is a person aggrieved. That court will be free to rule on the Union's standing. We say only that at this stage of the consolidated proceedings, it has not been made to appear to this court that the Union was entitled to seek here a review of the Board's order.

360 F.2d at 827–828. Accord: J. L. Simmons Co. v. NLRB, 425 F.2d 52, 54 (7th Cir. 1970) (Court declined to dismiss on standing grounds, though it had serious doubts whether the company was in fact aggrieved, and transferred the petitions instead).

[9] Section 102.25, triggered by §§ 102.24 and 102.50, provides that a trial examiner shall rule on all prehearing motions and all such rulings and orders shall be issued in writing. "Whenever the trial examiner has reserved his ruling on any motion, and the preceeding is thereafter transferred to the Board * * * the Board shall rule on such motion."

[10] It is not all that clear that the Board erred here. The Board could be said to have "ruled" on petitioner's summary judgement motion by granting the twin motion of the General Counsel. However, the Board expressly stated that it declined to rule on Local 1309's motion, as it was unnecessary to do so. 251 N.L.R.B. No. 136, slip op. at 6 n.5. The Board hinted that Local 1309 might not have standing to file its motion in the first place, id. Grounding its decision on the General Counsel's summary judgement motion obviated a discussion and decision on the standing issue.

It certainly cannot be argued, in view of the Board's footnote, that the Board "ignored" petitioner's motion. To argue as Local 1309 does that the failure to "rule" on its motion is the significant fact, disregarding the full consideration the Board gave to each argument contained in the motion, is to exalt form over substance.

[11] In a very similar factual situation, the Seventh Circuit stated that "a serious question is presented whether the Board's refusal to rule on the company's contention on this issue made the company a 'person aggrieved' within the meaning of section 10(f)". J. L. Simmons Co v. NLRB, 425 F.2d 52, 54 (7th Cir. 1970). The court did not so hold, however, preferring to rest its decision on the genuine aggrievement doctrine. See note 8 supra.

[13] See United Steelworkers of America v. Marshall, 592 F.2d 693, 697 (3d Cir. 1979) ("The only significant convenience factor which affects petitioners seeking review of rulemaking on an agency record is the convenience of counsel who will brief and argue the petitions."); McGarity, supra note 5, at 62–64.

B. Nos. 80-1746, 80-2152, 80-2278

The petition filed by Local 2 in No. 80-1746 is marginally different from the above case because the petitioning party received all of the customary relief it requested from the Board, but did not receive the special or extraordinary relief it sought in addition. In the process of directing the employer to cancel working conditions which were unilaterally promulgated, restore the status quo ante, make whole the employees for loss of time and expenses incurred as a result of the working conditions, rescind any disciplinary action, bargain with Local 2 upon request, and post the appropriate notice, the Board did not specifically address and therefore denied Local 2's request for attorney's fees. Local 2 argues this was error, rendering it substantially aggrieved.

Each and every aspect of the Board's order is directed to the wholesalers. It is only the denial of attorney's fees which renders Local 2 "a person aggrieved" and permits it to file a petition for review.[14] Because this aggrievement relates to no part of the underlying dispute between employer and union other than fees and costs, it is insubstantial.

This court has held that the Board has the power, pursuant to § 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976) [15], to award to the charging party counsel fees and litigation costs as additional affirmative relief. Food Store Employees Union, Local 347 v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 546, 550-551 (D.C.Cir. 1973), rev'd in part on other grounds, 417 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974). But the Board has determined that such an award is appropriate only upon a showing of "clearly aggravated and pervasive misconduct" or when the defenses are "palpably without merit." International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers v. NLRB, 426 F.2d 1243, 1250 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 950, 91 S.Ct. 239, 27 L.Ed.2d 256 (1970).[16] Although the union persistently prays for attorney's fees, such fees and litigation expenses are generally not considered by the Board as part and parcel of its usual compensatory remedy. Only in rare cases are attorney's fees granted by the Board, and rarer still the case where a court of appeals will reverse the Board's denial of attorney's fees.[17] The Board's choice of remedies in enforcing the Act is entitled to great deference from the courts. As this court recently stated, "the imposition of remedies is a matter of special administrative competence, subject to very limited judicial review." United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, 646 F.2d 616, at 629 (D.C.Cir.1981). With these considerations in mind, we believe that a petition for review, filed solely to fight an uphill battle with respect to no part of the underlying dispute between employer and union other than litigation expenses, may be considered so "inherently implausible or insubstantial" that it should not be determinative of the forum for review.[18]

We do not intend to suggest that a request for extraordinary relief denied by the Board will never render the charging party genuinely aggrieved. But it is for the Board in the first instance to determine if the facts justify such an award. Our review of that decision is "very limited."

Prior opinions of this court wisely caution the court of first filing not to delve into the merits of the underlying dispute lest there be an appeal within an appeal. UAW, 373 F.2d at 364; International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 610 F.2d at 962. We observe that stricture, but here it is manifest from the parties' moving papers that Local 2's protest of a routine denial of counsel fees and litigation expenses was at best ancillary to the dispute. In such circumstances, the court of first filing can subordinate the forum preferences of a party who has substantially prevailed before the Board and seeks review only of the Board's refusal to grant it

[14] See note 8 supra.

[15] Section 10(c) provides in relevant part that the Board "shall take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of this subchapter."

[16] District 65, Distributive Workers of America v. NLRB, 593 F.2d 1155, 1167 (D.C.Cir.1978).

[17] Local 2 has not cited us to any decision of this court ordering the Board to award attorney's fees and this appears to be foreclosed by the Supreme Court's opinion in NLRB v. Food Store Employees Local 347, 417 U.S. 1, 10, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 2080, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974), where the Court stated:

> [W]hen a reviewing court concludes that an agency invested with broad discretion to fashion remedies has apparently abused that discretion by omitting a remedy justified in the court's view by the factual circumstances, remand to the agency for reconsideration, and not enlargement of the agency order, is ordinarily the reviewing court's proper course.

additional ancillary relief. The court may then engage in an appropriate exercise of discretion under § 2112(a) to retain the case or to transfer the case to an appropriate circuit "for the convenience of the parties in the interest of justice."[19]

The Second Circuit is the convenient forum in which this case should be heard. Local 2 and the Companies are all located in New York, and both sides have enlisted counsel from New York City on their behalf. The unfair labor practice allegedly occurred in New York.

Local 2 argues without citation that case law forbids the court of first filing room considering the residence of the parties and the situs of the alleged unfair labor practice. These arguments are incorrect. Residence of the parties, although not a major factor, nevertheless has been considered by this court. E. g., Industrial Union Dept., AFL-CIO v. Bingham, 570 F.2d 965, 971 (D.C.Cir.1977). Indeed, the plain wording of § 2112(a) belies any notion of its irrelevance. It is not true that where the unfair labor practice occured is immaterial. This court has noted only that the locus of the unfair practice should not be dispositive of a motion to transfer. International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, 610 F.2d at 962.

IV. CONCLUSION

It may be naive to hope that the bar would view all courts of appeals, and their judges, as fungible. We need not pause to determine whether the failure so to view the federal appellate process reflects on the bar or on the bench. In either event, courts need not and should not cater to the disingenuous reasons lawyers and parties give in seeking out one tribunal over another.

We believe that to be "genuinely aggrieved" by a decision of the Board, such aggrievement must result from a significant part of the Board's action. A party, whether it be employer or union, should not search out a remedy to request from the Board in an effort to choose a forum of review. Because it cannot be said that either union here was genuinely aggrieved by the Board's decision granting substantially all the relief it requested, this court has ordered No. 80-2085 transferred to the Ninth Circuit, and Nos. 80-1746, 80-2152 and 80-2278 transferred to the Second Circuit.

NLRB v. Manufacturer's Packaging Co., Inc.

645 F.2d 223 (4th Cir.), April 1, 1981—247 NLRB 1117

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before BRYAN, Senior Circuit Judge, PHILLIPS and ERVIN, Circuit Judges

224

ERVIN, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) has petitioned this court for enforcement of its order directing Manufacturer's Packaging Co., Inc. (the company) to bargain with Local 387, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO (the union) upon the union's request, and to take other remedial action, for violating section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) and (1). We grant enforcement.

I.

The union was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the company's production employees after it prevailed by a vote of 47 to 22 in a Board conducted representation election held on April 27, 1979. The company and the union met several times prior to the election to discuss the election. Initially, the parties disagreed on the proper bargaining unit: the union felt that the sub-supervisors should be included, and the company contended that they should be excluded. On March 9, 1979, the union and the company stipulated that sub-supervisors should be excluded. The stipulation was approved by the Board's Regional Director.

The company filed a timely objection to the election, contending that it had been tainted by the pro-union activities of certain sub-supervisors. Among the challenged activities were the following: two out of the ten sub-supervisors distributed one union card each to an employee, four wore union buttons, three attended union meetings, one signed a union authorization card, one transmitted an employee's signed union card to another employee and five made pro-union statements. The evidence shows that many of the Sub-supervisors' pro-union statements were made in response to employee inquiries. Furthermore, with the exception of one pro-union comment by a sub-supervisor, all the challenged activity took place prior to the March 9th stipulation which was made a full seven weeks prior to the election.

[19] Of course, the court of first filing may determine in its exercise of discretion that the convenience of the parties and the interest of justice demonstrate that the court should decline to transfer and instead entertain the case. But the court will reach this conclusion upon a consideration of the relevant factors and, more importantly, liberated from the forum preference.

The Regional Director found the company's objection to the election to be without merit and recommended in his written report that the Board certify the union as the exclusive bargaining agent. The company then filed exceptions to the report requesting either that a hearing be held on its objection or that the election be set aside or both. The Board denied the company's hearing request and adopted the recommendation of the Regional Director that the union be certified as the employees' exclusive bargaining representative. Shortly thereafter the union wrote the company requesting it to bargain with it, and the company refused.

II.

The question we must resolve is whether the Board's conclusion that the election was not tainted by the sub-supervisors' union activities should be upheld. The burden is on the party objecting to an election to show that the challenged activity has prejudiced the outcome of the election. NLRB v. Bata Shoe Co., 377 F.2d 821, 826 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 917, 88 S.Ct. 238, 19 L.Ed.2d 265 (1967). An election will not be set aside unless the conduct of one of the parties has prevented employees from making their collective desires effective. Schneider Mills, Inc. v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 375, 378 (4th Cir. 1968). The determination of a valid election is within the sound discretion of the Board, and the Board should be reversed only when it has abused its discretion. Id.

The Fourth Circuit has taken a strict approach to extensive supervisory participation in union campaigns. In Turner's Express, Inc. v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 289 (4th Cir. 1972), for example, in which the employer petitioned the court to set aside a Board bargaining order, the employer contended that the election should be set aside because of the pro-union activities of two supervisors. Two shop foremen of a trucking outfit, who had significant input into hiring, firing, and wage decisions, had voiced strong support for the union. Their union activities were substantial. They were largely responsible for bringing in a union organizer. They both interrogated employees about whether they intended to sign union authorization cards and to vote for the union, and they warned the employees that if they voted against the union, "things were going to get tough, and they would start paying for it after the election." Id. at 292. They told employees that they would get higher wages and more benefits if they voted for the union. Both supervisors also threatened employees who did not support the union. In finding that the supervisors' activities warranted setting aside the election, the court noted that it is not necessary for the employer to prove that supervisor pressure and coercion actually affected the result of the voting. Id. at 291.

We do not read Turner's Express, Inc. as establishing a per se rule invalidating a union election if there is any evidence of pro-union supervisory activity. Instead, whether pro-union supervisory activity is sufficient to overturn an election depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. The critical inquiry is whether the supervisors' pro-union activities prevented employees from freely effectuating their collective choice. Schneider Mills, Inc. v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 375, 378 (4th Cir. 1968). Employees' free choice is stifled and an election may be set aside if the supervisors' activities "contain the seeds of potential reprisal, punishment, or intimidation." NLRB v. San Antonio Portland Cement Co., 611 F.2d 1148, 1151 (5th Cir. 1980), citing NLRB v. WKRG-TV, Inc. 470 F.2d 1302, 1316 (5th Cir. 1973); accord, Global Marine Development of California, Inc. v. NLRB, 528 F.2d 92, 95 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 821, 97 S.Ct. 70, 50 L.Ed.2d 83 (1976). The activities of the supervisors in Turner's Express were obviously egregious, and there is no doubt that they were pervasive, coercive, and upsetting to election conditions.

In contrast, the sub-supervisors' pro-union activities in our case were minimal; most occurred more than seven weeks prior to the election and prior to the time that the sub-supervisors were excluded from the bargaining unit. Unlike the situation in Turner's Express, there is no evidence in our case that the sub-supervisors initiated or were significantly involved in an offensive strategy to get the company organized. In fact, much of the sub-supervisors' activities, particularly their pro-union comments, were not initiated by the sub-supervisors but were made in response to employee inquiries.

The Board's conclusions, based upon inferences drawn from conduct, should not be set aside unless the conclusions transgress the bounds of reasonableness. See Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn and Queens, Inc. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 20, 22 (2d Cir. 1980). We hold that there is substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion that the sub-supervisors' pro-union activities did not taint the election.[1]

Even if we were to adopt a per se rule, the record shows that the company knew of sub-supervisory union activity both prior and subsequent to the date when the sub-supervisors were specifically designated supervisors and made no attempt to disavow it. If an employer is aware of a supervisor's union activities and then stands idly by, the employer cannot subsequently rely on the supervisor's conduct for setting aside a representation election. NLRB v. Decatur Transfer & Storage, Inc., 430 F.2d 763, 764 (5th Cir. 1970). See NLRB v. Lord Baltimore Press, Inc., 300 F.2d 671, 673 (4th Cir. 1962) (advocacy of union by supervisor unbeknownst to employer is cause for annulment of election). Because of the company's knowledge of the sub-supervisors' activity, we find it estopped to complain about an unfair election.

We cannot conclude that the Board abused its discretion in refusing to overturn the election. We thus hold that the election was valid, that the company had a duty to bargain with the union, and that its refusal to bargain constituted an unfair labor practice. Accordingly, we grant enforcement of the Board's order.

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

[1] The company claims that is was entitled to a hearing on its election objections. A hearing is necessary if there are substantial and material issues of fact relating to the validity of the election. NLRB v. Bata Shoe Co., 377 F.2d 821, 825 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 917, 88 S.Ct. 238, 19 L.Ed.2d 265 (1967). To be entitled to a hearing, the objecting party must make a proffer of evidence "which prima facie would warrant setting aside an election." Id. at 826, quoting NLRB v. O.K. Van Storage, Inc., 297 F.2d 74, 75 (5th Cir. 1961). A hearing is unnecessary when, if all the facts supporting the position of the objecting party were credited, no ground is shown for setting aside the election. 377 F.2d at 826. In light of our conclusion that the supervisors' pro-union activities were minimal, we conclude that the Board did not abuse its discretion in refusing to accord the company a hearing.

HARRY T. EDWARDS, Circuit Judge: At issue in this case is whether an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA" or the "Act")[1] by seeking to compel employees, at an investigatory interview, to respond to questions raised by company counsel relating to a union grievance that has been scheduled for arbitration. The National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or the "Board") held in this case that Cook Paint & Varnish Company (the "company") violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening two employees with suspension or discharge if they refused to respond to such questions, and ordered the company to cease and desist from this allegedly unlawful conduct. In reaching this conclusion, the Board adopted what appears to be a per se rule that an employer may never use a threat of discipline to obtain information from an employee concerning a matter that has been set for arbitration. On petition for review brought by the company, and cross-application for enforcement by the Board, we decline to enforce the order of the Board and remand this case to the Board for further proceedings.

[1] 29 U.S.C. §§ 151-69.

The facts are not in dispute and may be stated briefly.[2] On February 3, 1978, in incident occurred at a company facility that contrbuted to the eventual discharge of employee Paul Thompson.[3] This discharge led to the filing of a contract grievance by the Paintmakers and Allied Trades Local 754 (the "union"), the certified, bargaining representative of the company's employees. When the grievance was not resolved successfully under the established grievance provisions of the collective bargaining agreement between the company and union, the union appealed the case to binding arbitration.

After the matter had been scheduled for arbitration, the company called in William Nulton, its outside labor relations attorney. A. 110.[4] The company presented Nulton with a case file on the dispute, which included information concerning two proceedings related to the Thompson discharge that had been decided adversely to the company. In one proceeding, Thompson had been awarded unemployment compensation from the Missouri Employment Security Division, after a hearing in which the company's contention that Thompson had been fired for cause was rejected. ALJ 3.[5] In the second proceeding, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) had issued a citation and fined the company $450 following an administrative investigation of the February 3 incident. A. 77, ALJ 3.

Believing that, as a result of the outcome of these two related proceedings, the arbitration case perhaps should be settled, Nulton decided to interview persons potentially knowledgeable of the February 3 incident. A. 77–80. In particular, Nulton sought to interview Jesse Whitwell and Doug Rittermeyer, two employees who had been interviewed by the Government investigator prior to the issuance of the OSHA citation. A. 76. Both Whitwell and Rittermeyer worked in the same area in which Thompson had been employed at the time of the February 3 incident; Whitwell was also the union steward responsible for that area.[6]

On April 21, Whitwell was called to the office of the employer's general superintendent for a meeting with company counsel. Nulton informed Whitwell that he was preparing for the forthcoming arbitration and wanted to find out what Whitwell knew of the incident involving Thompson that had occurred on February 3. ALJ 4. Whitwell was told that he was not the subject of the investigation and would not be disciplined for truthful answers, but that the company had a legal right to question him. Nulton also informed Whitwell that if he refused to answer questions posed by company counsel, he would be subject to discipline. Id. After consulting with Robert Reinhold, counsel for the union, Thompson decided to answer "under protest." Id.[7]

After Whitwell's interview was concluded, Nulton similarly attempted to question employee Rittermeyer. When Rittermeyer expressed reluctance to answer questions about the Thompson matter, he was told by Nulton that he would be suspended or discharged if he refused to do so. ALJ 5. As a result of this threat, Rittermeyer responded to Nulton's question. Id.

The questioning of Whitwell and Rittermeyer was purely factual in nature, concerning solely the events that occurred at the plant on February 3. A. 94–97, 104–05.[8] Neither employee was asked

[2] A complete statement of the facts of this case is contained in the decision of the Administrative Law Judge, appended to the Decision and Order of the Board, 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104 (Nov. 30, 1979).

[3] The incident involved a "spill" in the Tank Washing Room, which allegedly caused Thompson to slip and fall.

[4] "A." refers to the Appendix submitted in this case. There is some dispute concerning the acutal date that Nulton was called into the case. The Board apparently admits, however, that the company referred the Thompson matter to Nulton after the union requested arbitration. Brief for NLRB, p. 3

[5] "ALJ" refers to the decision of the Administrative Law Judge, appended to 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104.

[6] Under the terms of the collectve bargaining agreement, Whitwell was to serve as Thompson's representative in the first two steps of the grievance procedure. ALJ 14.

[7] In the course of the interview, Whitwell revealed that he had taken contemporaneous notes of the Thompson matter. Nulton "ordered" Whitwell to produce the notes (ALJ 4); Whitwell refused "because it was [his] union notebook." Id. The ALJ found that Whitwell reasonably could not have interpreted the "order" as anything other than a threat that he would be disciplined for failing to turn over the notes. Id. Whitwell did not produce the notes; no disciplinary action, however, was taken. A. 123.

[8] At the hearing before the Administrative Law Judge, the following exchange took place between Whitwell and Board Counsel Waers:

> Q [Waers.] What did he [Nulton] ask you questions about?
> A [Whitwell]. He just asked me questions pertaining to the Paul Thompson case, the happenings on February the third pertaining to the spill, Mr. Thompson's cleaning of the spill[,] of the conversations taking place between myself, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Malott, Mr. Wollery.

A. 26. Similarly, between Waers and Rittermeyer.

whether he would testify at the upcoming arbitration, or whether he had been requested to testify. A. 105–06. Nor were the employees questioned concerning statements that had been given to the OSHA investigator. A. 111.

After the interviews were concluded, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge, alleging that the company had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act [9] by threatening employees with disciplinary action "because of their engaging in concerted activity." ALJ. 1. A complaint was issued by the Regional Director of the Board, and a hearing was conducted before Administrative Law Judge Josephine Klein.

At the hearing, Nulton explained his insistence on questioning Whitwell and Rittermeyer. As described by Administrative law Judge Klein:

> Nulton testified that he had not been consulted until after Respondent had lost the unemployment compensation case and had been fined by OSHA. Although there had been hearings in the compensation case, the OSHA investigation had been confidential. It was known that OSHA had spoken to Whitwell and Rittermeyer, but Respondent's representatives had no inkling of what the employees had said. Nulton said he believed he could successfully handle the matters involved in the unemployment compensation case, but he felt he needed to know what Whitwell and Rittermeyer had told OSHA because OSHA rarely issued citations or imposed fines without sound reason.

ALJ 5. Nulton testified that he sought the information in an attempt to determine whether the case should be settled. A. 80. Nulton stated further that there "very definitely" had been occasions when he had convinced employer clients to settle cases after arbitration had been set but before a hearing had been conducted. A. 78.

The Administrative Law Judge found a violation of Section 8(a)(1) as charged. The ALJ concluded that "Respondent improperly coerced employees Rittermeyer and Whitwell when it threatened them with discipline if they refused to cooperate by providing information to Respondent in the course of its preparation for arbitration of employee Thompson's discharge." ALJ 14. In addition, as an alternative holding, the ALJ stated that, "[e]ven if it were to be held that employees generally may not refuse to be interviewed by their employers in preparation for arbitration of a grievance, such rule could not appropriately be applied to Whitwell, who was the shop steward in Thompson's department." Id. The ALJ thus found the interrogation of Whitwell to be an independent violation of the Act.

Upon the filing of exceptions the Board concluded that "[w]e agree with the Administrative Law Judge that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees Jesse Whitwell and Douglas Rittermeyer with suspension and or discharge if they refused to respond to questions posed by Respondent's counsel relating to a grievance proceeding which was scheduled for arbitration." Cook Paint and Varnish Co., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104 at 1–2 (Nov. 30, 1979) (footnote omitted). The Board opinion states what appears to be a blanket or per se rule that > an employer that seeks to compel its employees to submit to questioning in such circumstances violates Section 8(a)(1).

Id. at 3.[10] Since the Board found that all employees are protected from such questioning, the Board found it "unnecessary to pass on the question of whether a union steward is entitled to different treatment in the type of situation presented here

Q [Waers]. And what did he [Nulton] ask you questions about, just briefly?

A [Rittermeyer]. The spill and how I cleaned it up and if there were tanks on racks or whatever.

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title[.]

Section 157 (§ 7 of the Act) provides:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 158(a)(3) of this title.

29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976).

[10] Member Truesdale, concurring, described the Board decision as announcing "a blanket rule that an employer may not, under any circumstances, threaten to discipline, or discipline, an employee for refusing to participate in an interview concerning a work-related incident once the employer has disciplined the participants in the incident and the grievance machinery has been invoked." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104 at 6.

than are employees generally." Id. at 2 n.2. The Board thus did not adopt the alternative holding of the ALJ.

II. GENERAL RIGHTS TO INFORMATION UNDER THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

A. Introduction

The Board has established in this case what appears to be a per se rule that an employer is barred by Section 8(a)(1) of the Act from using a threat of discipline to obtain information from an employee concerning a matter that has been set for arbitration pursuant to a contractual grievance-arbitration procedure. The right of an employer to interview employees during the pendency of an arbitration hearing has never been addressed by the courts. Before turning to this novel question, however, it may be helpful to note briefly certain established tenets concerning general rights of parties to obtain information under the National Labor Relations Act.

B. The General Duty to Furnish Information In the Context of Collective Negotiations and Grievance Handling

The Supreme Court has rejected a rule that would automatically result in a finding of bad-faith bargaining under Sections 8(d) and 8(a)(5) of the Act whenever an employer rejects a request from a union for information related to collective negotiation.[11] Rather, the Court has held that "[e]ach case must turn upon its particular facts. The inquiry must always be whether or not under the circumstances of the particular case the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith has been met." NLRB v. Truitt Manufacturing Co., 351 U.S. 149, 153, 76 S.Ct. 753, 756, 100 L.Ed. 1027 (1956). Nevertheless, as a general proposition, it is well-accepted that, "if [an] employer is in possession of information which is necessary or relevant to the union in discharging its function as bargaining representative, the employer will normally be required to turn over that information upon request of the union." Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law 409 (1976).

A similar rule has developed in the context of grievance handling. In NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 87 S.Ct. 565, 17 L.Ed.2d 495 (1967), the Court enforced a decision of the Board that an employer violated the duty to bargain by refusing to furnish requested information that would allow a union to decide whether or not to process a grievance to arbitration. This decision was held to be consistent with "the national labor policy favoring arbitration." 385 U.S. at 439, 87 S.Ct. at 569. As explained by the Court:

> Arbitration can function properly only if the grievance procedures leading to it can sift out unmeritorious claims. For if all claims originally initiated as grievances had to be processed through to arbitration, the system would be woefully overburdened. Yet, that is precisely what the respondent's restictive view would require. It would force the union to take a grievance all the way through to arbitration without providing the opportunity to evaluate the merits of the claim.

Id. at 438, 87 S.Ct. at 569.

The duty of an employer to furnish information relevant to the processing of a grievance does not terminate when the grievance is taken to arbitration. In Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 325 F.2d 746 (6th Cir. 193), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 971, 84 S.Ct. 1135, 12 L.Ed.2d 85 (1964), the court considered a union request for information concerning five grievances that awaited hearings before a chosen arbitrator. The employer refused to disclose the information, and was found by the Board to have violated Section 8(a)(5). The Sixth Circuit enforced the order of the Board, stating that the union had a statutory right to obtain the information pursuant to the duty to bargain requirement of Section 8(d) of the Act.

In Fawcett Printing Corp., 201 N.L.R.B. (64 (1973), the Board similarly affirmed, without comment, the rulings, findings, and conclusions of an

[11] Section 8(d) provides in relevant part:

> For the purposes of this section, to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession[.]

29 U.S.C. § 158(d) (1976). Violation of this duty to bargain collectively is made an employer unfair labor practice by § 8(a)(5) of the Act, and a union unfair labor practice by § 8(b)(3).

Administrative Law Judge that an employer violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to comply with a demand for information in connection with a grievance scheduled for arbitration. The company had argued that the union's agreement to submit the grievance to arbitration deprived it of any right that it otherwise may have had to obtain the information. The ALJ rejected this argument, stating that "the statute has been interpreted to require the provision, after as well as before a grievance has been submitted to arbitration, of requested information necessary to its intelligent evaluation and processing." 201 N.L.R.B. at 972.

The Administrative Law Judge went on to explain the decision in Fawcett at length, in part as follows:

> Like requiring the production of such information during earlier stages of the grievance procedure, requiring its production on request made after arbitration has been sought, "[f]ar from intruding upon the preserve of the arbitrator," would "aid * * * the arbitral process" (Acme, supra, 385 U.S. at 438 [87 S.Ct. at 569]). Thus, here, as in Acme, the burden on the arbitral system would be lessened if information provided by Respondent either persuaded the [union] that its grievance lacked merit and should be dropped, or induced the [union] to offer a compromise which might prove acceptable to Respondent. Indeed, the entire class of cases which impose the duty to provide relevant information are based on the view that such information will contribute to the resolution of industrial differences by mutual agreement—a principal statutory purpose. Fulfillment of this purpose would be impeded by withdrawing from the parties at any stage the rights and duties calculated to promote the possibilities of settlement.

201 N.L.R.B. at 972. The ALJ further observed that disclosure was necessary because provisions governing the grievance-arbitration process may substantially limit the time available for investigation before a decision must be made whether to take a grievance to arbitration, and because skilled and sophisticated representatives of the parties may not become involved in the case until the later stages of the arbitration process. Id. Thus, "the period during which Respondent would exclude any duty to provide information might well be the very period during which its provision might contribute the most toward settlement of the grievance without arbitration." Id.[12] Finally, it is significant to note that the ALJ in Fawcett expressly rejected a contention of the employer that "the adversary nature of the arbitration proceedings" renders inappropriate the requirement that relevant information be supplied. Id.

Not surprisingly, the general duty to furnish information also has been held to impose certain obligations on unions—as well as employers—during the course of collective bargaining. In Local 13, Detroit Newspaper Printing and Graphic Communications Union v. NLRB, 598 F.2d 267 (D.C. Cir. 1979), this court enforced a decision of the Board that a union violated its duty to bargain by refusing to disclose certain information requested by the employer during the course of contract negotiation. The court noted that an employer has a duty to disclose relevant information to a union upon request, and stated that a union is "likewise obliged" to furnish the employer with relevant information. 598 F.2d at 271.[13]

The Board also has held that an employee must furnish information to an employer during an investigation of alleged employee misconduct. As the Board recognized in the present case, "the Board has previously found that an employer can, without violating Section 8(a)(1), seek to compel its employees to submit to questioning concerning employee misconduct when the employer's inquiry is still in the investigatory stage and no final disciplinary action has been taken." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104 at 2. Service Technology Corp., 196 N.L.R.B. 845 (1972); Primadonna Hotel, Inc., 165 N.L.R.B. 111

---

[12] The ALJ also noted that production of relevant information after the case has been submitted to arbitration would assist the parties in preparing the case for arbitration and thereby tend to shorten the arbitration hearing and to make the evidence received at the hearing more complete. 201 N.L.R.B. at 972.

[13] In Tool and Die Makers' Lodge No. 78, 244 N.L.R.B. 111 (1976), an Administrative Law Judge found that a union violated § 8(b)(3) by refusing to furnish information requested during a grievance proceeding. The Board assumed "arguendo," without deciding, that a union's duty to furnish information is parallel to that of an employer. The Board declined to adopt the findings and conclusions of the ALJ, however, on the ground that it had not been established that the information requested was relevant to the bargaining process.

(1967). As explained by an Administrative Law Judge in Service Technology:

> [A] proper balance must be struck between the Company's right to uncover improper conduct on the part of certain employees in its endeavors to maintain order in its business and the rights of those employees. I find in these circumstances that no right accrued to the employees under the Act, which protected their refusal to talk or to remain uncooperative, and that, therefore, these threats were not violative of the Act.

196 N.L.R.B. at 847.

C. Board Deference to Arbitral Judgments Regarding the Duty to Disclose Information In Grievance Handling

In Pacific Southwest Airlines, Inc., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 151 (June 14, 1979), the Board considered a case virtually identical to the present action. In Pacific Southwest, as in the present case, an employer's attorney attempted to interview two employees before a scheduled arbitration hearing, in order to prepare for the arbitration and to review the employer's position. The two employees refused to be interviewed, and consequently were suspended and thereafter discharged. The union filed grievances to protest these discharges, and pursued the grievances to arbitration. Following a hearing, the arbitrator found that the employer had acted within its rights in attempting to interview the employees, and that disciplinary action therefore was justified.[14]

Following the completion of the arbitration, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that the disciplinary action taken violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. A complaint was issued by the Regional Director, but the Board dismissed this complaint. Under the principles of Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955), both the Administrative Law Judge and the Board deferred to the decision of the arbitrator that the disciplinary action taken by the employer was lawful.[15] The Board explained its decision to defer as follows:

> The arbitrator found that [the employees] were the witnesses to the drinking incident whose interviews had been the basis of Respondent's action to the incident; that, as an almost routine practice, a party to arbitration interviews its witnesses in preparation for the hearing to permit, as here, its attorney to view the evidence first hand and to assess the evidence in light of a possible settlement; that Respondent sought to question on-duty employee witnesses about the conduct of other on-duty employees during the drinking incident; and that therefore Respondent had the right to expect good-faith cooperation. The arbitrator also found that Respondent did not seek disclosure of what [the employees] would testify to at the hearing or the details of the Union's position; that Respondent did not go beyond legitimate inquiry into job-related conduct; that the interviews were not coercive; and that therefore Respondent did not wrongfully intrude upon or interfere with the grievance procedure. For the above reasons and those set forth in detail by the Administrative Law Judge, we find that the arbitration award with respect to the suspensions of [the employees] is not repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act and fully meets the Spielberg standards for deferral.

242 N.L.R.B. No. 151 at 4–5 (footnote omitted; emphasis supplied).

Because of these reasons cited in Pacific Southwest, the Board held that a decision of an arbitrator that an employer had an enforceable right to interview employees the day before a scheduled arbitration hearing was not repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. In the present case, however, the Board rejected those same reasons and established a "blanket rule" that such employer conduct violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The company advances two principal arguments in support of its contention that the decision of the Board in the present case is improper. First, the company asserts that under the duty to bargain requirement of Section 8(d) of the Act, Whitwell and Rittermeyer had an obligation to furnish the company information relevant to the pending arbitration. Second, the company contends that there is no substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that the employer conduct at issue here violated Section 8(a)(1). Against the background of the established principles described above, we turn to consider these arguments.

[14] The arbitrator determined, however, that the discharges should be converted to suspensions. The two employees were awarded reinstatement without any retroactive compensation.

[15] Under Spielberg, the Board will defer to an arbitration award where the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties have agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitrator is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. 112 N.L.R.B. at 1082.

III. PRE-ARBITRATION INTERVIEWS AND SECTION 8(a)(1)

In considering the decision of the Board in this case, we emphasize at the outset that "[t]he function of striking [the] balance to effectuate national labor policy is often a difficult and delicate responsibility, which the Congress committed primarily to the National Labor Relations Board, subject to limited judicial review." NLRB v. Truck Drivers Local 449, 353 U.S. 87, 96, 77 S.Ct. 643, 648, 1 L.Ed.2d 676 (1957). As further provided by Section 10(e) of the Act:

> The findings of the Board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive.

29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976). Moreover, this court has stressed very recently that the Board possesses an unmatched expertise in distilling and identifying the coercive effects of employer conduct. United Steelworkers v. NLRB, ——— F.2d ——— at ——— No. 79–1943 (D.C.Cir. Feb. 25, 1981).

At the same time, the Supreme Court has made clear that "a reviewing court is not barred from setting aside a Board decision when it cannot conscientiously find that the evidence supporting that decision is substantial, when viewed in the light that the record in its entirety furnishes, including the body of evidence opposed to the Board's view." Universal Camera Corp v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).[16] This court has refused to enforce orders of the Board that have not been supported by substantial evidence. Midwest Regional Joint Board v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 434 (D.C.Cir. 1977); Local 433, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. NLRB, 509 F.2d 447 (D.C.Cir. 1974).[17]

The Board in the present case has established a per se rule that an employer may never use a threat of discipline to compel employees to respond to questions relating to a grievance proceeding that has 720 been scheduled for arbitration. Upon a careful examination of the record, we are unable to find substantial evidence to support this finding. As set forth more fully below, pre-arbitration interviews are a matter of routine practice in many sectors of industrial relations. In these sectors, investigatory interviews are conducted by advocates in preparation for a pending arbitration without any infringement of protected employee rights. Indeed, although the Board has been in existence for nearly a half century, and private arbitration for almost as long, we are unaware of any prior Board or judicial decision even suggesting that all pre-arbitration interviews are per se coercive of employee rights under the Act.

We believe that the rule announced by the Board in the present case unnecessarily and impermissibly interferes with the manner in which parties to a collective bargaining relationship structure the arbitration process. As a result, we hold that the legality of pre-arbitration interviews is generally a contractual matter to be determined by the parties in establishing a grievance-arbitration procedure, subject only to the normal restraints imposed by the Act that employer conduct not be unlawfully coercive in a particular case.

The prevalence of pre-arbitration interviews has been noted by one of the industry's most preeminent arbitrators. In the arbitration case preceding the Board decision in Pacific Southwest Airlines, supra, Professor Edgar A. Jones, Jr., a professor of labor law and evidence at UCLA Law School and President-elect of the National Academy of Arbitrators, observed in his opinion that:

[16] The Supreme Court also stated in Universal Camera:

> We conclude, therefore, that the Administrative Procedure Act and the Taft-Hartley Act direct that courts must now assume more responsibility for the reasonableness and fairness of Labor Board decisions than some courts have shown in the past. Reviewing courts must be influenced by a feeling that they are not to abdicate the conventional judicial function. Congress has imposed on them responsibility for assuring that the Board keeps within reasonable grounds. That responsibility is not less real because it is limited to enforcing the requirement that evidence appear substantial when viewed, on the record as a whole, by courts invested with the authority and enjoying the prestige of the Courts of Appeals. The Board's findings are entitled to respect; but they must nonetheless be set aside when the record before a Court of Appeals clearly precludes the Board's decision from being justified by a fair estimate of the worth of the testimony of witnesses or its informed judgment on matters within its special competence or both.

> It is almost routine for a union or an employer advocate—lawyer or not—to go to the locale of pending arbitration a day or two before a scheduled hearing in order to interview witnesses and plan the details of the morrow's presentation. It is not at all unusual for that pre-hearing occasion to be the first time that the advocate has had the chance to get first-hand accounts of witnesses, to identify possible discrepancies among their accounts, to press them as a cross-examiner is apt to, to observe their demeanor and evaluate their credibility, to assess the potential influence on the course of the hearing of what they have to say and how they are apt to say it in the context of the hearing.
> Contrary to the impression expressed by the Union representatives and the potential witnesses in this case, that kind of encounter immediately before a hearing is simply not in itself a "dirty pool" situation. Instead, it is an important part of the administration of the grievance procedure. It is by no means unusual for cases to be settled on the day—or even the hour—before the hearing is to convene based on the advocate's last-minute, eye-opened assessment of the significance of these pre-hearing contacts.

Pacific Southwest Airlines, Inc., 242 N.L.R.B. No. 151 (June 14, 1979), Appendix A to decision of Administrative Law Judge, at 14.[18] In Pacific Southwest, both the Administrative Law Judge and the Board made reference to these findings of Professor Jones in concluding that his decision that an employer has an enforceable right to conduct pre-arbitration interviews was not repugnant to the policies of the Act.

Given this practice in industrial relations, acknowledged by the Board in Pacific Southwest, we do not believe that the Board in the present case has established by substantial evidence that an employer demand for a pre-arbitration interview coerces employees in the exercise of protected legal rights. At that interview, an employer advocate may, perhaps for the first time, obtain factual information from witnesses, observe demeanor, and in general evaluate the merits of a pending dispute. On the basis of the record established by the Board, we are unable to perceive the manner in which such a limited investigation coerces protected employee rights. As a result, we hold that an employee does not have an automatic right to refuse to respond to questions concerning a matter that has been scheduled for arbitration.

This decision is consistent with the fundamental nature of the arbitration process. Arbitration is a matter of contract between the parties, noted for its flexibility and informality. United Steelworkers v. Warrior & Gulf Navigation Co., 363 U.S. 574, 80 S.Ct. 1347, 4 L.Ed.2d 1409 (1960). The Supreme Court has stated that "it is the informality of arbitral procedure that enables it to function as an efficient, inexpensive, and expeditious means for dispute resolution." Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., 415 U.S. 36, 58, 94 S.Ct. 1011, 1024, 39 L.Ed.2d 147 (1974). As noted in Abrams, The Integrity of the Arbitral Process, 76 Mich.L.Rev. 231, 235 (1977), "[a]rbitration procedure remains for the most part, a matter of the parties' choice."[19]

Into this flexible and informal process, the Board here has injected a fixed law of precedure that an employer may not, under any circumstances, conduct a compulsory investigatory interview in preparation for a pending arbitration. As noted above, this rule is contrary to the practice established by the parties under many collective bargaining relationships. We do not believe that the Board has presented sufficient evicence to justify this interference with the arbitral process.

[19] The Supreme Court stated in United Steelworkers v. American Mfg. Co., 363 U.S. 564, 80 S.Ct. 1343, 4 L.Ed.2d 1403 (1960):

> Section 203(d) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 61 Stat. 154, 29 U.S.C. § 173(d), states, "Final adjustment by a method agreed upon by the parties is hereby declared to be the desirable method for settlement of grievance disputes arising over the application or interpretation of an existing collective-bargaining agreement * * * ." That policy can be effectuated only if the means chosen by the parties for settlement of their differences under a collective bargaining agreement is given full play.

363 U.S. at 566, 80 S.Ct. at 1345.

Counsel for the Board has made a somewhat extraordinary, and gratuitous, suggestion that:

> The most favorable time for settling grievances is at the outset, before the parties' positions have hardened; and the most favorable situation for settlement is where the parties have come to share a complete and comprehensive view of the relevant circumstances. An employer may be spurred to a painstaking investigation at the outset if he knows that further investigation is restricted once a grievance is headed for arbitration.

Brief for NLRB, p. 13 (emphasis supplied). This suggestion is extraordinary because it fails to comprehend that it is not the function of the Board to structure the manner in which parties to a collective bargaining agreement process and resolve contract grievances. Just as the Board may not decree the time in which a party must respond to a filed grievance, the Board may not attempt to spur an employer to "a painstaking investigation at the outset" once a grievance is filed. The method in which disputes are resolved through a grievance-arbitration process is a contractual matter to be determined by the parties. The Board may not construct an inflexible rule that any compulsory interview conducted in preparation for a pending arbitration violates the Act.

In so holding, we do not suggest that limits do not exist on the permissible scope of a legitimate pre-arbitration interview. An employer may in certain cases be forbidden from inquiring into matters that are not job-related. An employer also may be prohibited from prying into union activities, or using the interview as an excuse to discover the union strategies for arbitration. In short, we do not here suggest that employers have a carte blanche license to interrogate employees prior to arbitration; the limits provided by Section 8(a)(1) remain available to prohibit coercive employer conduct in an individual case.

Similarly, the parties to a collective bargaining agreement may themselves decide, in establishing a grievance-arbitration procedure, that investigatory interviews will not be allowed prior to arbitration, or indeed at any time during the grievance resolution process. As emphasized above, the structure of a grievance-arbitration process is a matter of contract to be determined by the parties.[20]

Our decision here is consistent with decisions of the Supreme Court and the Board requiring the disclosure of information in order to further the efficacy of the arbitral process. As suggested by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra, for arbitration to be most effective, mechanisms must exist that sift out unmeritorious claims. In Fawcett Printing Corp., supra, the Board affirmed a conclusion of an Administrative Law Judge that the statutory goal of mutual agreement as the means of resolution of industrial differences "would be impeded by withdrawing from the parties at any stage the rights and duties calculated to promote the possibilities of settlement." 201 N.L.R.B. at 972. As developed at length above, these cases have imposed upon an employer the duty to disclose information concerning a grievance both before and after the grievance has been appealed to arbitration.

The policies incorporated in these decisions do not evaporate when it is the employer who seeks information before arbitration to assess the merits of his or her case. Access to relevant information has a comparable effect on the likelihood that an employer will settle a pending dispute. In the present case, the employer's advocate, who had not been brought into the dispute until arbitration had been set, sought to evaluate the employer's position because of the fact that the company had not prevailed in two closely related proceedings. Though arbitration had been set, settlement remained a distinct possibility.

We acknowledge that this policy favoring settlement may not be fostered at the expense of protected employee rights. An employer demand for information from employees can exert pressures on those employees that are not present when a union demands information from an employer. For this reason, we do not hold that an employer has an inflexible right under Section 8(d) of the Act to seek information from employees concerning a pending grievance.[21] Interrogation of employees remains subject in each case to the limitations of Section 8(a)(1) described above. We simply note that our decision here is consistent with the strong policy announced both by the Supreme Court and by the Board favoring the peaceful resolution of industrial dispute by mutual agreement.

[20] Violation of an agreement not to interview would of course be a violation of contract to be resolved through contractual dispute mechanisms.

In addition, our decision is consistent with those cases, acknowledged by the Board in this case, that establish that an investigatory interview conducted by an employer before disciplinary action is taken does not violate Section 8(a)(1). Service Technology Corp., 196 N.L.R.B. 845 (1972); Primadonna Hotel, Inc., 165 N.L.R.B. 111 (1967). While an employer's purpose in conducting an investigatory interview before disciplinary action is taken may not always be the same as that after a grievance is filed, we fail to see that the effect on employees is materially different. We find it anomalous for the Board to suggest that an interview conducted in the former situation is protected under the Act, while the same interview conducted in the latter situation automatically violates Section 8(a)(1). In either case, we believe that an investigatory interview is permissible as long as held within the bounds of Section 8(a)(1) described above.

Finally, we believe that the Board has totally failed to reconcile this case with its earlier decision in Pacific Southwest. It is true that in Pacific Southwest the Board "deferred" to the decision of an arbitrator that an employer has an enforceable right to conduct a per-arbitration interview. As recognized by the Board, however, such deferral is appropriate only if the arbitrator's decision is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080, 1082 (1955). Therefore, the decision in this case, establishing a per se rule, makes no sense whatsoever in the light of the Board's contrary judgment in Pacific Southwest. The Board has not reconciled the inconsistency between Pacific Southwest and the "blanket rule" announced here, as it must do. See Local 777, Democratic Union Organizing Committee v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862, 871–72 (D.C.Cir. 1978); Kohls v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 173 (D.C.Cir. 1980).[22]

For all of these reasons, we find that the inflexible rule established in this case is not supported by substantial evidence and may not be enforced.

IV. DISPOSITION OF THE PRESENT CASE

We have concluded that the blanket rule announced by the Board, that any compulsory pre-arbitration interview violates Section 8(a)(1), is not supported by substantial evidence and cannot stand. As part of a contractural arbitration procedure, an employer may conduct a legitimate investigatory interview in preparation for a pending arbitration. As outlined above, however, that interview may not pry into protected union activities. It is against these standards that the interviews conducted in the present case must be evaluated.

In resolving this case, we believe that it is necessary to distinguish the company's demand to interview Rittermeyer, a plant employee, from the demand to interview Whitwell, a plant union steward. While we refuse to enforce the finding of the Board that the interview of Rittermeyer violated Section 8(a)(1), we remand this case to the Board for further consideration or whether the interview of steward Whitwell violated the Act.

The record demonstrates that in the case of employee Rittermeyer, the company conducted a limited, investigatory interview concerning solely the employee's knowledge of the events that occurred on February 3 that led to the discharge of fellow employee Paul Thompson.[23] As developed above, employer counsel Nulton did not inquire as to whether Rittermeyer would testify at the upcoming arbitration, nor did he question Rittermeyer concerning the statement Rittermeyer had earlier given to OSHA. In short, Nulton conducted a legitimate inves-

[21] We also do not consider here the extent to which individual employees may be subject to the duty to bargain requirement of § 8(d).

[22] In Kohls, this court refused to enforce an order of the Board, in part because the Board had failed to explain an inconsistency similar to that present here. As stated in Kohls:

> In Bloom [603 F.2d 1015 (D.C.Cir.)] the Board deferred to an arbitral judgment that the employer had not breached the collective bargaining agreement when it discharged an employee for refusing to work because he believed a truck to be unsafe. The arbitrator's finding disposed of the alleged unfair labor practice charge, apparently to the Board's satisfaction. It is difficult to understand how the Board could come to the opposite conclusion here, finding both an unfair labor practice and breach of the contract, in a case involving facts identical in all material respects to those in Bloom. The Board has given no rational reason for its contradictory decision in this case.

tigatory interview concerning a job-related incident in order to determine whether the company should proceed with a pending arbitration.[24] In these circumstances, the attempt by the company to compel Rittermeyer to respond did not violate Section 8(a)(1).

The questioning of Whitwell, however, must be viewed in a separate light. Had Whitwell been solely a fellow employee, as Rittermeyer, our analysis would parallel that above. However, Whitwell also served as the union steward responsible for the Thompson dispute. In her decision, the Administrative Law Judge stated, as an alternative holding, that the questioning of Whitwell violated Section 8(a)(1) because Whitwell was the shop steward in Thompson's department and was "duty bound to serve Thompson's interest." ALJ 14–15. The ALJ found that to require Whitwell to submit to an interview would place him in a position of sharp conflict of interest. As a result of the "blanket rule" announced by the Board in this case, the Board did not adopt this alternative holding of the ALJ. As stated by the Board, "we find it unnecessary to pass on the question of whether a union steward is entitled to different treatment in the type of situation presented here than are employees generally." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104 at 2 n. 2.

As a result of our rejection of the Board's blanket rule concerning employees, we believe that the Board must be given an opportunity to consider whether Whitwell was entitled to special protection due to his status as a union steward. As described by the ALJ, there are fundamental differences between an interview of an employee and an interview of a union steward. Most significantly, a steward may be acting pursuant to his position as a representative of the employees, responsible for processing the grievance at issue. To require collective bargaining representatives to submit to compulsory interviews might seriously infringe on protected activity. Since the Board explicitly chose not to consider this question, however, we remand this case to the Board for further proceedings on this issue.

In remanding, we do not mean to suggest that a "blanket rule" concerning union stewards is any more appropriate than a "blanket rule" concerning employees. For example, a union steward who has no representational responsibilities in a particular case, or one who may be directly involved in alleged acts of misconduct, may not be entitled to any special protection. See ALJ 15 n. 22; see also Service Technology Corp., 196 N.L.R.B. 845 (1972). We simply note that very different considerations may be relevant in considering the legality of an interview of a union steward that are not present in the case of employees generally.

[24] One piece of evidence in the record deserves comment here. In its decision, the Board stated, almost as an aside and entirely out of context, that: "Indeed, the attorney who conducted the questioning on behalf of Respondent candidly stated at the hearing that one of the reasons for the interview was to discover 'what the union's position would be if it went to arbitration.' 246 N.L.R.B. No. 104 at 3 n. 3. As noted above, an investigatory interview may not seek to uncover the union's theory or strategy for the upcoming arbitration. We do not believe, however, that this observation by the Board requires a determination here that the interviews in this case violated § 8(a)(1).

We decide so for three reasons. First, it is critical to note that the Board in the present case did not make a finding that the attorney attempted to discover the union's position at arbitration; the Board merely noted, out of context, an off-hand remark by the attorney. The Administration Law Judge made no reference to this statement. Neither decision relied upon this evidence, and the Board has made no reference to it on this appeal.

Second, this statement of Nulton must be viewed in its full context. On direct examination by the company, Nulton described his involvement in, and preparation for, the Thompson arbitration. After discovering that OSHA had issued a citation based on the February 3 incident, Nulton became concerned over the merits of the company's position, and the extent to which the company was prepared for the pending arbitration. As fully stated by Nulton:

> So I asked what had been done. I ascertained that nothing had been done. I then made the suggestion that I thought somebody should interview these people to find out just what they might know as to the happenings of February the 3rd, so that 1) I would know what the union's position would be if it went to arbitration or, if the testimony was as bad as, at least, OSHA had seen it to be, that the case would be, perhaps, settled.

A. 80. It appears likely from Nulton's remarks that he sought nothing more than knowledge of what had occurred on February 3 in order to consider the propriety of settlement. In so doing, he would of course learn the strength of the case against him, or what may loosely be described as "the union's position." It simply cannot be assumed to discover the union's strategy for the case.

Third, and most importantly, the actual inquiry of the employees was solely job-related and in no way sought to discover the union's position. See note 8, supra. Nulton did not inquire whether the employees would be witnesses at the arbitration, or into the content of any statement made to any other party. Absolutely no questioning was conducted concerning the union's strategy for the hearing, or its proposed legal theory.

For these reasons, we conclude that there is no substantial evidence to support a finding that Nulton sought to use the interviews to discover the union's position, at the upcoming arbitration. We thus refuse to find a violation of § 8(a)(1) based on this limited out of context statement made by company counsel.

Enforcement of the order of the Board is denied. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.[25]

So Ordered.

Robb, Circuit Judge, dissenting in part: I concur in Judge Edwards' opinion except that I would not remand to the Board the matter of the Steward Whitwell.

On the remand the Board of course will be required to reach a conclusion based on the evidence in the record. In my judgment however there is nothing in the record to suggest that Whitwell was entitled to special protection because of his status as a union steward. As Judge Edwards points out the questioning of Whitwell "was purely factual in nature, concerning solely the events that occurred at the plant on February 3." (Op., at 714). In other words Whitwell was interviewed simply as a witness, not as a steward, and the questioning had nothing to do with his activities or functions as a steward. On these facts I think Whitwell's status as a steward did not insulate him from his duty to disclose what he knew about the incident of February 3.

J. Skelly Wright, Circuit Judge, dissenting: In discovery interviews conducted after a dispute had been submitted to binding arbitration, the Cook Paint & Varnish Company coerced two employees to answer questions and threatened one with discipline for refusing to produce a union notebook. The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB or Board) held this action to constitute an unfair labor practice under Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA).[1] This court today sets aside the decision of the Board. As an integral part of its reasoned opinion the Board articulated a rule of decision that would have clarified the rights of employees in similar cases—a rule that would have protected employees from coercive interview and discovery techniques after resort to arbitration had established an adversary relationship between labor and management. This court today strikes down that rule, holding that employer threats and other coercion may produce desirable results, such as promoting settlement of disputes slated for arbitral resolution. Unable to agree with either the majority's reasoning or its conclusions, I dissent.

In my view the majority's opinion is based on an improvident and unwarranted construction of the Board's announced rule of decision. Reading that rule more broadly than is required by the context of its assertion, the majority holds it to be inconsistent with the letter and policies of the NLRA; finding the Board's order against Cook to be based largely on that rule, the court denies the Board's petition for enforcement. I regard the majority opinion as a premature decision against the rule's validity that produces a wrong result on the instant facts and unnecessarily restricts the authority of the Board to protect important rights of employees under the NLRA. Reading the Board's decision much more narrowly, I would uphold its articulated rationale as applied to the facts of this case. The Board's announced rule of decision was supported by both a reasoned explanation and substantial evidence. Moreover, there are important benefits to be derived from the Board's articulation of a rule-like ratio decidendi, which provides much clearer guidance to interested parties than would an ad hoc balancing of factors peculiar to a particular controversy. In the absence of a clear rule defining their rights, employees may possess no rights effectively enforceable against employers bent on coerced extraction of privileged information. I cannot agree that the NLRA denies the Board the authority to develop enforceable standards. The Board should be given the opportunity to do so, including the opportunity to construe its own rule, and perhaps to limit it, if necessary, in future cases.

[25] Judge Wright has set forth at length some dissenting views in this case. We simply wish to note the fundamental difference between the position taken by the majority and that advanced by Judge Wright in this case. Essentially, we view pre-arbitration interviews as an integral part of the grievance-arbitration process; Judge Wright apparently does not. Given our assumption that per-arbitration interviews are part of the grievance-arbitration interviews are part of the grievance-arbitration process, it clearly follows that whether an opposing witness may be interviewed prior to arbitration is a matter to be decided by the parties, and not by Board rule. The Supreme Court has stated unequivocally that arbitration is a matter of contract, and that contractual matters are to be resolved without interference from the Board. In NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 87 S.Ct. 559, 17 L.Ed.2d 486 (1967), the Court stated:

> To have conferred upon the National Labor Relations Board generalized power to determine the rights of parties under all collective agreements would have been a step toward governmental regulation of the terms of those agreements. We view Congress' decision not to give the Board that broad power as a refusal to take this step.

As recognized by Professor Jones, "[i]t is almost rountine for a union or an employer advocate—lawyer or not—to go to the locale of a pending arbitration a day or two before a scheduled hearing in order to interview witnesses and plan the details of the morrow's presentation." Parties clearly have felt free to detemine that an opposing witness may be interviewed before a scheduled arbitration. In addition, we find that the lack of precedent in this area is further evidence that parties have viewed this issue as one to be determined by contract. The institution of labor arbitration is nearly as old as the NLRA itself, yet not one case has been cited in which this issue has been taken previously to the Board. The question of whether an opposing witness may be interviewed prior to arbitration has been viewed as a matter to be decided pursuant to collective bargaining, and not by a per se Board rule. We see no reason to change that practice.

Judge Wright relies heavily on a long line of cases that have prohibited employer interrogation of an employee during the pendency of a case scheduled for a hearing before the NLRB. See Statement of Judge Wright, infra, p. 730 n. 29. There is a critical difference, however, between cases set before the NLRB and cases set for arbitration. Proceedings before the NLRB are instituted to protect employees rights arising under the National Labor Relations Act. Proceedings before an arbitrator are instituted to resolved contractual disputes arising under a collective bargaining agreement. As stated above, it is for the parties to determine the manner in which contractual disputes are resolved.

We again emphasize that an employer may not overstep the bounds of an investigatory pre-arbitration interview and pry into protected activity. The Board retains the authority to declare that such conduct is unlawful. In light of the traditions of collective bargaining in this country, however, we do not believe that the Board has the authority to announce a per se rule prohibiting all investigatory pre-arbitration interviews. Since the Board has advanced no reasoning or analysis in this case other than that all pre-arbitration interviews are unlawful, the order of the Board may not be enforced.

A.

The issues presented by this case involve interrelationships among at least three provisions of the National Labor Relations Act: Section 7, Section 8(a)(1), and Section 8(d).

Section 7 of the NLRA[2] guarantees the right of employees "to engage in * * * concerted 727 activities for the purpose of * * * mutual aid or protection * * *." It is established that Section 7 protects an employee's participation in grievance and arbitration proceedings.[3] An employer may not seek to deter an employee from involvement in such proceedings, nor may an employer sanction an employee for giving adverse testimony. Both the courts and the NLRB have also held that employees' Section 7 rights to make common cause would sometimes encompass a right to decline to give testimony adverse to the interests of one or more of their fellows.[4]

Section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA [5] prohibits employers from engaging in "unfair labor practices." The section states explicitly that it shall be "an unfair labor practice" for an employer to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed" by Section 7.[6]

Section 8(d) of the NLRA [7] imposes a duty on "the representative of employees" as well as on employers to "confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment * * *." Despite the Section 7 right of employees to engage in concerted activity for mutual protection, the NLRB has inferred from this and other sections of the Act an employer's right to require employee cooperation in investigations of mishaps and misbehavior in the workplace. The employer has a legitimate interest in maintaining discipline, order, and safety in his place of business.[8] And, in a limited range of cases, the NLRB has upheld an employer's use of coercive interviews to secure information needed to protect this interest.[9]

[2] Section 7, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976), provides:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 158(a)(3) of this title.

[4] Conduct of coercive discovery interviews during the pendency of a case before the NLRB has repeatedly been held to violate employee rights under § 7. *See, e. g., International Union, United Automobile, etc. Wkrs of America v. B

In the instant case the NLRB was called upon to strike a balance between protection of employee rights to engage in concerted activity, secured under Section 7, and preservation of employer interests in attaining information about possible employee misconduct.[10] In the context of an arbitration proceeding, the fourth and most formal level of dispute resolution procedure provided by the collective bargaining agreement,[11] two employees asserted a Section 7 right to refuse participation in pre-arbitral interviews conducted by the employer. The employer proceeded to coerce their cooperation by threatening them with suspension or other retaliation. The union thereupon invoked the jurisdiction of the NLRB, charging the employer with commission of unfair labor practices under Section 8(a)(1). In defense the employer argued that its threats of punishment were not unfair within the meaning of the statute, because they were necessary to vindicate legitimate employer interests.

In a careful and detailed opinion an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) held that the coercive interviews conducted by the employer constituted "unfair labor practices" condemned by the National Labor Relations Act.[12] The ALJ reached her decision by articulating a general legal principle, itself reached through a balancing of statutory interests and policies, that applied to the largely undisputed facts. The ALJ's opinion recognized the employer's legitimate interest in obtaining information about employee misconduct and necessary discipline. It dealt carefully and thoroughly with prior cases in which coercive procedures to obtain such information had been upheld.[13] According to the ALJ, the prior cases decided on their merits by the Board and by the courts had all involved attempts by an employer, in the context of an investigatory effort, to obtain information helpful in determining whether discipline was appropriate.[14] Neither the Board nor the courts had stated rules for determining the propriety of coercive interviewing in the context of an arbitration proceeding. And, the ALJ observed, pre-arbitral interrogations are importantly different from the kinds of investigatory interviews considered in other cases. By the time a dispute reaches arbitration, the employer has already taken a decision to impose disciplinary sanctions; his investigation of the facts underlying the grievance has presumably come to an end; the context is irreducibly adversary. Based on these considerations the ALJ determined that arbitration represented an appropriate point for linedrawing in defining the Section 7 rights of employees under the Act:

> There obviously is a world of difference between an employer's trying to obtain factual information helpful in determining whether an employee should be disciplined, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, his attempting to obtain information to justify discpline already imposed. In the former case, the employer is legitimately concerned about maintaining order in the operation of his business; in the latter case, he is concerned only to vindicate action he has already taken. In the former case, an employee's statutory right to make common cause with his fellow employees may well have to yield to the more urgent need of orderly conduct of the business, a necessity to management and labor alike; in the latter case, however, there is no apparent reason why an employer's vindication of action he has already taken should be allowed to override the emloyees' concern for solidarity. * * *[15]

On administrative appeal the NLRB explicitly adopted the ALJ's conclusions regarding coercive interviews in the arbitration context.[16] Its short opinion also included an independent statement of justification for the principle that a line was appropriately drawn at this point: > prior to disciplinary action, we have struck the balance in favor of the interests of the employer. Our decision today does not alter that balance.

> In the instant case, however, [the employer] had already completed an investigatory process pursuant to which it was determined that discipline of an employee was justified. Disciplinary action was taken, the grievance machinery was activated, and the dispute was to be submitted to arbitration. At this juncture, when an employer seeks to question its employees, it moves into the arena of seeking to vindicate its disciplinary decision and of discovering the union's arbitration position, and moves away from the legitimate concern of maintaining an orderly business operation. In this context, for the reasons stated by the Administrative Law Judge, we find that the delicate balance must be struck in favor of the employees, and that an employer that seeks to compel its employees to submit to questioning in such circumstances violates Section 8(a)(1).[17]

Following the Board's decision the employer petitioned for review in this court. The Board filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order.

II

Because the Board justified its resolution of the present case by invoking a general rule of decision, the validity of that rule is squarely and indisputably before this court. We could not affirm the Board's decision except on the reasoning advanced by it to support its conclusions.[18]

Unlike the majority, however, I believe that the underlying facts are important both to understanding the decision of the Board and to appraising its legality. In articulating an interpretive rule for application of Section 8(a)(1) in the arbitration context, the Board was entitled to rely at least partly on its general expertise concerning the purposes and illegitimate coercive effects of compulsory interviews of employees after grievances have been set for arbitration.[19] But the facts of the present case also provide substantial evidence for the Board's conclusion that, after an employer has imposed disciplinary sanctions and a dispute has been submitted to arbitration, an employer who threatens his employees with suspension or dismissal for noncooperation in a discovery interview "moves into the arena of seeking to vindicate its disciplinary decision and of discovering the union's arbitration position, and moves away from the legitimate concern of maintaining an orderly business operation." [20]

Because of their importance to the case, certain operative facts deserve close scrutiny.

A.

The dispute involved in the present case grew out of a decision by the Cook Paint & Varnish Company to fire an employee named Paul Thompson.[21] The firing occurred on February 6, 1978, triggered by events that had occurred three days earlier. It is undisputed that Thompson had left work early on February 3, 1978, allegedly to see a doctor. The record reflects a dispute between company and union whether Thompson did or did not carry out his assignments on that date, and whether in performing his assignments he slipped and fell.[22]

[18] As the Supreme Court held in SEC v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 87, 63 S.Ct. 454, 459, 87 L.Ed. 626 (1943), "The ground upon which an administrative order must be judged are those upon which the record discloses that its action was based." Chenery recognized an apparent exception for cases in which the decision could be affirmed on purely legal grounds, not requiring judgments of fact or policy. Id. at 88, 63 S.Ct. at 459. Here, however, any decision whether Cook committed an "unfair labor practice" depends on a balancing of statutory interests entrusted by Congress to the Board, not to this court.

[21] The facts are set out in detail in ALJ Opinion, supra note 10, at 2-5, App. 174-177.

[22] Id. at 2, App. 174.

On February 6 Thompson was summoned to the office of the company's labor relations manager.[23] The meeting began with an announcement that Thompson was to be discharged that day for insubordination and insufficient production. It continued thereafter for approximately three hours, as company and union representatives discussed the events surrounding Thompson's departure from work on February 3. Among those present was union steward Jesse Whitwell, who participated freely in the discussion and answered company questions about the incident.[24] The company apparently made no effort at that time to secure information from Doug Rittermeyer, the employee who had cleaned up the spilled material left by Thompson upon his departure on February 3.

Immediately following Thompson's discharge the union filed a grievance on his behalf. Apparently satisfied with the fact-finding that had preceded Thompson's firing, the company made no effort to obtain evidence from other employees prior to the initial hearing provided by the collective bargaining agreement. It clearly could have done so under a string of NLRB decisions, the validity of which the Board affirmed in the present case.[25] Only when the initial procedure failed to resolve the dispute, and the union invoked arbitration, did the company's outside labor attorney, William Nulton, summon union steward Whitwell to a discovery interview.[26] It was at this point—more than two months after the company had completed its initial investigation of the incident, more than two months after it had fired Thompson, and after it had brought in an outside lawyer to represent its adversary position in binding arbitration—that Whitwell attempted to assert a Section 7 right not to be interviewed. Company spokesmen thereupon threatened him with suspension if he failed, not only to answer questions, but also to disclose the contents of his union notebook.[27] Rittermeyer was similarly threatened that he must answer questions or face suspension.[28]

B.

The majority holds that management coercion of employee testimony in a pre-arbitral context is not necessarily violative of employee rights protected by Section 7. So long as the company has a legitimate interest in the information it seeks, the majority would tolerate threats of suspension or other coercive techniques. Its implicit assumption seems to be that attempts to coerce employees in ways violative of legitimate Section 7 interests are rare or that the Section 7 interests of employees are relatively narrow or insignificant.

In holding as it does the majority not only overrides the considered judgment of the Board; it ignores a line of cases recognizing that the employees' Section 7 right to engage in concerted action for mutual aid and protection encompasses an interest in maintaining silence in the face of questioning by an adversary employer.[29] The leading cases prohibiting coerced discovery of employees testimony have involved unfair labor practice proceedings before the NLRB itself. See, e. g., International Union, United Automobile, etc. Wkrs of America v. NLRB, 392 F.2d 801 (D.C.Cir.1967), cert. denied, 392 U.S. 906, 88 S.Ct. 2058, 20 L.Ed. 2d 1364 (1968); Joy Silk Mills, Inc. v. NLRB, 185 F. 2d 732, 743–744 (D.C.Cir.1950). In this context the law is clear: Once a grievance is scheduled for hearing before the NLRB, the employer may not force an employee to give discovery testimony adverse to his own interests, those of a fellow employee, or those of his union, nor may an employee be subject to interrogation that he might construe as threatening or coercive of his possible testimony before the Board itself. The rationale for these cases following from the clear language and policy of the statute, which aims to protect the interest of workers in engaging in joint action for their mutual protection after lines are drawn and labor and management are locked into adverse roles. As this court held in the International Union case, supra, "employer interrogation of employees during a labor dispute" possesses an "inherently coercive nature * * * in violation of an employee's Section 7 rights * * *." 392 F.2d at 809 (emphasis added).[30]

[29] Both the courts, see e. g., International Union, United Automobile, etc. Wkrs of America v. NLRB, supra note 4, 392 F.2d at 809; Joy Silk Mills, Inc. v. NLRB, supra note 4, 185 F.2d at 734–744, and the NLRB, see e.g., Johnnie's Poultry Co., supra note 4, 146 NLRB at 775, have held explicitly that employer interrogation of an employee during the pendency of a case before the NLRB is inherently coercive of employee rights protected by § 7. A similar recognition that § 7 provides employees at least a prima facie right to resist discovery interviews in the arbitration context seems implicit in the NLRB's balancing of employer interests against employee rights in Service Technology Corp., supra note 4, 196 NLRB at 847, and Primadonna Hotel Inc., supra note 4, 165 NLRB 111.

Ignoring cases holding that Section 7 prohibits coercive interviews once a dispute has been scheduled for hearing before the NLRB, the majority finds its main support for the legitimacy of coercive interrogation in decisions arising from one very different context: cases upholding the legitimacy of coercive interviews during predisciplinary investigations of employees misconduct.[31] Yet, as the Board recognized, it is crucial that these cases involved questioning conducted prior to an employer's determination that discipline was required. Like those cases forbidding discovery in cases before the Board, these cases called for a balancing of employer against employee interest.[32] And, in predisciplne cases, the employer's interest in attaining information essential to the orderly conduct of his business—without resort to the NLRB or other authority to obtain a discovery order—has been held to predominate over the employee's statutory interest in providing mutual support and protection. However, as is demonstrated by the cases involving proceedings before the NLRB, the statutory balance will at some point tip the other way, as the parties become entrenched adversaries in a labor dispute. In this context the employer's interest in the orderly conduct of business gives way to an adversarial interest in prevailing in the forthcoming adjudication. Because the employer's adversarial interest may embrace such illegitimate aims as intimidation of a potential witness, discovery of litigating strategy or bargaining positions, and coercion of other protected information, this court has followed the NLRB in establishing stringent safeguards concerning the conduct of discovery interviews in unfair labor practice cases pending before the Board. In International Union, supra for example, this court embraced the prophylactic standards enunciated by the NLRB, under which "the employer must communicate to the employee the purpose of the questioning, assure him that no reprisal will take place, and obtain his participation on a voluntary basis; the questioning * * * must not be itself coercive in nature." [33] Employer questioning not in accordance with this standard has generally been held by the courts to constitute a violation of the unfair labor practices prohibition of Section 8(a)(1).[34] And no court has yet upheld the legality of coercive interviews in this advanced adversarial context.[35]

In the present litigation this court is called upon to review the NLRB's balancing of employer and employee interests in the context of compulsory arbitration proceedings—the most advanced form of dispute resolution provided by the collective bargaining agreement. Although the majority holds otherwise, I believe that the balancing question her is closely analogous to that presented in "unfair labor practice" cases before the Board—more analogous, surely than it is to the question involved in cases of employer investigations to determine whether to discipline an employee.

The Board held in this case that once a grievance has reached the state of arbitration, an employer seeking to compel testimony from its employees "moves into the arena of seeking to vindicate its disciplinary decision and of discovering the union's arbitration position, and moves away from the legitimate concern of maintaining an orderly business operation."[36] The facts illustrate the total reasonableness of this conclusion. The company here sought to interview a union steward. It atempted to coerce production of a union notebook.[37] And, even regarding his questioning of the employee who was not a union officer, the company lawyer in the present case stated plainly that one of his aims in seeking the interviews was to discover "what the union's position would be if it went to arbitration." [38] Based on these situational facts, I would regard this case as falling within the persuasive rationale of the cases prohibiting coerced discovery of employees testimony in cases pending before the NLRB.[39]

[30] The majority disparages the significance of these cases by distinguishing between protection of rights arising under law and rights arising under contract:

> There is a critical difference, however, between cases set before the NLRB and cases set for arbitration. Proceedings before the NLRB are instituted to protect employee rights arising under the National Labor Relations Act. Proceedings before an arbitrator are instituted to resolve contractual disputes arising under a collective bargaining agreement. * * *

Majority opinion (Maj. op.), 648 F.2d at 730 n.25. This attempted distinction would seem to suggest that the § 8(a)(1) prohibition of "unfair labor practices" has no application in the arbitration context. The case law, however, makes it abundantly clear that the NLRB bars certain coercive actions by employers as inherently unfair and unlawful, without reference to the terms of individual contracts. See, e.g., Keokuk Gas Service Co. v. NLRB, supra note 3, 580 F.2d at 333–334; Daphne San Francisco Funeral Service, supra note 3, 224 NLRB 461: El Dorado Club, 220 NLRB 886, 889 (1975).

[31] Although the majority points to a number of cases holding that employers and employees are obliged to exchange information prior to arbitration, it cites only two, Service Technology Corp., supra note 4, and Primadonna Hotel Inc., supra note 4, in which it has been approved by a court of law.

[32] This was explicitly recognized by the Board in both Service Technology Corp., supra note 4, and Primadonna Hotel Inc., supra note 4.

[33] International Union, United Automobile, etc. Wkrs of America v. NLRB, supra note 4, 392 F.2d at 809, quoting Johnnie's Poultry Co., supra note 4, 146 NLRB at 775.

[34] See, e.g., International Union, United Automobile, etc. Wkrs of America v. NLRB, 377 F.2d 452, 456 (6th Cir. 1967), all applying the Johnnie's Poultry standard quoted at text accompanying note 33 supra.

[35] Indeed, in circuits that have adopted a "totality of circumstances" test to identify unfair labor practices in this context, the relevant question has typically been framed as whether "coercion" occurred. See, e.g., A & R Transport, Inc v. NLRB, 601 F.2d 311, 317 (7th Cir. 1979); *Retired Persons Pharmacy v. C.

The majority concludes otherwise. In its view, the lawyer Nulton's declaration of purpose—to discover what the union's position would be if it went to arbitration—requires heavy discounting. The "most important[ ]" reason for finding no violation of Section 8(a)(1), it asserts, is that "there is no substantial evidence to support a finding that Nulton" did in fact "use the interviews to discover the union's position at the upcoming arbitration." [40] Assuming arguendo the absence of "substantial evidence" showing that Nulton did discover the union's bargaining position or litigating strategy in this particular case, I would still uphold the Board's conclusion that employer coercion of employee testimony in the pre-arbitral context—"once arbitration is invoked [and] the fact is in the fire and the parties are unquestionably 'adversaries' " [41]—is violative of employee interests protected by Section 7. First, unlike the majority I would take cognizance of the Board's special expertise in identifying the regular and predictable—if not necessarily invariant—effects of certain employer practices. Apparently unlike the majority, I take seriously what this court said recently in United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, ——— F.2d ———, at ——— (D.C.Cir. No. 79-1943, decided Feb. 25, 1981):

> Coercive effects are difficult to prove, yet at the same time the most important to dissipate. Certainly in this setting even more so than in other areas, the Board possesses an unmatched expertise * * * . We believe that the Board may rely on that expertise, and on the cumulative experience of past cases, to presume that certain employer conduct will inevitably produce certain effects on employees.

(Emphasis added.)

Against this realist view of the difficulty of demonstrating coercive effects in a particular case, the current majority would seemingly insist that every case should be decided on a balancing of its unique facts. In an ideal world, I would agree. In labor disputes in the real world, however, an employee whose rights must be culled from a complex body of uncertain facts and arcane decision law may have no rights that he can enforce effectively, the NLRA's Section 7 notwithstanding. Indeed, the facts of this case amply illustrate the impossibility of the employee's problem under such circumstances. Jesse Whitwell, the union steward whose testimony and notebook were sought by the employer, was summoned to the office of the company president and threatened with suspension if he did not cooperate.[42] The lawyer Nulton there advised him of the legality of the threatened sanction.[43] Although Whitwell was permitted to consult a union attorney, the lawyer had no opportunity to conduct legal research before giving his apparently tenative opinion that Whitwell could not be punished for refusing to submit to discovery. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that [39] Indeed, given the acceptance by the Board and by the courts of the so-called Spielberg doctrine, see note 53 and accompanying text infra, the danger and injustice of permitting employer coercion of employee testimony may be even greater in the context of an arbitration than in disputes before the Board itself. Under Spielberg the Board will sometimes defer to an arbitrator's decision, even though it might have decided an issue differently had it reached the merits. The benefits of the Board's special expertise in detecting the wrongful effects of coercive practices, see United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB supra note 19, ———F.2.d at ———, are thus more likely to be lost in an arbitration case than they are in a controversy before the Board for decision on the merits.

Whitwell dared not refuse to answer questions and presumably would not have dared to refuse, no matter how legally intolerable the scope of the employer's inquiry. As the situation was aptly summarized for him by the company lawyer, "You have the opinion of two attorneys here but it is your job that is on the line."[44]

Against a realist backdrop, a principal virtue of the Board's enunciated rule would lie in its simplicity and enforceability. This court should not strip the NLRB of power to propound enforceable standards.

III

As I read its opinion, the majority rests its decision on two principal bases. Both assume an unnecessarily broad and therefore unwarranted reading of the Board's decision. Because no such reading is necessary to support the decision under review, this case presents no necessary or proper occasion to invalidate a rule that could reasonably be construed in a manner obviating the majority's asserted objections.

As construed by the majority, the Board's order establishes a per se rule that an employer can never have a right to discover facts from an employee after a labor dispute has reached the stage of arbitration.[45] The majority finds this rule impermissible for two reasons. First, it argues that arbitration rights and procedures are appropriately governed by contract. It therefore holds that the Board acted impermissibly in establishing a standard that would limit the right of parties to bargain for alternative dispute settlement procedures.[46] Second, the majority argues that the Board's decision destroys the statute's intended parity of labor and management obligations to supply information.[47]

As I read the Board's opinion, however, it need not be construed as holding that an employer may never have a right to obtain evidence from its employees in pre-arbitral interviews; it definitively establishes only that unilateral coercion and intimidation are not legitimate mechanisms for enforcing such a right in the advanced adversarial posture of an arbitration proceeding.[48] Although it may be possible to understand the Board as having said more, it is unnecessary and therefore inappropriate for this court to do so at this time. I would assume only what is essential to the Board's decision of this case: that it forbids employers to obtain evidence by threats of dismissal or other unilaterally coercive and intimidating measures after a dispute has gone to arbitration. Similarly, although the majority is again eager to read the Board's opinion as broadly as possible and thus to resolve issues that might or might not arise in future cases, I see nothing in the Board's opinion upsetting any statutory parity of labor and management rights to information, or the parity of their rights to bargain for access to information either during arbitration or during any other grievance proceeding. Although the Board holds management coercion to be an unfair tactic in pre-arbitral interviews, it leaves open all other avenues by which an employer might obtain testimony from an employee after a dispute has gone to arbitration. For example, an employer might rely on the compulsory process of tribunals created either by contract between the parties or by statute—just as a union must do if it wishes to obtain information from an unwilling employer.

Certain portions of the majority opinion suggest that coercion is itself a proper and accepted mechanism of information procurement, which should be upheld on policy grounds as coducive, at least indirectly, to the settlement of labor grievances.[49]

At least in certain portions of its opinion the majority refuses to acknowledge any distinction between unilaterally coercive and non-coercive procurement of information. See especially Maj. op., 648 F.2d at 725 & n.25. Although the majority suggests otherwise, I believe that the difference between my analysis and that of the majority stems more from disagreement about the significance of coercion than from disagreement about the relevance of contract. I do not disagree with the majority view that "pre-arbitration interviews are part of the [contractually created] grievance-arbitration process." Id. I do not, however, see how "it clearly follows," id. that pre-arbitral threats and similar coercion—any more than firings and beatings—are insulated from condemnation under the NLRA as "matter[s] to be decided by the parties." Id. To respect a contractual ageement to supply information is one thing; to uphold the legitimacy of unilateral coercion to enforce rights claimed under an ageement is quite another—especially where, as here, the rights claimed may themselves be matters of dispute. Here, it may be worth recalling, the company threatened Whitwell with coercive reprisal if he failed to turn over his union notebook.

[49] See Maj. op. 648 F.2d at 720 (suggesting employer coercion needed to make rights "enforceable").

Such judgments of disputed fact and policy are more properly made by the NLRB than by this court, especially when statutory interests in information procurement threaten to conflict with employee interests protected 735 by Section 7. See, e.g., NLRB v. Truck Drivers Local 449, 353 U.S. 87, 96, 77 S.Ct. 643, 647, 1 L.Ed2d 676 (1957) ("The function of striking [the] balance to effectuate national labor policy is often a difficult and delicate responsibility, which Congress has committed primarily to the National Labor Relations Board, subject to limited judicial review.").

Moreover, from a legal perspective the chain of argument supporting the majority position is not strong. The majority cites cases supporting the proposition that provision of information is necessary if arbitration is to work effectively, relying especially on NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 87 S.Ct. 565, 17 L.Ed.2d 495 (1967), and Fawcett Printing Corp., 201 NLRB 964 (1973). But the majority fails to establish a persuasive link between Acme and Fawcett and those cases in which the Board has recognized the legitimacy of employer efforts to coerce testimony—cases generally involving inquiries into employee misconduct prior to imposition of final disciplinary action. The link is highly questionable. Although the language of Acme suggests the desirability of an information exchange, it nowhere suggests that the best time for this exchange to occur is during the arbitral process. Thus the underlying policy aims of Acme would seem satisfied as long as there is an opportunity for the parties to procure proper information at some stage of the dispute resolution process. And certain language in the Acme opinion seems to suggest that national labor policy is best served when information is provided and disputes resolved, not after the invocation of arbitration, but at the earliest point possible:

> [I]f all claims originally initiated as grievances had to be processed through to arbitration, the system would be woefully overburdened. Yet, that is precisely what [the employer's asserted right never to provide information except in an actual arbitration hearing] would require. It would force the union to take a grievance all the way through to arbitration without providing the opportunity to evaluate the merits of the claim. * * *[50]

The ALJ, whose conclusions the Board adopted, reasoned explicitly from this premise. Permitting coercive discovery at the arbitral stage, she stated, "would make a sham of the prearbitral grievance procedures carefully spelled out in most union contracts; if the parties know that they can lose nothing by postponing their investigations until the the grievance step, * * * [t]he result will inevitably be delays, the avoidance of which is a major purpose of grievance and arbitration provisions." [51] The majority takes issue with this position at least partly on factual grounds, suggesting that grievances will be better resolved if employers are able to conduct coercive interviews at any state of the dispute resolution process. For reasons that seem to me to be obvious, I cannot join this court in lecturing the NLRB about how the statutory policy of promoting settlements can best be effectuated.

The majority's second main argument against the Board's decision topples with the first. Far from destroying the parity between labor and management obligations to supply information, the Board's holding serves to place them in positions of practical as well as theoretical equality. Common sense suggests that an employee has no effective means of coercing an employer to comply with its discovery requests prior to an arbitration. It seems to be no accident that the company ignored union requests for information in the present case.[52] An employer, on the other hand, will, as a practical matter, frequently be able to use the threat of discipline or dismissal to extract information—including information to which it has no legal right—from an unwilling employee. In removing this unfair advantage held by the employer, the Board, in my judgment, acted entirely consistently with the statutory policy of mutuality of labor and management obligations to sup- 736 ply information. The majority's second argument is therefore also mistaken.

The majority also advances, but relies less heavily upon, a third argument that the Board failed to reconcile its decision in this case with the result in Pacific Southwest Airlines, Inc., 242 NLRB No. 151, 101 LLRM 1366 (1979). In that case the Board explicitly invoked the so-called Spielberg doctrine, see Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), under which the Board defers to the decision of an arbitrator without endorsing his analysis. The majority rightly argues that deference, as acknowledged by the Board, is appropriate only if the arbitrator's decision is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act.[53] It then argues that, if upholding the coercive interview in Spielberg was not inconsistent with the Act, then the Board cannot now propound a decision rule holding that coercive interviews are violations of Section 8. The majority's argument may be rejected on either of two grounds. First, the Board gave a reasoned explanation for its Pacific Southwest decision and who it lacked binding force in the present controversy. Consistent with its analysis of the underlying factual situation as presenting a conflict of legitimate employee interests with legitimate employer interests, the Board stated that "an award vindicating either of the conflicting rights cannot be viewed as being clearly repugnant to the policies of the Act." [54] Second, the arbitrator in Pacific Southwest found only that the employer had not violated Section 7 in a particular case. But the decision of a particular case should not bar the Board from developing a rule permitting the presumption that a certain kind of employer conduct will have predictable and impermissible effects in most cases, particularly when "[c]oercive effects are difficult to prove, yet * * * important to dissipate," and "the Board possesses an unmatched expertise"[55] in identifying the harmful conduct.

IV

Properly construed, the Board's decision in this case, in my view, is supported by substantial evidence and otherwise free of legal error. Like the NLRB, I would therefore think it unnecessary to reach the question whether Jesse Whitwell, because of his position as a union steward, enjoyed special statutory rights that were violated by the coercive interview conducted in this case. Because the majority rejects the Board's stated rationale for finding an unfair labor practice, however, questions about the relevance of Whitwell's union office and functions become central to a fair adjudication of the union's claim under Section 8(a)(1). Under the circumstances, I agree that the Board must be given an opportunity to consider whether Whitwell was entitled to special protection because of his status as a union steward. Forced by the majority to reach this issue, I concur that the case should be remanded to the Board for further findings regarding the legality of a coercive interview of a union steward in the factual setting prosented by this case. As to the main issue in the case, however, I respectfully dissent.

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WRIGHT, KENNEDY and ALARCON, Circuit Judges

1111

EUGENE A. WRIGHT, Circuit Judge: The Board seeks enforcement of its order directing the respondent to cease and desist from unfair labor practices and to reinstate two employees with back pay. 244 NLRB No. 136 (1979).

In 1978 Lavendera and Guzman led an effort to secure union representation for the respondent's employees. During that effort, several company supervisors communicated with employees about the consequences of involvement in union activity. Lavendera and Guzman were ultimately discharged.

1112

An administrative law judge and the Board concluded that the respondent interfered with union activity and discharged the two employees in violation of § 8(a)(1) & (3) of the National Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (3).

[54] Decision of the Board, supra note 10, at 5, App. 202.

[55] United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, supra note 19, ——— F.2d———; see Mourning v. Family Publications Service, Inc., 411 U.S. 356, 374, 93 S.Ct. 1652, 1663, 36 L.Ed. 2d 318 (1973) ("[A] requirement that a line be drawn which insures that not one blameless individual will be subject to the provisions of an act would unreasonably encumber effective administration and permit many clear violators to escape * * * entirely.").

In determining that the dismissals were discriminatory, the Board relied on secondary evidence of the respondent's policy toward absenteeism and layoffs introduced by the general counsel after the respondent refused to produce subpoenaed personnel records. No effort was made to seek enforcement of the subpoena in district court. Instead, the administrative law judge barred the respondent from rebutting the general counsel's evidence on these issues by cross-examining witnesses or presenting other evidence.

We review the sufficiency of the evidence and the propriety of the sanctions imposed by the administrative law judge.

I.

The Board found that the respondent interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees engaged in union activity, in violation of NLRA § 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by interrogating and threatening them, creating the impression of surveillance, and otherwise creating a coercive atmosphere.

These findings must be upheld if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 485–87, 71 S.Ct. 456, 463–464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Company supervisors Ruiz, Aparicio, Chai, and Hinderer asked numerous questions of employees about union activities and the identity of union leaders and supporters. These were coupled with express or implied threats of reprisal. Viewed separately or as a pattern, they could fairly be interpreted as tending to interfere with protected activity. See NLRB v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571, 584–85 (9th Cir. 1980) (NLRA § 8(a)(1) is violated by questions that can fairly be interpreted as threats); NLRB v. Hotel Conquistador, Inc., 398 F.2d 430, 434 (9th Cir. 1968) (statements that create the impression of surveillance are unlawful).

Aparicio, Hinderer, and Contreras made other statements about the probable firing of union supporters which could fairly be interpreted as threats of reprisal. Hinderer and Contreras directly or indirectly threatened that the company would close if the union prevailed. See NLRB v. Prineville Stud Co., 578 F. 2d 1292, 1295 (9th Cir. 1978) (threat to close a plant unless union activity ceases is unlawful).

The respondent contends that Contreras was not a supervisor and that her actions were not attributable to it. We need not resolve that question.[1] Even if the actions of Contreras may not be imputed to the respondent, there is abundant evidence of interference, restraint, and coercion. We grant enforcement of the Board's order that the respondent cease and desist from interfering with union activity and post an appropriate notice.

II.

The Board found that the respondent dismissed Lavendera and Guzman in retaliation for their union activities, in violation of NLRA § 8(a)(1) & (3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (3).

In connection with this question, the Board issued a subpoena duces tecum calling for production of personnel records for all employees which would show hiring, firing, and layoff practices and actual treatment of absenteeism.

The respondent complied with the portion of the subpoena calling for the records of Lavendera and Guzman, and other materials, but refused to comply with the portion calling for records of employees not within the bargaining unit. It contended that these were irrelevant. Its petition to revoke the subpoena was denied, but the general counsel did not seek enforcement of the subpoena in district court and the preclusion order followed.

A. Nature of evidence admitted and excluded

1. Discharge of Lavendera

Lavendera was a leader of the organizing effort. Prior thereto, the company had trained her and taken steps to ensure that she would continue to be available. Before a union meeting at her home on

---

[1] Contreras was a "lead person," and in another setting, "lead persons" who were deemed "low-level" supervisors were held not to speak for the company in the absence of other anti-union activity. Hecla Mining Co. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 309, 315 (9th Cir. 1977).

But an employer is properly held responsible for anyone acting as its agent when employees could reasonably believe that the agent was speaking for the employer. NLRB v. Pacific Southwest Airlines, 550 F.2d 1148, 1150 (9th Cir. 1977).

Contreras acted in the context of other antiunion activity by persons whose supervisory status is undisputed, unlike the "lead persons" in Hecla Mining Co. Under these circumstances, employees might reasonably have believed that she was speaking for the respondent.

April 6, she received assurances that she would have her anniversary raise and was told that her services were needed.

April 7, the day after the union meeting, was the turning point in Lavendera's relationship with the respondent. Her value to the company apparently evaporated. Her supervisor, Chai, asked another employee about her involvement with the union, implying that he would retaliate. The administrative law judge credited Lavendera's account of her discussion with Chai in which she said he told her, on the morning of April 7, that he would find an "excuse" to discharge her "after lunch." That afternoon, she was discharged. At least one supervisor said that Chai dismissed her for union activity.

Chai maintained that Lavendera was "laid off" because her services were no longer needed. The general counsel introduced evidence that no one else was let go that day and that layoffs at the company normally occurred en masse. The administrative law judge did not allow the respondent to rebut this evidence.

"A discharge for which the employer has a justifiable ground" nevertheless violates the statute "if it is in fact motivated by antiunion sentiment." L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341 (9th Cir. 1980). When motives are mixed, "the improper motive must be shown to have been the dominant one." Id. (quoting Western Exterminator Co. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1114, 1118 (9th Cir. 1977) (emphasis added in L'Eggs)).[2]

In L'Eggs, an employee was dismissed "very soon after L'Eggs received reports that [she] was interested in unions and would support a union * * * at L'Eggs." Id. at 1342. There was "little doubt" that she was "a poor employee, and could have been fired for that reason." Id. at 1343. But there was substantial evidence, in view of inquiries by supervisors about her union activities and the timing of her discharge, that the dominant reason was her union activity. Id. at 1343–44.

There is no suggestion that Lavendera was not a good employee. Her services were valued by the company until she held a union meeting in her home. Then she became expendable. Even if other layoffs occurred contemporaneously, this one might still fairly be interpreted as retaliation.

Nevertheless, it is possible that similar or contemporaneous layoffs of employees with comparable training and value to the company would have established, under the circumstances, that the business reason given for Lavendera's discharge was not pretextual and that antiunion motivation was not dominant. The secondary evidence, which shows that Lavendera was the only employee laid off on April 7 and that layoffs normally occurred en masse, eliminates this possibility. This evidence is therefore essential to the Board's finding that Lavendera's discharge was improperly motivated.

2. Discharge of Guzman

Guzman took two weeks' vacation and one week's leave of absence in July 1978. She knew that one day of her vacation, Independence Day, was a paid holiday and that company policy was to extend vacations one day under such circumstances. She believed that her total time off would be three weeks and one day.

The respondent had reduced her leave of absence by one day, however, and when she did not return to work after three weeks, she was "terminated." No one telephoned her first, and she had previously received only one oral and one written warning for tardiness.

The general counsel's evidence showed that other employees had missed one or more days without notifying the company and had not been discharged, and that company policy permitted two unexcused absences before dismissal. Again, the respondent was not permitted to rebut the evidence because it had refused to produce personnel records that presumably would have resolved the issue.

Refusal to give a day off when an employee was hired with the understanding that she could take occasional days off and had been allowed to do so before her union involvement was held to be an unfair labor practice in NLRB v. Sacramento Clinical Laboratory, Inc., 623 F.2d 110, 113 (9th Cir. 1980).

Nevertheless, the respondent might be able to rebut this evidence of improper motive by establishing that Guzman did not receive disparate treatment. See NLRB v. Best Products Co., Inc., 618 F.2d 70, 72, 74 (9th Cir. 1980). In Best Products, the employee was "frequently absent from work." Id. at 72. The court upheld the administrative law judge's finding that, although the company's action in suspending the employee for two months may have been harsh, it did not represent disparate treatment and was proper. Id. at 72, 74. Here, the secondary evidence established that Guzman received disparate treatment.

[2] Although other standards have appeared occasionally in Ninth Circuit cases, see L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341 (9th Cir. 1980) (citing cases), the NLRB has now adopted substantially the test used in L'Eggs. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB No. 150 (1980).

B. Effect of preclusion order

Because the secondary evidence is essential to the Board's findings that Lavendera and Guzman were improperly discharged and rebuttal evidence might have changed the result, we must determine the propriety of the preclusion order.

When the respondent refused to comply with the subpoena, the general counsel could have sought judicial enforcement. Section 161(2), 29 U.S.C., confers jurisdiction on the district courts to enforce NLRB subpoenas through contempt penalties.

The district court will enforce an agency subpoena "if the investigation is legitimate, the subpoena is not needlessly broad, and the records sought are relevant to the inquiry." K. Davis, Administrative Law § 3.08 at 67 (3d ed. 1972). See United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652, 70 S.Ct. 357, 368, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950); Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 208, 66 S.Ct. 494, 505, 90 L.Ed. 614 (1946).[3]

The Board contends that the subpoenaed records were "clearly relevant to major issues in the case." There is no apparent reason for confining the inquiry to members of the bargaining unit, and the respondent offers none. Under these circumstances, it seems likely that a district court would have enforced the subpoena.

The respondent maintains, however, that 29 U.S.C. § 161(2) grants exclusive enforcement power to the district courts and that the agency lacks statutory or constitutional authority to impose sanctions for noncompliance.

Although the issue apparently has not arisen in this circuit, similar sanctions were imposed in NLRB v. C. H. Sprague & Son Co., 428 F.2d 938 (1st Cir. 1970). The employer refused to comply with any part of a subpoena though it contended that only one part was irrelavent. Id. at 942.

The court held that the employer lost the right to rebut evidence on matters covered by the subpoena because it would be unfair to allow it to do so when it had documents that would be decisive (some were of undisputed relevance) but refused to produce them. Id. The Sprague court stated, however, that "if the company were taking the position that all the information sought by the subpoena was irrelevant, we might agree with its position." Id.[4]

The respondent takes the position that all information sought but not produced (or offered) is irrelevant. The Board replies that the respondent's assertion of irrelevance is frivolous. Were the issue to arise in a discovery proceeding, Rule of Civil Procedure 37(b)(2) would authorize the court to impose sanctions for bad faith refusal to comply with discovery orders. The sanctions could include dismissing a party's claim or precluding introduction of evidence on relevant issues as well as imposing penalties for contempt and awarding expenses to opposing parties. Id.

The Rules of Civil Procedure are applicable to NLRB proceedings "so far as practicable." 29 U.S.C. § 160(b).[5] But, as one commentator notes,

[3] The district court "may undertake only an extremely limited inquiry" in deciding whether to enforce the subpoenas. NLRB v. Frederick Cowan & Co., Inc., 522 F.2d 26, 28 (2d Cir. 1975). "[T]he agency need not even show probable cause to believe that the law has been violated," id. (citations omitted), only some reasonable basis for believing that the information will prove relevant. Id.

[4] See also NLRB v. American Art Industries, Inc., 415 F.2d 1223, 1229–30 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 990, 90 S.Ct. 1122, 25 L.Ed.2d 397 (1970); Bannon Mills, Inc., 146 NLRB No. 81 (1964).

The instant case does not involve the "best evidence" rule. The precluded evidence would not merely prove the contents of documents but prove facts independent of the documents.

Cf. UAW v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329, 1346–47 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (Board erred in failing to draw adverse inference from party's failure to produce subpoenaed documents, even though enforcement had not been sought in district court.)

The administrative law judge here indicated that he would draw adverse inferences from the respondent's failure to produce the personnel records, but concluded that "for the most part it was unnecessary" to do so.

We agree that "the adverse inference rule in no way depends on the existence of a subpoena," UAW v. NLRB, 459 F.2d at 1338, though we doubt, in view of our present holding, that "the willingness of a party to defy" an NLRB subpoena, prior to any district court proceeding, "strengthens the force of the preexisting inference." Id.

[5] This provision probably does not require the agency to follow district court discovery procedures, see P. S. C. Resources, Inc. v. NLRB, 576 F.2d 380, 386 (1st Cir. 1978), but once a subpoena is issued these discovery procedures may be generally analogous to the methods sought to be used here.

"although courts can only impose rule 37(b)(2) sanctions after a ruling on all objections, and then only for disobedience of a judicial order compelling discovery," an agency imposing such sanctions "asserts that for disobedience of its orders directing discovery, it can impose the sanctions first and let the judicial questions be asked later." Williams, Authority of Federal Agencies to Impose Discovery Sanctions: The FTC—A Case in Point, 65 Geo.L.J. 739, 756 (1977).[6]

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U.S. 447, 14 S.Ct. 1125, 38 L.Ed. 1047 (1894), the Supreme Court stated:

> The inquiry whether a witness before the [Interstate Commerce] Commission is bound to answer a particular question propounded to him, or to produce books, papers, etc., in his possession and called for by that body, is one that cannot be committed to a subordinate administrative or executive tribunal for final determination.

Id. at 485, 14 S.Ct. at 1136.

This language makes clear that challenges to agency subpoenas must be resolved by the judiciary before compliance can be compelled. The agency "could not, under our system of government, and consistently with due process of law, be invested with authority to compel obedience to its orders by a judgment of fine or imprisonment." Id. Nor, we believe, may the Board impose discovery sanctions, which may have more serious consequences than a fine, before the judicial questions have been asked and answered.[7]

"Congress has made elaborate provisions for obtaining and enforcing [NLRB] subpoenas," and "[i]t was obviously its intention that this machinery be utilized." NLRB v C. H. Sprague & Son Co., 428 F.2d at 942. We may not infer that Congress intended to authorize agencies to bypass district court enforcement proceedings. An efficient and fair enforcement mechanism has been provided and was meant to be used. We therefore conclude that Congress granted the district courts exclusive authority to compel compliance with NLRB subpoenas.

Because the secondary evidence is essential to the finding that Lavendera and Guzman were improperly discharged and the Board lacked authority to bar rebuttal of it, we remand this portion of the case for the taking of additional evidence and an opportunity to seek enforcement of the subpoenas in district court. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e).

Application for enforcement GRANTED in part, REMANDED in part.

KENNEDY, Circuit Judge, concurring specially: I concur in the result.

NLRB v. Haberman Construction Company

641 F.2d 351 (5th Cir.), April 3, 1981—236 NLRB 79

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before GODBOLD, Chief Judge, BROWN, COLEMAN, AINSWORTH, CHARLES CLARK, RONEY, GEE, TJOFLAT, HILL, FAY, RUBIN, VANCE, KRAVITCH, FRANK M. JOHNSON, JR., GARZA, HENDERSON, REAVLEY, POLITZ, HATCHETT, ANDERSON, RANDALL, TATE, SAM D. JOHNSON, THOMAS A. CLARK and WILLIAMS, Circuit Judges

354

RANDALL, Circuit Judge: In this case the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks to enforce its order in Haberman Construction Co., 236 N.L.R.B. 79 (1978). Adopting the findings of the administrative law judge, the Board found that Haberman Construction Co. (the Company) had by its actions adopted a prehire contract in effect between Local 1266 of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (the Union) and the Austin Chapter of the Associated General Contractors (the AGC). On this basis, the Board found that the Company had committed unfair labor practices by unilaterally refusing to make further union benefit payments as required by the Union-AGC contract, by announcing to its employees that it intended to go "open shop," and by constructively discharging certain employees who resigned in response to the Company's decision to cease union benefit payments and to go "open shop." Although the Board generally adopted the remedies proposed by the administrative law judge, it rejected his suggestion that, since the projects on which the employees had been working were in all likelihood completed by the time of his decision, the employees should be made whole only for losses incurred until the end of those projects. Rather, the Board ordered that those employees who would have continued in the Company's employment but for the unfair labor practices be reinstated to substantially equivalent positions on new projects and that they be made whole for all losses incurred by them as a result of the unfair labor practices (such losses not being limited to the projects under way at the time of the unfair labor practices).

[6] Williams suggests that the power to impose discovery sanctions (and to determine the propriety of a subpoena) is inherently judicial and emerges from the contempt power. Williams, Authority of Federal Agencies to Impose Discovery Sanctions: The FTC—A Case in Point, 65 Geo.L.J. 739, 744 (1977). "Because the contempt power is not and cannot be vested in administrative agencies, those agencies lack the authority to impose discovery sanctions." Id.

He concludes that Congress has not vested agencies with this power and could not do so without violating due process by denying the party a fair opportunity to object to the discovery order. Id.

[7] Although Brimson makes reference to "fine or imprisonment" to compel obedience, its essential import is that a federal agency lacks authority to make a "final determination" whether a witness is "bound" to produce subpoenaed documents. The use of different sanctions does not render the agency's assertion of authority to make such a determination any less a usurpation.

A panel of this court granted the Board's petition to enforce its order in NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., 618 F.2d 288 (5th Cir.), vacated and rehearing en banc granted (July 15, 1980). The panel enforced the Board's order in all respects. In so doing, the panel interpreted the Board's opinion as having adopted the rule that a prehire contract between a project-by-project employer in the construction industry and a union, entered into pursuant to section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), becomes and continues thereafter to be an ordinary section 9(a) collective bargaining agreement once the union has achieved majority status in the relevant bargaining unit. As a section 9(a) agreement, the panel reasoned, a presumption of continuing union majority applies, and the union is not required to establish its majority status at each succeeeding job site in order to enforce its contract with the employer. Accordingly, the panel concluded that the Board's remedy approximately extended to projects not yet begun at the time of the unfair labor practices.

We have reheard this case en banc primarily to consider whether the panel misinterpreted the remedial portion of the order and opinion of the Board in this case. For the reasons set forth below, we have decided that the panel did misinterpret the order and opinion of the Board. Further, reading the Board's order in the context of the explanation provided in its opinion and of its own prior precedents, we conclude that we cannot enforce that portion of the Board's remedial order which extends to projects not yet begun at the time of the unfair labor practices at issue.

The Facts

The dispute in this case derives from the disruption of the relationship between the Company, a construction firm operating in Austin, Texas, and the Union. This relationship had its origin in 1973 when the Company hired Jessie Beshears, a union member, to be its carpenter foreman, and began paying Beshears' benefits into the carpenters' welfare, pension and apprentice training fund in accordance with the contract then in effect between the Union and the AGC. Under Beshears' tutelage, this burgeoning relationship grew to significant propotions since Beshears, according to his own testimony hired "strictly union carpenters." Some of the Company's growing complement of union carpenters were hired by Beshears on the basis of his personal knowledge of their work; others were procured through his use of the union hiring hall.

Although the Company never formally executed a collective bargaining agreement with the Union, and despite the fact that respondent was not a member of the AGC, by May 1973 respondent was remunerating its carpenters at the pay scale provided by the Union-AGC contract. Furthermore, when this contract expired on August 31, 1974 and was replaced by a contract effective from September 1, 1974, through March 31, 1977, the Company instituted the new contract's higher wage scale. The Company also submitted payments for its carpenters' benefits to the Union and allowed the employees to maintain a job steward at the worksite.

This amicable relationship ended abruptly on February 14, 1977. On that date, the Company informed its carpenters that is would cease paying for their union benefits, and that it was going "open shop." In response, the carpenters sought the advice of their union business agent. Acting on his advice, at the end of business of February 16, 1977, five of the Company's carpenters relinquished their positions because of the Company's actions.

The Union's charges of unfair labor practices were tried before an administrative law judge. He found that in February, 1977, the Company operated two Austin projects and that the carpenters employed at these two projects constituted one bargaining unit because the employees were freely shifted by the Company between the two projects. He further found that on the date of the discharges, the Union represented at least seven of the eleven rank-and-file carpenters in this unit. Hence, it represented a majority of the employees.

The administrative law judge found that the Company was a project-by-project employer, having no regular complement of workers but rather hiring as the need arose. The Company's two Austin projects were almost completed at the time of the unfair labor practices and were considered by the administrative law judge to have been completed by the time of the administrative hearing.

The administrative law judge also found that the Company had adopted the Union-AGC contract. Since the Union enjoyed majority status at the time of the breach of this contract, the administrative law judge concluded that the Company's unilateral cessation of paying union benefits constituted a refusal to bargain in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act; that the Company's announcement that it was going "open shop" was coercion in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act; and that the Company's unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment constituted a constructive discharge of the five employees who quit their employ, and thus amounted to a discriminatory discharge in violation of section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

After adopting the administrative law judge's findings as to the violations, the Board ordered the Company to reinstitute the terms and conditions of the Union-AGC contract, to reinstate the five dischargd employees and to make them whole for the projects under way at the time of the violations and for new projects on which they would have been hired but for the violations, and to bargain with the union.

I. Existence of a Collective Bargaining Agreement

It is well settled that a union and employer's adoption of a labor contract[1] is not dependent on the reduction to writing of their intention to be bound. See, e. g., Certified Corp. v. Hawaii Teamsters Local 996, 597 F.2d 1269, 1272 (9th Cir. 1979); Warrior Constructors, Inc. v. Operating Engineers Local 926, 383 F.2d 700, 708 (5th Cir. 1967); Rabouin v. NLRB, 195 F.2d 906, 910 (2d Cir. 1952). Instead, what is required is conduct manifesting an intention to abide by the terms of an agreement. See, e.g., Warrior Constructors, Inc., supra, 383 F.2d at 708–09; NLRB v. George E. Light Boat Storage, Inc., 373 F.2d 762, 766 (5th Cir. 1967); Rabouin, supra, 195 F.2d at 909–10.

The conclusion that the Company manifested an intent to abide by the Union-AGC contract, by enjoying its benefits and abiding by its provisions, see id. 910, is well supported by the findings of the administrative law judge:

> [T]he evidence in the instant case of Respondent's adoption of the Union-AGC agreement must be regarded as substantial. Respondent's contributions to the Union's trust funds from May 1973 through February 1977, its use of union members exclusively as far as the record shows, it [sic] observations of the Union-AGC holidays, its use of the union for referrals, its payment of the union wage scale, its allowance through Beshears of the appointment of a union job steward, and the undisputed testimony of Beshears, whom I credit, to the effect that on some

[1] By use of the term "labor contract" here, we refer to both a collective bargaining agreement and a section 8(f) prehire contract. Section 8(f) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(f) (1976), provides:

> It shall not be an unfair labor practice under subsections (a) and (b) of this section for an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry to make an agreement covering employees engaged (or who, upon their employment, will be engaged) in the building and construction industry with a labor organization of which building and construction employees are members (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in subsection (a) of this section as an unfair labor practice) because (1) the majority status of such labor organization has not been established under the provisions of section 159 of this title prior to the making of such agreement, of (2) such agreement requires as a condition of employment, membership in such labor organization after the seventh day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of the agreement, whichever is later * * * Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall set aside the final proviso to subsection (a)(3) of this section: Provided further, That any agreement which would be invalid, but for clause (1) of this subsection, shall not be a bar to a petition filed pursuant to section 159(c) of 159(e) of this title.

but not all occasions when he wanted to start work at an earlier hour than called for in the union agreement he will check with business agent Rosentritt, all reflects [sic] an intention to adhere to the terms of the Union-AGC agreement.

Since these findings are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, see Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951), we conclude that the Company had adopted the Union-AGC contract.[2]

The Company asserted below that it was free to repudiate the Union-AGC contract because its adoption of that agreement did not create a collective bargaining agreement, but created instead a "prehire contract." It is true that section 8(f) of the Act creates a unique situation with respect to the formation of contracts between employers in the building and construction industry and unions. Section 9(a) of the Act, which otherwise would govern, provides that the exclusive representative of all the employees in a bargaining unit shall be the "representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees" in the unit. 29 U.S.C. § 159(a) (1976). Accordingly, the Supreme Court has held that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer under section 8(a)(1) and (2) and for a union under section 8(b)(1)(A) to enter into a collective bargaining agreement recognizing the union as the exclusive bargaining representative when only a minority of the employees have authorized the union to represent them. Garment Workers v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731, 737, 81 S.Ct. 1603, 1607, 6 L.Ed.2d 762 (1961). Section 8(f) of the Act specifically provides, however, that it shall not be an unfair labor practice for an employer to make an agreement with a labor organization covering employees engaged in the building and construction industry prior to the establishment of majority status for the labor organization. In NLRB v. Local 103, International Association of Bridge Workers (Higdon Construction Co.), 434 U.S. 335, 98 S.Ct. 651, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978), the Supreme Court determined the binding effect of prehire contracts entered into pursuant to section 8(f). The Court adopted the longstanding position of the Board that a section 8(f) prehire contract is voidable until such time as the union achieves majority support in the appropriate bargaining unit. Id. at 341, 98 S.Ct. at 655–656. The Court made clear, however, that "when the union successfully seeks majority support, the prehire agreement attains the status of a collective-bargaining agreement executed by the employer with a union representing a majority of the employees in the unit." Id. at 350, 98 S.Ct. at 660. Since a majority of the employees in the relevant unit in the Company's employment supported the Union on February 14, 1977, the Company's actions of that date were taken in the face of a valid collective bargaining agreement.

II. The Unfair Labor Practices

A. Cessation of Benefit Payments

It is well settled that an employer violates section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5) (1976),[3] by unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment without first granting its employees' exclusive bargaining representative the opportunity to bargain about "mandatory" subjects. See, e. g., NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 747–48, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1114, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). It is equally well established that contributions to a health, welfare and pension fund constitute mandatory subjects of collective bargaining. See, e. g., NLRB v. SAC Construction Co., 603 F.2d 1155, 1156 (5th Cir. 1979); Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. v. NLRB, 567 F.2d 1343, 1349 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 985, 99 S.Ct. 576, 58 L.Ed.2d 656 (1978); United Brick & Clay Workers v. District 50, UMW, 439 F.2d 311, 314 (8th Cir. 1971); Hinson v. NLRB, 428 F.2d 133, 137 (8th Cir. 1970).

Given the existence of these two principles, we have no difficulty in affirming the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice here, for the Company does not dispute that it ceased payments of the benefits without bargaining with the Union. Since that action accomplished a unilateral alteration in terms and conditions of employment which are mandatory subjects of bargaining, the Company violated section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[2] We need not here decide whether the Company's payment of the wage scale and benefits provided by the Union-AGC contract would in itself indicate respondent's intention to be bound by that agreement. Cf. Roadway Express, Inc. v. Teamsters Local 249, 330 F.2d 859, 865 (3d Cir. 1964) (acceptance of wages by employees does not bind labor union on issue of existence of labor contract). Rather, we focus on the fact that respondent both enjoyed the benefits of the contract and abided by its provisions. See Rabouin, supra, 195 F.2d at 910.

[3] It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title.

B. "Open Shop" Announcement

The Board found that the Company's communication of its intention to go "open shop" coerced its employees in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1),[4] because "such announcement by Respondent conveyed to employees an intent of Respondent to refuse to abide by the terms of an applicable contract and to discontinue dealing with a union with which it was obligated to deal." In contrast, the Company contends that its statement was simply an announcement of its intention to abide by the Texas "right to work law" which prohibits closed shops. See Tex.Stat. Ann. art. 5207a (Vernon 1971).

In essence the Company asks us to reject the Board's inference that its statement conveyed an intention to repudiate its bargaining obligations. Even were we to disagree with the Board's assessment of the character of the Company's statement, we cannot reverse its finding, for it is not the province of this court to substitute its judgment for that of the Board when the Board has drawn a plausible inference from competent evidence. See, e. g., NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 260, 88 S.Ct. 988, 991, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968). Indeed, we find the Board's inference to be quite plausible. Given the fact that the Company's announcement was made simultaneously with its repudiation of its obligation to pay the carpenters' benefits, its statement is quite easily interpreted as a message to its employees that it would not recognize and bargain with the Union. The Board's inference of coercion is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole.[5]

C. Constructive Discharge

There are two elements to a contructive discharge violative of section 8(a)(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976).[6] First, the employer's conduct must have created working conditions so intolerable that an employee is forced to resign. Second, the employer must have acted "to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization" within the meaning of section 8(a)(3) of the Act. See, e. g., Cartwright Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 268, 270 (10th Cir. 1979); J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 461 F.2d 490, 494 (4th Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Holly Bra of California, Inc., 405 F.2d 870, 872 (9th Cir. 1969); Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB, 377 F.2d 452, 459 (6th Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., Frosty Morn Division, 339 F.2d 203, 204–05 (6th Cir. 1964). We must therefore determine whether the Company's conduct created intolerable conditions and was accomplished to discourage union membership.

1. Intolerable Conditions

Five of the Company's employees resigned in response to the Company's decision to go "open shop" and to unilaterally cease payment of all union benefits. Although the payment of union benefits was a mandatory subject of bargaining, see Part II(A) of this opinion, we need not decide whether that fact alone would render the cessation of such payments an "intolerable condition" sufficient for a finding of a constructive discharge. As dicussed above, the administrative law judge also found that the Company's announcement that it intended to go "open shop" conveyed to its employees an intent to refuse to abide by the terms of a binding labor contract and to refuse to deal with the union with which it was obligated to deal, and thereby forced the Company's employees to choose between quitting its employ or continuing in the face of the Company's unlawful repudiation of its bargaining obligations under the Act. The Board has repeatedly held that employees who decide to quit in circumstances similar to those in this case have been constructively discharged. See, e. g., Superior Sprinkler, Inc., 227 N.L.R.B. 204 (1976) (refusal to negotiate new collective bargaining agreement, and unilateral cessation of contributions to the union's vacation fund and health and welfare fund); Marquis Elevator Co., 217 N.L.R.B. 461 (1975) (withdrawal of recognition from union with statement that employer would operate as nonunion shop, with institution of new wage guidelines and discontinuance of payments to various union trust funds); Lifetime Shingle Co., 203 N.L.R.B. 688 (1973) (conditioning of continued employment upon employees giving up union membership); Barwise Sheet Metal Co., 199 N.L.R.B. 372 (1972) (conditioning of continued employment upon employees' giving up union membership); Johnson Electric Co., 196 N.L.R.B. 637 (1972) (unilateral change in wages and benefits provided for in new contract, with requirement that employees work with nonunion workers under circumstances which would require employees to lose union membership); Blue Cab Co., 156 N.L.R.B. 489 (1965), enforced sub nom. Teamsters Local 782 v. NLRB 373 F.2d 661 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 837, 88 S.Ct. 54 19 L.Ed.2d 100 (1967) (unilateral change in method of operation from use of commission drivers to nonunion lease arrangement, thereby forcing employees to choose between new conditions and union representation).

[4] The text of section 8(a)(1) of the Act is reprinted at note 3, supra.

[5] The Company contends that its "open shop" announcement is speech protected by section 8(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(c) (1976), which provides that "[t]he expressing of any views, argument, or opinion * * * shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this subchapter, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefits." This argument is merely a reformulation of the Company's attack on the Board's finding of coercion because section 8(c) does not protect speech which is in itself coercive. See generally R. Goerman, Basic Text on Labor Law Unionization and Collective Bargaining 148–51 (1976). Since we have accepted the Board's determination that the Company's announcement conveyed its intention to withdraw its recognition of the Union—its determination to commit an unfair labor practice—the statement is coercive and not protected by section 8(c).

[6] Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), in pertinent part, provides that "[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *."

2. Conduct to Discourage Union Membership

The font of our analysis of the Company's motivation for its conduct is of course the paradigm for section 8(a)(3) established by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed2d 1027 (1967):

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.

Id. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1798.

Our research has revealed that at least two categories of conduct are "inherently destructive of important employee rights." One type of such conduct is that which jeopardizes the position of the union as bargaining agent or diminishes the union's capacity effectively to represent the employees in the bargaining unit. Inter-Collegiate Press, Graphic Arts Division v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 837, 845 (8th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 938, 94 S.Ct. 1939, 40 L.Ed.2d 288 (1974); see Portland Willamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331, 1334 (9th Cir. 1976). This action "creates visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights." Inter-Collegiate Press, supra, 486 F.2d at 845 (footnote omitted); Loomis Courier Service Inc., v. NLRB, 595 F.2d 491, 495 (9th Cir. 1979). Examples of such conduct include the grant of super-seniority to returning strikers, see NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963), the institution of fixed work shifts to non-striking workers, action that insured that the strikers, upon return, would be permanently relegated to less desirable shifts, see NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 840–41 (5th Cir. 1978), and the cessation of payments of insurance premiums for strikers conduct which assured that the employees would be unable to obtain renewed insurance coverage for ninety days past the date of their reemployment. See id. at 841–42.

The second type of conduct inherently destructive of important employee rights is that which directly and unambiguously penalizes or deters protected activity. Kaiser Engineers v. NLRB, 538 F.2 1379, 1386 (9th Cir. 1976); Portland Willamette Co supra, 534 F.2d at 1334; see NLRB v.

Lantz, 607 F.2d 290, 299 (9th Cir. 1979); Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227, 232 (7th Cir. 1979). Examples of such action include discharges occurring because of the employees' expressed desire to obtain union assistance in attaining compliance with the collective bargaining agreement, see Lantz, supra, 607 F.2d at 299, and a discharge resulting from an employee's lobbying of legislators regarding changes in national policy affecting the employee's job security. See Kaiser Engineers, supra, 538 F.2d at 1384–86.

We have no difficulty placing the Company's action within both of these categories [7] as we have discussed in Part II(A) and (B) of this opinion, the Company's conduct amounted to a repudiation of the bargaining obligation. It would be a complete contradiction to state that such action did not jeopardize the Union's position as bargaining agent or diminish its ability effectively to represent the carpenters. Furthermore, no conduct could more efficaciously convey to the employees the futility of engaging in concerted activity, and thereby directly and unambiguously deter the exercise of that right, the guarantee most fundamentally protected by the Act. From the carpenters' standpoint, it would be futile to engage in collective bargaining through a representive if the Company would repudiate any resulting agreement at will. Accordingly, the Company's conduct was inherently destructive of important employee rights, and no proof of antiunion motivation is required.[8]

III. The Remedy

A. Our Interpretation of the Board's Opinion in this Case

The administrative law judge recommended the following remedies in his proposed order; that the Company cease and desist from its violations of the Act; that the Company bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union; that the Company 361 restore all terms which it had unilaterally changed in its agreement with the Union; that the Company pay the union benefits it had unlawfully refused to pay; and that the Company make whole the five employees it had forced to resign for any loss of wages or benefits caused by the Company's wrongful conduct. Because the jobs on which these employees had been working appeared to be completed, and because the Company was a project-by-project employer in the construction industry, the administrative law judge expressly declined to order reinstatement:

> From the record it appears that the jobs from which the employees were constructively discharged were almost completed at the time of the discharge and most likely by now, have been long since completed. Since it appears that the job complement of carpenters was not always the same from job to job reinstatement in the sense of restoring a carpenter to a particular job from which he has been discharged is neither practical or required.

[7] In two prior cases involving an employer's unilateral diminution of wages and benefits, the courts have required proof of antiunion motivation to establish constructive discharges violative of section 8(a)(3). See J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 461 F.2d 490, 494 (4th Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Brennan's Inc., 366 F.2d 560, 563–65, modified, 368 F.2d 1004 (5th Cir. 1966). However, both cases are distinguishable from the instant action because in neither case was there a collective bargaining agreement in existence at the time of the employer's unilateral acts. Thus, the employer's conduct was not taken in abrogation of an existing collective bargaining agreement. As a result, the conduct did not have quite the devastating effect on employees' rights as that which we here condemn; rather, the conduct in those two cases had only a "comparatively slight" adverse effect on employee rights.

In Cartwright Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 600 F.2d 268 (10th Cir. 1979), proof of antiunion motivation was also required. The employer was found to have violated section 8(a)(5) of the Act because, without first bargaining with the union, he instituted a new wage and benefits schedule at the expiration of a collective bargaining agreement. At the same time, the employer announced that he would not abide by the contract's union security provision past the date of contract expiration. Subsequent to these actions, the union employees quit. The court required proof of antiunion motive because it found that the employees resigned not because of the unilateral wage and benefits changes, but due to the employees' belief that "they could not work in an open shop without sacrificing their union memberships." Id. at 271. Since "a union shop provision does not survive contract termination," id. at 272, the employer's action did not deny the employees a right guaranteed by the Act. Proof of antiunion motivation was therefore properly required since the conduct was not inherently destructive of employee rights. In contrast, in this case, the Company's conduct violated the carpenters' rights under section 8(d) and thus was inherently destructive of the employees' rights.

[8] The Company argues that no unfair labor practices should be premised on the resignation of the carpenters since the Union-AGC contract contained a grievance procedure. The short answer to this contention is that the existence of a contractual remedy does not deprive the Board of jurisdiction to condemn conduct which constitutes an unfair labor practice. See Great Dane Trailers, supra, 388 U.S. at 30 n.7, 87 S.Ct. at 1796 n.7.

The Company also argues that the carpenters should have remained on the job in order to "mitigate" the Company's liability. This argument is completely frivolous since it is totally at war with the constructive discharge doctrine. An employer may not impose intolerable conditions in his workplace and expect his employees to remain and acquiesce.

236 N.L.R.B at 87.

The Board adopted the proposed remedies of the administrative law judge but rejected his suggestion that remedies be limited to projects in progress at the time of the unfair labor practices. Instead, the Board ordered that those discriminatees who would have been rehired absent the Company's unfair labor practices be reinstated "to their former positions of employment or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment." Id. at 80. The Board's rationale for this order was set out in four sentences in its opinion:

> We are aware that, even absent the unfair labor practices, Respondent, which hired employees on a project-by-project basis, might have discharged the discriminatees in the normal course of business when the projects were completed. However, there is a distinct possibility that, absent its discrimination, Respondent would have retained transferred, or rehired at least some of the discriminatees for new projects. Accordingly, to remedy fully Respondent's unfair labor practices and protect the discriminatees' rights, we shall order Respondent to reinstate the discriminatees to their former or substantially equivalent positions and to make them whole for any losses they suffered as a result of the discrimination against them * * *. The determination of which employees, if any, would have continued in Respondent's employment and for how long can best be made at the compliance stage of the proceedings, to which we defer the matter.

Id. at 79 (footnotes omitted). This explanation was rendered without so much as a single citation to the Board's previous decisions or to those of the courts. Moreover, this extremely brief and unenlightening opinion was issued despite the order's possible conflict with a principle previously articulated by the Board—that a union must reestablish its majority status at each new jobsite before it can enforce a section 8(f) prehire agreement with a project-by-project employer. This principle which is discussed in more detail infra, was clearly expressed by the Board in an opinion issued less than eight months before its decision in this case. See Dee Cee Floor Covering, 232 N.L.R.B. 421 (1977).

Although the remedial power of the Board is "a broad and discretionary one, subject to [a] limited judicial review," [9] the Board may not order remedies which are in fact punitive. The purpose of a remedial order under the Act is to restore conditions that existed in the absence of unfair labor practices; a remedy which grants rights to which a party would not have been entitled in the absence of the violations is punitive as to the other party and is therefore unenforceable.[10] In light of these principles, the holding of Dee Cee Floor Covering appears to preclude remedial relief which extends beyond the projects in progress at the time of the Company's unfair labor practices. If the Company was, as Dee Cee Floor Covering indicates, bound by the Union-AGC prehire contract only to the extent of the particular projects at which a union majority had been established, then it could lawfully have ended its relationship with the Union at the conclusion of those jobs. A remedy reaching future projects (on which a union majority was not yet established) would in effect hold the Company to a labor contract which has not become enforceable as to those projects.

[10] Section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976), requires the Board upon finding that an unfair labor practice has been committed "to take such affimative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of [the Act]." The Board's duty under § 10(c) is to make "the employees whole and thus restor[e] the economic status quo that would have obtained but for the company's wrongful [acts]." NLRB v. Rutter-Rex, supra 396 U.S. at 263, 90 S.Ct. at 420 See also Franks v. Bowman Transportation Co., 424 U.S. 747, 769, 96 S.Ct. 1251, 1266, 47 L.Ed.2d 444 (1976); NLRB v. Hyde, 339 F.2d 568, 572 (9th Cir. 1964). While the Board's mandate is to "take measures designed to recreate the conditions and relationships that would have been had there been no unfair labor practice," Carpenters v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 651, 675, 81 S.Ct. 875, 878–879, 6 L.E2d 1 (1961) (Harlan, J., concurring), the Board's remedial orders must be appropriate and adapted to the situation which calls for redress, NLRB v. United Mine Workers, 355 U.S. 453, 458, 78 S.Ct. 386, 389–390, 2 L.Ed.2d 401 (1958), and they are unenforceable to the extent that they become punitive rather than remedial. see Carpenters v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 651, 654–55, 81 S.Ct. at 877–878 (1961); Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 7, 11–12, 61 S.Ct. 77, 79, 85 L.Ed. 6 (1940); Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB, 305 U.S. 197, 236, 59 S.Ct. 206, 220, 83 L.Ed. 126 (1938); NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, Inc., 576 F.2d 666, 673 (5th Cir. 1978). Thus, the courts have refused to enforce remedies which seek to ameliorate conditions which would have existed in any event and are, therefore, not dependent upon the existence of an unfair labor practice. See, e.g., NLRB v. Solboro Knitting Mills, Inc., 572 F.2d 936, 945–46 (2nd Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 864, 99 S.Ct. 188, 58 L.Ed.2d 174 (1978); Trico Products Corp. v. NLRB, 323 F.2d 686, 690 (5th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 911, 84 S.Ct. 666, 11 L.Ed.2d 609 (1964).

Such a remedy would be punitive rather than remedial and we therefore could not enforce it.

The panel opinion interpreted the Board's opinion in this case as having rejected the principle enunciated in Dee Cee Floor Covering. The panel found that the Board had instead adopted the rule that a section 8(f) prehire contract is transformed into an ordinary section 9(a) collective bargaining agreement when the union first achieves majority status in the relevant bargaining unit; the panel concluded that a presumption of continuing union majority applies to project-by-project employers in the construction industry despite the origination of their agreement in a section 8(f) prehire contract. Crucial to the panel's analysis, therefore, was its conclusion that the holding in Dee Cee Floor Covering has "met its well-deserved demise." 618 F.2d at 309.

Although the panel's reading of the Board's opinion in this case is a possible one,[11] we do not think it appropriate to read a change of that magnitude into such a brief and ambiguous opinion. The Board does not discuss or even cite Dee Cee Floor Covering, despite the dissent of one of its members on the basis that the Board's action conflicts with that case. 236 N.L.R.B. at 79 n.5 (Member Penello, dissenting). We recognize that the Board is authorized to change its mind and "modify its construction of the Act in light of its cumulative experience." Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 508, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2477, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978). But "when it does it must at least carefully explain its reasons justify the change and follow controlling law." Seafarers v. NLRB, 101 L.R.R.M. 2628, 2631 (D.C.Cir.1979). As the Supreme Court made clear in NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 380 U.S. 438, 443–44, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965), it is highly improper for "reviewing courts to substitute counsel's rationale or their discretion for that of the Board." It is the duty of the Board—not of the courts—to clearly set forth the intent of its decisions and to explain the basis of departures from its own precedent. Although the Board is entrusted with considerable discretion in its interpretation and application of the Act,[12] "[w]hen it so exercises the discretion given to it by Congress, it must 'disclose the basis of its order' and 'give clear indication that it has exercised the discretion with which Congress has empowered it.'" Id. at 443, 85 S.Ct. at 1064. See Central Power & Light Co. v. United States, 634 F.2d 137, 149 (5th Cir. 1980); Mitchell Energy Corp. v. FERC, 580 F.2d 763 (5th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Sunnyland Packing Co., 557 F.2d 1157, 1160 (5th Cir. 1977). There is no such indication in the Board's opinion in this case. Furthermore, several cases subsequent to the Board's decision in this case, discussed infra, have made it clear that the Board did not intend to overrule Dee Cee Floor Covering.

Accordingly, we must interpret the Board's decision in this case in the context of the holding in Dee Cee Floor Covering that a union must reestablish its majority status at each new jobsite before it can enforce a section 8(f) prehire contract with a project-by-project employer. Reading the Board's opinion in this light, the Board appears to have found that while the Company was not bound by the Union-AGC contract at subsequent jobsites, relief extending beyond the termination of an enforceable contract was nevertheless required in order to fully restore the employees to the status quo ante. This apparent holding requires a factual finding (which the Board does not make, but instead leaves to the compliance stage of these proceedings) that particular employees would have been rehired by the Company despite its lawful option not to rehire them at the conclusion of ongoing projects. We hold that such a finding is precluded as a matter of law by factual findings already made by the administrative law judge and accepted by the Board. Therefore we must refuse the Board's application for enforcement of its order insofar as that order extends relief to projects not yet begun at the time of the unfair labor practices. In order to understand our interpretation of the Board's opinion and our conclusion as to its validity, it is necessary first to review the history of section 8(f) and its interpretation by the Board and by the courts; we will then describe the Board's apparent holding and apply that holding to the facts of this case.

[11] We need not decide whether the holding which is suggested by the panel's reading of the Board's opinion is a permissible interpretation of the Act. Since, as discussed infra, we concude that the Board has not abandoned Dee Cee Floor Covering, we expressly decline to decide whether such a course of action would in fact be within its authority.

B. The History of Section 8(f) and its Interpretation by the Board and by the Courts.

The Board declined to exercise jurisdiction over the construction industry before 1947. As a result, "[c]oncepts evoked by the Board * * * developed without reference to the construction industry." H.R.Rep.No. 741, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 19 (1959), Reprinted at [1959] U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 2318; 1 NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959; p. 777 [hereinafter cited as Leg.Hist.], quoted in Higdon Construction Co., 434 U.S. at 348, 98 S.Ct. at 659. In 1959, Congress added section 8(f) [13] to the Act in response to the special characteristics and needs of the building and construction industry.[14] The short duration and occasional nature of employment in that industry make ordinary collective bargaining negotiations—which must await the employees' choice of a bargaining representative—difficult at best. Under section 8(f), the execution of an agreement with a minority union by an employer in the construction industry does not constitute an unfair labor practice. This exception to the requirement of majority support at the time of the execution of the contract is limited, however, by a proviso to the section which states that a contract which would be invalid but for section 8(f) "shall not be a bar to a petition filed pursuant to section 9(c) or 9(e)." Under this proviso, the employer, employees or union may request a bargaining representative election at any time.

In NLRB v. Local 103, International Association of Bridge Workers (Higdon Construction Co.), 434 U.S. 335, 98 S.Ct. 651, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978), the Supreme Court discussed the legislative history of section 8(f) and the effect to be given section 8(f) agreements in the building and construction industry. Higdon Construction Co. and Local 103 of the International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Ironworkers, AFL-CIO (Local 103), after several years of collective bargaining, entered into a prehire agreement requiring Higdon to abide by the terms of an "understanding" between Local 103 and a multi-employer association. There was no union security clause in the Local 103-Higdon agreement. When Higdon later undertook construction projects (through an alter ego company) with nonunion labor, Local 103 picketed those projects (one for more than 30 days) with signs stating that the employer was violating the agreement with the union. The union did not represent a majority of the employees at the job sites and had not petitioned for a representation election. The employer filed a charge with the NLRB alleging that the union was violating section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act, which makes it an unfair labor practice for an uncertified union to picket for more than 30 days for the purpose of forcing an employer to recognize the union as the bargaining representative of his employees unless a petition for an election has been filed within that period. Local 103 argued that its picketing did not constitute an unfair labor tice because, since Higdon had entered into a ul section 8(f) prehire contract with Local 103 nising to abide by the multi-

[14] The House and Senate Committee Reports on section 8(f) reveal Congress' awareness of the transistory nature of employment in the construction industry:

> The occasional nature of the employment relationship makes this industry markedly different from manufacturing and other types of enterprise. An individual employee typically works for many employers and for none of them continuously. Jobs are frequently of short duration, depending upon various stages of construction.
> In the building and construction industry it is customary for employers to enter into collective-bargaining agreements for periods of time running into the future, perhaps 1 year or in many instances as much as 3 years. Since the vast majority of building projects are of relatively short duration, such labor agreements sometimes apply to jobs which have not been started.

The Senate Report also noted that "[r]epresentation elections in a large segment of the industry are not feasible to demonstrate * * * majority status due to the short periods of actual employment by specific employers." S.Rep.No.187, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 55 (1959), Reprinted at [1959] U.S.Code Cong. & Admin. News 2318; 1 Leg.Hist. 451-52.

The Supreme court, drawing from the legislative history of section 8(f), has noted:

> There were two aspects peculiar to the building trades that Congress apparently thought justified the use of prehire agreements with unions that did not then represent a majority of the employees:
> "One reason for this practice is that it is necessary for the employer to know his labor costs before making the estimate upon which his bid will be based. A second reason is that the employer must be able to have available a supply of skilled craftsmen ready for quick referral."

loyer standard, the purpose of the picketing to obtain compliance with an existing contract er than to obtain recognition or bargaining as nitial matter.

he Supreme Court approved the longstanding tion of the Board, see R.J. Smith Construction 208 N.L.R.B. 615 (1974), and held that the eting by Local 103 was for recognitional pur- es and constituted an unfair labor practice er section 8(b)(7)(C). The court explained that picketing was recognitional because > prehire agreement does not entitle a minority nion to be treated as the majority representative f the employees until and unless it attains ma- ority support in the relevant unit. Until that me the prehire agreement is voidable and does ot have the same stature as a collective-bargain- ng contract entered into with a union actually epresenting a majority of the employees and ecognized as such by the employer. According- y, * * * picketing by a minority union to en- orce a prehire agreement that the employer re- uses to honor, effectively has the object of at- aining recognition as the bargaining representa- ive with majority support among the employees, and is consequently violative of section 8(b)(7)(C).

In accepting the Board's position in Higdon Con- uction Co., the Supreme Court emphasized the ique nature of prehire contracts under section f). A prehire contract is a "preliminary step" hich allows an employer in the construction in- istry to negotiate and to reach a tentative agree- ent with a union before that union becomes the ajority representative of its employees. Id. at 345. he Court also emphasized the significant limita- ons which are implicit in any prehire contract. ection 8(f) was not intended to undermine the em- loyees' right to bargain collectively through a epresentative of their own choosing. Hence the roviso to section 8(f), which states that a prehire ontract "shall not be a bar to a petition filed pur- uant to section 9(c) or 9(e)" of the Act. That is, a argaining representative election may be called at any time—despite the existence of a prehire contract between the employer and a union. Accordingly, the exeption embodied in section 8(f) and allowing negotiations between an employer and a union which has not achieved majority status "is nevertheless of limited scope, for the usual rule protecting the union from inquiry into its majority status during the terms of a collective-bargaining contract does not apply to prehire agreements." Id. at 345, 98 S.Ct. at 657–658. Of course, the Supreme Court recognized that once the union does establish its majority status, its prehire contract with the employer "attains the status of a collective-bargaining agreement executed by the employer with a union representing a majority of the employees in the unit." Id. at 350, 98 S.Ct. at 660. Prior to that time, however, section 8(f) agreements are entirely voidable; since the union does not represent a majority of the employees, it is not entitled to enter into a binding collective-bargaining agreement with the employer.

Before the Supreme Court decided Higdon Construction Co., the Board had already reiterated its analysis of section 8(f) in Dee Cee Floor Covering, Inc., 232 N.L.R.B. 421 (1977). After reaffirming its conclusion that section 8(f) prehire contracts do not become enforceable until the union demonstrates majority support, the Board unequivocally adopted the related principle which concerns us today, that is, that a union must reestablish its majority status at each affected job site before it can enforce a section 8(f) agreement with a project-by-project employer. Dee Cee Floor Covering, a seller and installer of carpeting in the construction industry, did not maintain a regular complement of employees, but hired workmen as the need arose. In April 1973, Dee Cee entered into a collective bargaining agreement with the union. In April 1975, Dee Cee went out of business and Dagin-Akrab Floor Covering, Inc. (Dagin-Akrab), an alter ego of Dee Cee, came into being and entered into a contract identical to the 1973 Dee Cee-union contract. In August 1975, Dagin-Akrab was awarded a contract to buy and install carpeting at the Ft. Riley military installation. In recruiting workmen for the project, Dagin-Akrab informed several union members that work at the project would be on a nonunion basis only and, if they wished such employment, they would have to withdraw from the union. Dagin-Akrab told them that they would pay union scale wages but would not pay any union fringe benefits as required by the April 1975 agreement. Some workers accepted employment with Dagin-Akrab and others, refusing to abandon the union, did not. The administrative law judge found that Dagin-Akrab, by making unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment and by refusing to bargain with the union, violated section 8(a)(5) and (1), and found, in addition, that Dagin-Akrab violated section 8(a)(3) by conditioning employment at the Ft. Riley project upon employees withdrawing from the union.

The Board affirmed the administrative law judge on the section 8(a)(3) finding, but refused to accept his recommendation on the section 8(a)(5) and (1) violations. The Board reasoned:

> [Section 8(f)] merely immunizes the parties to such agreements from liability under section, 8(a) and (b) of the Act. Such prehire agreements do not, however, give rise to a presumption of majority status on behalf of the union. Thus, where a union fails to prove that it has obtained majority status among the employer's employees, an employer may withdraw recognition from that union and/or make unilateral changes in the contractual working conditions without thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.
> While the April 1975 agreement was validly entered into pursuant to Section 8(f) of the Act, that agreement was not binding on the Respondent for purposes of Section 8(a)(5) until such time as the Union demonstrated that it enjoyed the support of a majority of the Respondent's employees employed at the Ft. Riley project. However, in light of the fact that Respondent had no employees working for it either at the time that it executed the contract or when it unilaterally set the conditions of employment at the Ft. Riley project and refused to bargain with the Union, it is obvious that the Union could not have had a majority status.
> Furthermore, the mere fact that the Union might indeed have represented a majority of the employees of Respondent Dee Cee's previous job sites is of no consequence inasmuch as the Union must demonstrate its majority at each new job site n order to invoke the provision of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. As the facts here show that the Respondent has no employees at the Ft. Riley job when it decided to abrogate its prehire agreement with the Union, no violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act can be found. Moreover, although Dagin-Akrab as the alter ego of Dee Cee would normally have been bound to Dee Cee's 1973 agreement, no violation can be found in its failure to apply that agreement at the Ft. Riley job, since it had no employees working at that job when the unilateral changes were made. Therefore, a refusal-to-bargain violation also cannot be predicated on the breach of the 1973 agreement.

[15] Although the Board did not explicitly adopt this analysis until Dee Cee Floor Covering, it seems to have implicitly followed it in previous cases. In Ruttman Constr. Co., 191 N.L.R.B. 701 (1971), the Board refused to apply a presumption of majority status to a new project where the employer had executed a prehire agreement containing a union security clause with one union but signed and put into effect a new prehire agreement with another union while the first prehire agreement was still in effect. The Board stated that a prehire agreement "is merely a preliminary step that contemplates further action for the development of a full bargaining relationship: such actions may include the execution of a supplemental agreement for certain projects or covering a certain area and the hiring of employees who are usually referred by the union or unions with whom there is a prehire agreement." Id. at 702. See also Roberts & Schaefer Co., 193 N.L.R.B. 860 (1971) (citing Ruttman in holding that a section 8(f) nationwide bargaining agreement between the company and a union "never matured into a full bargaining relationshop between [the company and the union] as to a new project begun by the Company during the contract term). In Irvin-McKelvy Co., 194 N.L.R.B. 52 (1971), enforced in part sub nom. NLRB v. Irvin, 475 F.2d 1265 (3rd Cir. 1973), the Board held that by virtue of compliance with union security provisions in a section 8(f) contract the union had majority status at those projects still underway, but dismissed the complaint with respect to projects not yet begun at the time the employer terminated the union contract and entered into a contract with a rival union.

In Iron Workers Local 103, 216 N.L.R.B. 45 (1975), the Board cited Ruttman for the proposition that section 8(f) contracts "do not carry, even with union-security provisions, a presumption of majority status until such time as employees for particular projects have been hired." Id. at 46 (footnote omitted). In addition, the Board cited its dismissal in Irvin of the compliant concerning unfair labor practices with respect to projects not yet begun at the time the employer terminated the section 8(f) contract at a time when the union enjoyed majority support.

Although the precedential value of Ruttman and Irvin might properly have been discounted before Dee Cee Floor Covering because of their somewhat unusual factual contexts, see King & LaVaute, Current Trends in Construction Industry Labor Relations—The Double-Breasted Contractor and the Prehire Contract, 29 Syracuse L. Rev. 901, 932-37 (1978) (emphasizing that the Irvin prehire contract was converted into a "project only" contract by virtue of a "most favored nations" clause in the contract and the execution of a "project only" contract by the union with another contractor, and that the Ruttman contract may not have been strictly applicable to the new project undertaken by the Company), our reading of Dee Cee Floor Covering dispels any doubts about the Board's position which the limited factual contexts of Ruttman and Irvin might have en-

Continued

In recent cases the Board has distinguished Dee Cee Floor Covering, which involved a "project-by-project" employer, from cases involving an employer with a "stable work force." See Hageman Underground Construction, 253 N.L.R.B. No. 7 (1980); Corrugated Structures, Inc., 252 N.L.R.B. No. 79 (1980); Land Equipment, Inc., 248 N.L.R.B. No. 98 (1980); Precision Striping, Inc., 245 N.L.R.B. No. 34 (1979). The Board has held that where an employer employs a stable work force (rather than employing new workers on a project-by-project basis) the union need not reestablish its majority status at each successive jobsite in order to enforce a section 8(f) agreement with the employer. As the Board explained in Hageman Underground Construction:

> [W]here an employer employs a permanent and stable work force to work on a multisite basis, and the union, initially recognized under section 8(f), subsequently achieves majority status in that stable work force, the employer is then under a statutory duty to recognize and bargain with that union at all projects without requiring the union to demonstrate majority status at each one. It logically follows, and we so held in Precision Striping, that where there is a majority status in a permanent and stable work force, and a contract in effect between the parties covering that work force, the union not only becomes the employees' statutory bargaining representative for all present and future sites but, as in a typical industrial setting, also enjoys an irrebuttable presumption of majority status for the duration of the agreement.

253 N.L.R.B. at —— (footnotes omitted). We need not decide whether this interpretation of the Act is a permissible one and need not examine precisely where the Board has drawn the line between "project-by-project" and "stable work force" employers, for the Board has explicitly affirmed the finding of the administrative law judge that Haberman Construction Co. was a project-by-project employer. The cases which draw this distinction themselves reaffirm the rule of Dee Cee Floor Covering in the context of a project-by-project employer. As the Board explained in a footnote to the above text from Hageman Underground Construction:

> This contrasts with a situation in which a construction industry employer has no stable complement and hires its employ> ees on a project-by-project basis with little carryover from site to site. In such situations majority status among employees at a given jobsite is not presumed to carry over automatically to future sites and "the union must demonstrate its majority status at each new jobsite in order to invoke the provisions of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act." See Dee Cee Floor Covering, Inc. and its Alter Ego and/or Successor, Dagin-Akrab Floor Covering, Inc., 232 N.L.R.B. 421 (1977).

253 N.L.R.B. at —— n.7. In fact, the Board specifically referred in Hageman to its opinion in Haberman, distinguishing Haberman as a case involving a project-by-project employer. Id. at n.9. We can only conclude, therefore, that the Board continues to adhere to the rule enunciated in Dee Cee Floor Covering: in order to enforce a section 8(f) contract with a project-by-project employer, the union must reestablish its majority at each successive jobsite.

C. The Affirmative Remedy Ordered by the Board and Its Validity in This Case

The Board appears to have applied the rule of Dee Cee Floor Covering, and concluded that the Company was not bound by the Union-AGC contract at subsequent jobsites. Although the Board did not cite Dee Cee Floor Covering, it explicitly recognized that the Company, "which hired employees on a project-by-project basis, might have discharged the discriminatees in the normal course of business when the projects were completed." 236 N.L.R.B. at 79. It does not appear, therefore, that the distinction between "project-by-project" and "stable work force" employers was an issue considered by the Board in this case. This contrasts with the recent cases of the Board discussed supra, in which the determinative issue was whether a valid contract existed at the particular project on gendered. In Dee Cee Floor Covering, the Board unequivocally stated, in the context of a section 8(f) contract which was not limited to current projects only and where a majority of the employees on the company's projects had supported the union, that the union must reestablish its majority status of each new project.

which an alleged unfair labor practice had occurred. Here the Board accepted at the outset that the Company was a project-by-project employer and that the Union would therefore have to reestablish its majority status at each succeeding jobsite. The Board does not assert that the Company would be bound by the contract at subsequent jobsites; to the contrary, the opinion states that the Company could have "discharged the discriminatees in the normal course of business" at the conclusion of ongoing jobs. The determinative issue seems instead to have been the applicability of a remedial order which admittedly extended beyond the term of an existing contract but was nevertheless required in order to restore the economic status quo ante to particular employees who would have been rehired on subsequent projects, despite the termination of the Company's obligations under the Union-AGC contract, were it not for the unfair labor practices committed while the contract was in force. The Board explained that, while the Company could have replaced its employees at the conclusion of ongoing projects, there was nevertheless "a distinct possibility that, absent its discrimination, Respondent would have retained, transferred, or rehired at least some of the discriminatees for new projects." Id. (emphasis added). On this basis the Board ordered the Company to reinstate on its current projects those particular employees who would have been retrained but for their wrongful discharge, and to make those employees whole accordingly. Id. at 80. Thus, the Board's opinion and order appear to restore the discriminatees to an economic position to which they were not contractually entitled (since the Company could have terminated its obligations under the Union-AGC contract at the conclusion of ongoing projects), but which the Board felt they might nevertheless have attained (since the Company might have rehired some employees even if not contractually bound to do so). Underlying this holding is the proposition that an affirmative remedial order extending beyond the termination of ongoing projects is necessary to restore the economic status quo ante to those particular employees who would have been rehired absent the Company's unlawful discrimination against them. This proposition is implicit in the Board's brief explanation of its decision; after the opinion suggests the possibility that some of the discriminatees might have been rehired absent the Company's unfair labor practices, it explains:

> Accordingly, to remedy fully Respondent's unfair labor practices and protect the discriminatee's rights, we shall order Respondent to reinstate the discriminatees * * * and to make them whole * * *.

Id. at 79 (emphasis added). As we read the Board's opinion, then, it seeks to restore the discriminatees to an economic position they might in fact have attained despite the Company's lawful right not to rehire them at the termination of projects in progress.

We recognize that the remedial authority of the Board may at least in some cases be used to restore the parties to economic positions they reasonably expected to occupy in the absence of unfair labor practices, whether or not those expectations rest on legally enforceable obligations. As we explained in Nabors v. NLRB, 323 F.2d 686 (5th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 911, 84 S.Ct. 666, 11 L.Ed.2d 609 (1964) (including profit shares, which had been voluntarily but consistently awarded by the employer in the past, in the computation of back pay awards):

> In effectuating the policies of the Act, the Board has taken the position that the "make whole" concept does not turn on whether the pay was wholly obligatory or gratuitous, but on the restoration of the status quo ante. See Moss Planing Mill Co., 110 NLRB 933, 935, enforced as modified on other grounds, NLRB v. Moss Planing Mill Co., 4 Cir., 1958, 256 F.2d 653, 654. In that case there was included in back pay an amount representing clothing given grauitously as Christmas gifts. The Board's discretion to take such affirmative remedial action as will effectuate the purposes of the Act includes more than placing the employee in position to assert contractual or legally enforceable obligations. "Back pay" as used in section 10(c) includes the moneys, whether gratuitous or not, which it is reasonably found that the employee would actually have received in the absence of the unlawful discrimination. That principle seems to us so clear as to make unnecessary a discussion of the many persuasive authorities cited in the briefs of both parties.

323 F.2d at 690. See McCann Steel Co. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 652, 656 (6th Cir. 1978) (overtime pay ordinarily received may be included in back pay); NLRB v. Madison Courier, Inc., 472 F.2d 1307, 1312 n.9. (D.C. Cir. 1972) (Christmas bonuses included in back pay); NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 360 F.2d 569, 572 (5th Cir. 1966) (safe driving award included in back pay); NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 339 F.2d 829, 832 (5th Cir. 1965) (Christmas bonus included in back pay).

We note that none of the cases we cite here for the proposition that the Board may order relief to which a party would not have been contractually entitled in the absence of an unfair labor violation involves a dispute arising in the special context of section 8(f) and the construction industry. We need not decide, however, whether this principle does or should extend to this area, for it clearly has no application to the particular facts of this case. The Board did not explicitly reach the factual questions raised by our interpretation of its action; instead, it left "[t]he determination of which employees, if any, would have continued in respondent's employment and for how long" to "the compliance stage of the proceedings." 236 N.L.R.B. at 79. But although the Board did not predetermine the results of such an inquiry, it at least suggested the possibility of a factual finding that the Company would have retained, transferred, or rehired some of the discriminatees on subsequent projects.

This suggestion ignores the factual findings already made by the administrative law judge and adopted by the Board. In the first place, the administrative law judge described as follows the Company's decision to go "open shop" and to cease paying union benefits:

> In November, 1976, Beshears' employment with the Respondent ceased. His duties, if not his title, were assumed by Carpenter Foreman Randolph Whitfield. About February 1977, Respondent hired a new Superintendent, Robert McElyea. According to Respondent's general manager, Howard Haberman, after McElyea was hired Haberman and Bert Speed talked to McElyea who expressed the opinion that he could "do the job that we had on an open shop basis, without us having to pay the union pension thing * * *." It was concluded that the Respondent should proceed on that basis because the pension "thing" was a costly item running a $1000 to $1200 a month toward the latter part of the year 1976.

236 N.L.R.B. at 82 (emphasis added). In the second place, the administrative law judge found that the two Austin projects from which the employees were constructively discharged were "almost completed" at the time of the unfair labor practices. Id. at 87. These findings must be read in the context of the Company's right to terminate its obligations under the Union-AGC contract at the conclusion of ongoing projects. Since the purpose of the Company's actions was to cut its expenses, and since these actions could lawfully have been taken at the conclusion of ongoing projects (which were almost completed), one can only assume that in the absence of the unfair labor practices the Company would lawfully have decided to go "open shop" and to cease paying union benefits at the conclusion of the projects from which the discriminatees were constructively discharged.

A factual finding that any particular employee would be rehired depends, therefore, on the assumption that that employee would have returned to work on a subsequent project despite the Company's decision to go "open shop" and to cease paying union benefits. As the administrative law judge found, however, the employees quit the Company's employment precisely because of these actions:

> The testimony of all of the foregoing named employees at the hearing with respect to the reasons for quitting was not contradicted by Respondent. I therefore credit their testimony which clearly establishes that the basis for their quitting was Respondent's decision to go "open shop" and no longer pay their "fringes," i.e., payments to the Union's funds.

Id. at 86 (emphasis added). Because the discriminatees (according to their own testimony) were unwilling to work under the conditions which it is clear the Company would have lawfully offered, we can only conclude that none of them in fact would have accepted employment by the Company on subsequent projects. We hold, therefore, that a factual finding that the Company would have "retained, transferred, or rehired at least some of the discriminatees for new projects" is foreclosed as a matter of law by factual findings already adopted by the Board. Absent such a finding, there is no basis in the facts of this case for the Board's order insofar as that order extends relief to projects not yet begun at the time of the Company's unfair labor practices.

Accordingly, the application for enforcement of the Board's contract restoration order (paragraphs 1(a), 2(b), and 2(c)) is DENIED insofar as it applies to construction projects commenced by the Company after February 16, 1977. The application for enforcement of the Board's reinstatement order (paragraph 2(d)) is DENIED. The application for enforcement of the "make whole" portion of the Board's reinstatement order (paragraph 2(e)) is DENIED insofar as it applies to construction projects commenced after February 16, 1977. The application for enforcement of the Board's bargaining order (paragraphs 1(b) and 2(a)) is DENIED.[16] In all other respects, the Board's order is ENFORCED.

JERRE S. WILLIAMS, Circuit Judge, with whom, RUBIN, KRAVITCH, HATCHETT, TATE, SAM D. JOHNSON and THOMAS A. CLARK, Circuit Judges, join, concurring in part and dissenting in part: The Court in a through and scholarly presentation upholds the order of the National Labor Relations Board in full in finding appellant Haberman Construction Company violated §§ 8(a)(1), (3) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. I concur fully in that decision as set out in parts I and II of the opinion. My dispute is wholly with part III in which the Court permits only a truncated and ineffectual remedy to the Board to cure the impact of the unfair labor practices committed by Haberman.

The statement of facts in the majority opinion is complete and objective. The key facts in evaluating the remedy are: 1. The company disavowed the collective agreement under which it was operating during its existence but not long before, it was to expire. 2. The construction projects upon which the employed carpenters were working were also soon to end. 3. This employer did not have a steady workforce but hired on a project-by-project basis. The Court uses the soon-to-expire contract, the soon-to-end projects, and the projet-by-project hiring to enable the employer to escape the full impact of the Board's remedies for his unfair labor practices. It is at this point that I must part company and register this dissent.

No assertion is made that the Board had no legal power to act beyond the termination of the then current contract and the then current jobs. The Court correctly concedes that the Board does have such power. But applying such power in this case, the Court concludes, is punitive. This opinion will undertake to demonstrate that this exercise of power by the Board is not punitive but strives only to reconstruct the status quo as if the employer had not engaged in the unfair labor practices. This is the proper power for the Board to exercise in formulating its remedies. N.L.R.B. v. J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 396 U.S. 258, 263–65, 90 S.Ct. 417, 420–421, 24 L.Ed.2d 405 (1969).

The clearest way to see the impact of the refusal to allow the Board to extend its remedies beyond the contract expiration and the project terminations is to evaluate the situation of the employer if he had not breached the contract, refused to bargain, and discharged the employees, but had waited until the contract expired and and the jobs were over. The Court relied upon the fact that the employer then could have discharged the employees, declared an "open shop", hired employees for new projects and paid them without regard to union working conditions.

While factually true as far as it goes, this conclusion needs amplification. In the first place, the "discharge" of the employees from the concluded projects would have been no more than ending the work and paying off employees after the work is over. It had no relationship whatsoever to possible rehiring on later projects in a project-by-project situation. In the second place, the announcement that the company was going "open shop" itself would be an unfair labor practice if the company meant to guarantee there would be no union recognition and no collective bargaining. Assuming that the company know it could not follow the classic definition of "open shop" and hire so as to insure there would not be a union majority,[1] the employer by declar-

[16] In denying enforcement of the Board's bargaining order, we do not rely on the Company's argument that the order is unenforceable because it mandates bargaining without regard to the majority status of the Union. The propriety of a bargaining order does not normally depend upon the existence of majority status throughout the period between the time of the unfair labor practices and the time for enforcement of the Board's order. On the contrary, the relevant date for determining the extent of the Company's duty to bargain and, thus, the propriety of a bargaining order is the time of the unfair labor practices. Franks Bros. Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 702, 64 S.Ct. 817, 88 L.Ed. 1020 (1944). The Board therefore properly ordered bargaining. Nevertheless, in view of the lapse of time between the unfair labor practices and our consideration of the order, the special nature of employment in the construction industry, and out holding that the employer's unfair labor practices were not the reason for loss of majority status after the termination of the current projects, we do not think a need for enforcement of the order exists at this time. See NLRB v. Irvin, 475 F.2d 1265, 1271 (3d Cir. 1973) (denying enforcement of a bargaining order in light of length of time between end of projects to which order applied and court's decision); cf. NLRB v. American Cable Systems, Inc., 427 F.2d 446, 448–49 (5th Cir.) cert. denied, 400 U.S. 957, 91 S.Ct. 356, 27 L.Ed.2d 266 (1970) (recognizing the necessity under certain circumstances for consideration of changed circumstances in context of Gissel-type bargaining order).

ing an open shop would be doing no more than declaring that there is now no binding contract and that it is going to offer its self-determined wages and working conditions. Under the law an employer has no power to select employees on the basis of union membership or attitudes toward unions or collective bargaining. He must consider all applicants regardless of their union affiliation, attitudes, or activities. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976); Local 357, Internat'l Bro. of Team., Etc. v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 667, 81 S.Ct. 835, 6 L.Ed.2d 11 (1961).

This in turn means that there is no obligation to bargain on a new project only so long as the union lacks a majority. The employees hired will have the right to try to organize the project and gain a majority. If they do, the employer will be required to bargain with them collectively. They may use the usual self help devices in trying to organize the new project such as recognitional picketing, striking, the collecting of authorization cards, and petitoning for an election. See, e.g., N.L.R.B. v. Phil-Modes, Inc., 396 F.2d 131 (5th Cir. 1968); Smitley v. N.L.R.B., 327 F.2d 351 (9th Cir. 1964).

So it is that an employer in the construction industry in no way avoids his elemental obligations under the statute by hiring on a project-by-project basis. The fundamental protection of the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively and not to be discriminated against because of their union activity or interest remains intact.[2]

By refusing to extend the Board's remedies beyond the expiration of the prior contract and the expiration of the prior projects, the Court leaves this employer in precisely the same situation he would have been in after such expiration if he had not committed the serious unfair labor practices revealed by this record. And the Court insists that going beyond allowing him this easy escape from his serious practices is punitive and therefore barred to the Board.

The Board's remedies are punitive only if the employer's unfair practices made no change in the situation of the union and the employees which carries its impact beyond the expiration of the contract and the prior projects. Yet, the impact of the employer's unfair practices does extend beyond that time and does have a serious continuing effect. The employer has prejudiced the entire situation with respect to his future business activities and the hiring of employees by the actions which he took. We should not close our eyes to whatever impact the employer's unfair labor practices had after the contract expired and the projects ended.

The heavy lingering effect of the employer's unfair labor practices is manifest. This employer has by his actions told his present and future employees that he cannot be trusted to bargain with the union even though he is lawfully bound to do so and that he may well discriminate against union employees in his future conduct. The Court labors under a misapprehension. The employees involved did not quit because they did not like to work under nonunion working conditions. They were discharged, as the Court concedes, because the employer's unfair labor practices (1) created intolerable conditions of employment and (2) constituted conduct to discourage union membership. This employer has committed these offenses. For an employee who was a union member or inclined toward union membership to go to work for this employer after the commission of these offenses would require acceptance that the employer has

[1] The original meaning of "open shop" was a business where the employer announced he would not deal with a union regardless of union majority and usually carried with it the further implication that any employee who joined a union would be discharged. Taft, Organized Labor and American History, p. 360–1 (1964). The National Labor Relations Act, of course, outlawed such open shops. 29 U.S.C. § 8(a)(1), (3), (5). Yet note the close parallel of this employer's unfair labor practices to the classic "open shop" concept.

[2] The purpose of the 1959 amendment contained in § 8(f), 29 U.S.C. § 158(f), providing for pre-hire agreements, was to add to the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively in the building construction industry, not to take any rights away from them. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law 667–8 (1976). While the collective bargaining agreement involved in this case began as a pre-hire agreement under § 8(f), at the current stage of this case pre-hire agreements are irrelevant. See fn. 4, infra.

tainted the work relationship and can reasonably be expected to engage in conduct which discriminates against union membership and creates intolerable working conditions for those who are union members. Why? Because he has already done so even in a situation where under contract he was bound to do otherwise.

The Court attempts to avoid the significance of the impact of the constructive discharge on the employees by asserting that they were not guaranteed steady employment by the employer and that in any event they would not work for wages and working conditions short of the union requirements.

Neither assumption is warranted. The Court undertakes to establish the proposition that none of the past employees of Haberman could be expected to be hired on new projects. Recent NLRB cases such as Hageman Underground Construction, 253 N.L.R.B. No. 7 (1980),[3] make a distinction between construction contractors who have a "stable" workforce and those who hire on a project-by-project basis. It is accurate that the Board properly referred to the Haberman case in Hageman as a case involving project-by-project hiring.

Next, the Court goes to Dee Cee Floor Covering, Inc., 232 N.L.R.B. 421 (1977), and notes that there was no likelihood of the union's obtaining a majority on the specific project involved in that case. Then it concludes that this is true in the instant case also. Succinctly, the position is that there are only two alternatives in the construction industry. Either there is a steady workforce of regular employees or there is no possibility of continuity of employment at all.

There is no justification in the law for such an either/or requirement. Dee Cee Floor Covering involved an employer who committed an unfair labor practice by announcing that he would not hire union employees for a large new project when there were no projects currently going on, there was no contract in effect, and there was no proof of carryover of employees. In contrast, in this case the Board found specifically and accurately, without dispute, that a number of employees of Haberman at the time of the unfair labor practices "enjoyed continued employment with Respondent over several projects." Haberman Construction Co., 236 N.L.R.B. 79, n.3 (1978). This finding, coupled with the fact that the employer by law had no right to discriminate against union employees in hiring for new projects, justifies the Board's conclusion that "there is a distinct possibility that, absent its discrimination, Respondent would have retained, transferred, or rehired at least some of the discriminatees for new projects." Id. at 79. (Emphasis added).

The Court usurps the function of the Board when it concludes that prior employees of Haberman would not have worked for Haberman on new projects absent the unfair labor practices. This conclusion is supported by saying that the employees quit because Haberman would no longer pay the union pension benefits. But as is pointed out above, the employees did not quit; they were discharged. We do not know what their attitude would have been to offers of employment if there had been no discrimination and the employees could be confident that the employer would obey the law.

The employees had at least the right to consider if they would accept employment free of employer anti-union coercion and to apply if they would. That right was destroyed by the employer's unfair labor practices. Without the Board's order, the likelihood that Haberman would offer employment to the employees it discharged is nil. Further, the employees frequently hired by the employer in the past had the right to hope that they could organize the next projects and then require bargaining, since the employer could not discriminate against the union in hiring tenure policies. They had the right to be considered for work in the hope that they could get the pension benefits later through bargaining by establishing a majority at the projects.

And they had the right to engage in organizational activities including picketing and striking to accomplish these objectives. These lawful employee/job applicant opportunities were destroyed by the unfair labor practices of the employer.

Instead of the employees finding themselves free to consider whether they would be willing to work at less than full union working conditions either because they needed employment or because they hoped in the future to organize the business, the employer through his unfair labor practices notified the employees that he would discharge them for union activity, that he would breach collective bargaining agreements, that he would refuse to bargain, and that he would make working conditions intolerable for union employees. That basic employer attitude which the Board is trying to remedy by its order is not at all eliminated by the expiration of the earlier contract and the ending of the earlier projects. The employer is allowed to exculpate himself merely by the passage of a short period of time with the expiration of a collective agreement and the ending of work projects.

When this employer committed the unfair labor practices his actions were in the face of the even more stringent situation where he was bound not only by law but by contract not to do so. This was a strong antiunion message to employees and job seekers. There is nothing in the National Labor Relations Act nor in the jurisprudence of the Board and courts which justifies saying that an employer may so easily avoid the impact of such unfair labor practices. To allow him to bear no further responsibility is to thwart the valid concerns of those who work for him or wish to do so.

As a result of the unfair labor practices in this case, the employees are faced with a wholly distorted situation in making a decision as to whether to apply for employment in new projects with this employer. The possibility of actually being hired, let alone the prospect of gaining a majority of the next projects, which normally was a good chance because past projects did have union majority, has been all but destroyed by the employer's action. It would be foolish for these employees, innocent of any wrongdoing, now to assume that they have nothing to fear from an employer who has acted as this employer acted just a few months before. It is not enough to limit the Board to saying he should not have done it, and then allow only a brief and transitory remedy.

The Board in fashioning its remedy said that the only way it can make these employees whole for the violations of the law which have been committed to their disadvantage is to require that they be given the opportunity to be hired on future projects and to be awarded back pay for their losses. All parties are agreed that the pre-hire contract, converted to a collective bargaining agreement, has expired and its terms are no longer in effect. The Board concedes that this is so.[4] Establishing the back pay liability for these employees requires the determination of whether they would have been given the opportunity to work[5] and what their pay would have been absent employer unfair labor practices. The Board may very well have difficulty establishing the fact that they would have been hired 375 and the amount of back pay because there is unavoidable conjecture about what they would have gotten if they had gone to work on future projects and whether projects would have been organized or not.[6] [4] The panel opinion required the pre-hire agreement's terms to be carried over into the new projects but the Board order did not do so. The Board order stated:

> The Administrative Law Judge includes a brief statement in the remedy section which arguably suggests that he is ordering Respondent to comply with Union-AGC agreements which succeed the 1974–77 agreement. However, it is clear from the terms of his Order, which we are adopting in relevant part, that Respondent need not honor any such agreement unless it agrees to do so after bargaining with the Union.

236 N.L.R.B. at 79, n.2. The Board in its enbanc brief attempted to uphold the conclusion of the panel decision but had not taken this position earlier in its orginal brief to the Court.

[5] The Board did not automatically require that all prior employees who quit be reinstated. The Board saved for the compliance stage the determination of which employees would have otherwise been rehired. In the last sentence of its opinion, the Board stated:

> [T]he determination of which employees, if any, would have continued in Respondent's employment and for how long can best be made at the compliance stage of the proceedings, to which we defer the matter.

236 N.L.R.B. at 79.

[6] The order of the Administrative Law Judge, adopted by the Board with modification, must be read and evaluated carefully. As the Board indicated in its statement quoted above in footnote 4, the order could be read as a requirement that the terms of the existing contract would be continued after it expired, and that all employees were entitled to reinstatement. But that order was directed at the situation of a contract assumed to be still in effect and of projects which were still going on. Reinstatement in those projects and backpay awards under that contract obviously were justified. Of course, at that time, the purpose of couching the order in those terms was to entitle them to back pay in accordance with the contract terms then in existence before the projects were over. The Board's decision makes clear that the Administrative Law Judge's order is to be read this way and not as requiring the terms of the expired contract to be carried over into new projects. Further, the Board makes clear that after the projects expired the order does not apply to employees who would not have been hired again even if there had been no unfair labor practices in the past and if the employer in hiring did not discriminate on the basis of union membership, activity, or sympathy among the prospective employees.

But that is not for this Court to decide. All this Court is called upon to decide is whether the Board should undertake to make these employees whole from the effect of the unfair labor practices. The Court does not allow the Board even to try to make them whole. The excised order it sanctions ignores that they were discharged and that the conduct of the employer made clear they were unwelcome in the future. The issues of which employees are to be reinstated and the amount of back pay are not before us.

The Board also includes in its order the obligation on the employer to bargain collectively. This is a standard order in situations where a bargaining relationship was established and it is shown to be destroyed because of the unfair labor practices of the employer. We should not draw a speculative conclusion that the employees would not have obtained a majority in the future projects. The employer made it impossible for them to do so through his unfair labor practices. Orders to bargain collectively when the employer has destroyed the union majority through unfair labor practices are the usual Board remedy. N.L.R.B. v. Warren Co., Inc., 350 U.S. 107, 112, 76 S.Ct. 185, 188, 100 L.Ed. 96 (1955); N.L.R.B. v. Alterman Transport Lines, Inc., 587 F.2d 212, 228 (5th Cir. 1979); N.L.R.B. v. Poultry Enterprises, Inc., 207 F.2d 522, 525 (5th Cir. 1953). Dee Cee Floor Covering is in no way contrary to such an order. In this case the employer destroyed the collective bargaining relationship while it was in existence. This was not the Dee Cee Floor Covering situation. The employer cannot now escape the collective bargaining relationship by saying it might have escaped such a relationship if it had not violated the statute. It might or it might not have. But its unfair labor practice precluded the continuation or reestablishment of the bargaining relationship by destroying continuation in employment.

It is true we do not presume a union majority on each new project in a project-by-project hiring situation. But the Court in this case presumes a lack of majority. The presumption is correct but only because the employer's unfair labor practices made it so. Yet the Court authorizes the employer to act exactly as if he had not prejudiced the situation of prospective employees by his violations of law. The only way to remedy the alteration of the status quo by the employer's unfair labor practices is to issue a bargaining order which compels bargaining until the effects of the employer's unfair labor practices no longer have a significant impact. This is elementary law under the National Labor Relations Act. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law 532–39 (1976).

There is, of course, no way actually to restore the situation which existed when the employer committed the unfair labor practices. There are too many variables as to the future actions and attitudes on the part of both employees and employer. It follows that someone must bear the losses brought about by the inability wholly to restore the status quo. The compelling irony of the Court's view is that it does not place the losses upon the wrongdoer but instead upon those who were the victims.

The Court properly reminds us that the "remedial power of the Board is 'a broad and discretionary one, subject to limited judicial review.' Fibreboard Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 216 [85 S.Ct. 398, 406, 13 L.Ed.2d 233] (1964)." It is well to add the early admonition of the Supreme Court that a remedial order may not be overturned "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act." Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N.L.R.B., 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943). With all due respect such a showing is not even close to being made in this case. Since it is clear the impact of employer's actions persists in this construction industry context, the remedies are not punitive but designed only to do the best that can be done to reconstruct the status quo.

These employees are entitled to this remedy and the public is entitled to the vindication of its statutory policy until the vestiges of employer's unfair labor practices have been dissipated. The order of the National Labor Relations Board in this case should be enforced in full.

REFUSAL TO BARGAIN

The Board found that Peerless had committed an unfair labor practice by ceasing to make contributions to union trust funds after its collective bargaining agreement with the Union expired. A new agreement was under negotiation at that time. Peerless contends that its failure to make contributions to the union trust funds beginning in May, 1978, was not an unfair labor practice because the change was reasonably comphrehended in the terms of its contract offers to the Union,[1] and was implemented after a valid impasse in negotiations was reached. Because we hold that the change was not reasonably comprehended, we do not reach the question of impasse. NLRB v. Yutana Barge Lines, Inc., 315 F.2d 524, 529–30 (9th Cir. 1963); see also NLRB v. Crompton-Highland Mills, Inc., 337 U.S. 217, 225, 69 S.Ct. 960, 963, 93 L.Ed. 1320 (1949).

The Board found that during negotiations Peerless never proposed terminating all payments to the union trust funds. We must accept this finding if it is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487–88, 71 S.Ct. 456, 463–64, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). If the change was not comprehended in any of Peerless' proposals, its unilateral implementation amounts to a refusal to bargain in violation of 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (5). Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 729–30 (9th Cir. 1980). See NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1111, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962).

The record is clear that, while fringe benefits including trust fund contributions were among the subjects of negotiation, Peerless never proposed the substitution of cash wages for trust fund payments. The Union must be given a chance to discuss the specifics of any proposal before it is implemented, id. and this was not done.

THE REMEDY

Peerless also argues that the remedy ordered by the Board is illegal. The Board ordered Peerless to make trust fund payments for months of May through August, 1978. Peerless contends that these payments would be illegal under section 302(c)(5) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5) (Supp. II 1978).

Section 302(c)(5) prohibits all payments by an employer to an employee representative (here, the trustees of the union trust funds) unless there is a specific written agreement covering the payments, and the money is for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees. 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). Peerless argues that because the collective bargaining agreement between it and the Union expired in April, there is no such written agreement.

This argument must be rejected for two reasons. First, it appears from the record that the trust funds were established by documents separate and apart from the collective bargaining agreement. Second, the collective bargaining agreement itself survives its expiration date for some purposes. During negotiations, the employer is required by section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) (1976), to maintain the status quo as to wages and working conditions, even following the expiration date of the agreement. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 729 (9th Cir. 1980). If the employer's obligation to make trust fund payments were terminated by the expiration of the agreement, the union would never have an opportunity to bargain over those contributions. This result would not advance national labor policy as articulated in the National Labor Relations Act.

We conclude that the trust fund agreements and the collective bargaining agreement sufficiently protected the employees' interests as required by section 302(c)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). See Hinson v. NLRB, 428 F.2d 133, 137-39 (8th Cir. 1970).[2] The remedy ordered by the Board was therefore not illegal and should be enforced.

III

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Peerless finally argues that the Union's charge is barred by the six-month statute of limitations in the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b). The charge was filed on December 7, 1978. The first trust fund contribution which Peerless failed to make would ahve been due on June 20, 1978, although the obligation to make the contribution had accrued in May. The Union had no notice prior to June 20 that Peerless would not make the required contributions; the record suggests, in fact, that it may not have known until October. We therefore hold that the limitations period did not begin to run until at least June 20. The unfair labor practice charge was timely.

Since we find no merit in any of Peerless' objections to the order of the NLRB, the order will be Enforced.

[2] Petitioners rely heavily on Moglia v. Geoghegan, 403 F.2d 110 (2d Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 919, 89 S.Ct. 1193, 22 L.Ed.2d 453 (1969). Moglia is not on point, however. The employer in that case had neglected to sign any of the agreements governing the union pension fund, and the court held that payments into the fund were therefore prohibited by section 302(c)(5). We also note that Moglia was a private suit between a pension beneficiary and the trustees of the fund, so the court had no occasion to consider the coollective bargaining obligations of the employer or the requirements of the national labor policy.

NLRB v. Sambo's Restaurant, Inc.

641 F.2d 794 (9th Cir.), April 6, 1981—247 NLRB 777

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Skopil and Farris, Circuit Judges, and MacBride, District Judge*

794

Skopil, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board ("the Board") seeks enforcement of its order, 247 NLRB No. 122, requiring Sambo's Restaurant, Inc. to cease and desist from unfair labor practices at its San Bruno restaurant and to take other specific remedial actions. We grant enforcement.

795

I.

Local 340 of the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union ("the Union") began a campaign to organize the employees at Sambo's San Bruno restaurant. Approximately 45 employees worked at the restaurant during the campaign. Fourteen employees signed valid authorization cards in support of the Union. The Union lost the representation election and filed charges of unfair labor practices with the Board.

The Administrative Law Judge ("the ALJ") found that Sambo's Restaurant, Inc. ("the Company") violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) by engaging in various unfair labor practices. The ALJ issued a cease and desist order, set aside the election and ordered a new election to take place, and further ordered the Company to post a specified notice at the restaurant.

The Company, the Union, and the General Counsel all filed exceptions to the ALJ decision. At the Board hearing, the General Counsel sought the remedy of a bargaining order,[1] while the Company urged that no remedy other than a rerun election was necessary. The Board refused to issue a bargaining order because there was no evidence that the Union had obtained authorization cards from a majority of employees in the unit. The Board adopted the findings and conclusions of the ALJ, and ordered the election set aside and a rerun election held.

The Board found that the Company's unfair labor practices were "outrageous" and "pervasive". It therefore issued a broad cease and desist order and ordered additional remedial actions by the Company "to dissipate as much as possible the atmosphere of fear created by Respondent's unlawful conduct."

*Honorable Thomas J. MacBride, Senior United States District Judge for the Eastern District of California, sitting by designation.

[1] See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

The additional remedial actions required the Company to: (1) mail a copy of the notice to each employee of the restaurant; (2) include the notice in appropriate Company publications; (3) read the notice out loud to current employees assembled for that purpose with reasonable opportunity for a Board agent to attend; (4) accord the Union upon request reasonable access to bulletin boards, posting places and non-work areas during non-work time for six months; (5) supply the Union with names and addresses of current restaurant employees; (6) provide the Union notice of and equal time to respond to any company address on the subject of Union representation; and (7) afford the Union to right to deliver a 30-minute speech to employees on work time prior to any Board election.

The Company did not request a rehearing or reconsideration of the Board's decision pursuant to 29 CFR § 102.48(d). The Board applied to this court for enforcement of its order. The Company does not contest the Board's findings that the Company committed unfair labor practices. It contests only the validity of the Board's additional remedies.

II.

Section 10(e) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), pursuant to which the Board filed its petition for enforcement in this case, provides:

> No objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances.

The Board's regulations, 29 CFR § 102.48(d)(1), provide:

> A party to a proceeding before the Board may, because of extraordinary circumstances, move for reconsideration, rehearing, or reopening of the record after the Board decision or order.

The sua sponte action of the Board in ordering remedies that were not argued before it has been held to be "exactly the kind of extraordinary circumstances for which the option to move for rehearing or reconsideration is provided." NLRB v. Allied Products Corp., 548 F.2d 644, 654 (6th Cir. 1977). Thus, because of the availability of a rehearing before the Board, the Board's sua sponte adoption of an unargued remedy is not a statutory extraordinary circumstance under section 10(e) that would allow the Company to assert an objection for the first time on appeal. United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 1054 (3d Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Allied Products Corp., supra at 654; Garment Workers Union v. Quality Manufacturing, 420 U.S. 276, 95 S.Ct. 972, 43 L.Ed.2d 189 (1975). See also, Teamsters Local 115 v. NLRB (Hadden House), ——— F.2d ——— at ———, No. 79-1619, slip op. at 12 (D.C.Cir. January 26, 1981).

This court has observed that:

> A review of the cases shows that the 'extradordinary circumstances' provision of Section 10(E) [29 U.S.C. § 160(e)] (excusing the losing party's failure to make objections to the Board) has been applied only in rare cases, as when a snow storm closes the Board's offices, or when a telephone and taxi strike prevent delivery of the objections, or when an unusually early mail pickup delays delivery.

NLRB v. STR, Inc., 549 F.2d 641, 642 (9th Cir. 1977) (citations omitted). The rationale for the provision in section 10(e) precluding the losing party from raising an issue in this court that was not raised below, is that it > affords the Board the opportunity to bring its labor relations expertise to bear on the problem so that [the court] may have the benefit of [the Board's] opinion when [the court] reviews its determinations.

NLRB v. Allied Products Corp., supra at 653.

The Company's argument that the section 10(e) restriction applies only to factual issues, and not to the issue of appropriate remedies, is simply incorrect. In United Dairy Farmers, supra, the Board also ordered similar additional remedies sua sponte. The Third Circuit held that > [t]he various additional remedies specifically ordered sua sponte by the Board so as to undo the effects of the employers' action on the election process were not challenged before the Board * * *, and therefore, under Section 10(e), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), may not be challenged before this court.

United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association v. NLRB, supra at 1064. See also Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305 (3d Cir. 1980) (en banc) (company precluded from asserting objection to bargaining order issues sua sponte by Board since it did not move for reconsideration below); NLRB v. Allied Product Corp., supra, 548 F.2d 644 (company barred from objecting to status quo ante remedy granted sua sponte by Board since company did not file motion for reconsideration).

The Company further contends that since it presented all the factors that it would have presented during a motion for reconsideration when it argued to the Board against a bargaining order and for the sole remedy of a rerun election, a motion for reconsideration was unnecessary. This argument misconstrues the purpose of such a motion. While the same factors might properly be considered by the Board in determining whether to order either a bargaining order or other remedies, the Company never addressed these factors directly to the specific remedies adopted sua sponte by the Board. Neither did the Company contest before the Board the appropriateness of these specific remedies.

Since the Company failed to file a motion for reconsideration to contest the appropriateness of the additional remedies, it is barred from raising such arguments for the first time in this court.

The Board's order is hereby ENFORCED.

Blaw-Knox Foundry & Mill Machinery Inc., Wheeling Works Division v. NLRB

646 F.2d 113 (4th Cir.), April 7, 1981–247 NLRB 333

On petition to review Board Order

Before WINTER, SPROUSE, and ERVIN, Circuit Judges

114

SPROUSE, Circuit Judge: This case is before us on the petition of Blaw-Knox Foundry & Mill Machinery, Inc. (the Company) to set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board and the Board's cross-application for enforcement. The Board found that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C § 158(a)(1), by discharging Larry Jordan for engaging in protected concerted activity. Finding that Jordan had not engaged in protected concerted activity we deny enforcement.

I.

The Company operates a foundry and mill facility in Wheeling, West Virgina. Larry Jordan's discharge from employment at that facility arose from his reaction to a foreman's alleged sexual harassment of Jordan's first cousin, Sharon Asher. Jordan filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging that he had been discharged for concerted activity protected by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157. After a hearing before an administrative law judge, the Board sustained the charge and ordered Jordan's reinstatement.

The following facts were developed at the hearing. Asher had worker for the Company for some time and was a member of the union with which the Company had a collective bargaining agreement. Jordan was a new, probationary employee and was not a member of the union. On August 17, 1977, foreman Leonard Lewis encountered Asher and had a brief conversation with her. Although Lewis denies it, Asher claims that Lewis indecently touched her. Asher went to the foremen's office and in Lewis's presence informed her supervisor that she wanted to register a complaint about Lewis. She reported that Lewis had "grabbed" her and that although she "wasn't putting in a grievance," she did not want it to happen again.

After leaving the office, she told several coworkers of the incident with Lewis. When Asher described Lewis's alleged misconduct to Jordan, the latter suggested that he and Asher confront Lewis. The two of them proceeded to the foremen's office, where several supervisors were present. Jordan asked Asher to identify the man who had touched her and Asher pointed to Lewis.

Precisely what happened thereafter is sharply disputed. Lewis and two other foremen who were present testified that Jordan threatened to kill Lewis if Lewis ever touched Asher again. Asher and Jordan both denied this. As Jordan recounted the incident to the administrative law judge:

> I said * * * you are a foreman, you shouldn't even consider doing anything like that, and he said, it was his word against hers, and if she wanted to go into the office, that they could * * *. I said that was between you and > her * * * and then he said, what are you going to do about it anyway?

* * * * *

> I said, if you do it again, we'll take some sort of action or steps necessary to get something done about it.

According to Jordan, Lewis again asked him "in a different way" what he planned to do about it. Jordan testified:

> I said just don't touch her again, or we'll find out, and that's that's when Larry Gribben touched me on the shoulder and we left.

Asher's testimony corroborated Jordan's:

> [M]y cousin said to [Lewis], he said, you don't put your hands on her no more * * *. [Lewis] asked my cousin, what was he going to do about it anyway, and my cousin said, just don't put your hands on her no more * * * or you'll see, or something like that * * *

The adminstrative law judge credited the testimony of Asher and Jordan, discounting the alleged threat upon Lewis's life.

In a subsequent conversation with Lewis and another foreman, Jordan indicated that he would have no further involvement with the matter. So far as he was concerned, any further action was up to Asher and Lewis. Jordan filed no grievance in the matter and did not participate in Asher's grievance.

II.

Counsel for the Board maintains that in coming to his cousin's assistance and protesting the alleged sexual harassment, Jordan was engaging in "classic concerted activity." The Company contends that Jordan's own testimony demonstrates he was not engage in "concerted" activity within the meaning of the statute. Alternatively, the Company urges that the Board's finding that Jordan did not threaten Lewis's life is unsupported by substantial evidence. Since we agree with the Company's first contention, we need not reach the other.

III.

Section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, provides:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concered activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

In NLRB v. Interboro Contractors, Inc., 388 F.2d 495, 500 (2d Cir. 1967), the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit stated that the efforts of an individual employee acting alone to enforce the provisions of a collective bargaining agreement may be deemed "concerted," and thus protected, at least when the individual's interpretation of the agreement has a reasonable basis. See NLRB v. John Langenbacher Co., 398 F.2d 459, 463 (2d Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 1049, 89 S.Ct 685, 21 L.Ed.2d 691 (1969). Cf. Ontario Knife Co. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 840 (2d Cir. 1980). The rationale for this rule, as expressed by the Board, is that "implementation of such agreement by an employee is but an extension of the concerted activity giving rise to that agreement." Bunney Bros. Construction Company, 139 N.L.R.B. 1516, 1519 (1962). Reaching substantially the same result are NLRB v. Ben Pekin Corp., 452 F.2d 205, 206 (7th Cir. 1971); Randolph Division, Ethan Allen, Inc. v. NLRB, 513 F.2d 706, 708 (1st Cir. 1975); and NLRB v. Selwyn Shoe Mfg. Corp., 428 F.2d 217, 221 (8th Cir. 1970). Other courts have held that to be protected, a single individual's activity must have been undertaken with the purpose of inducing or preparing for group action, NLRB v. Northern Metal Co., 440 F.2d 881, 884–85 (3rd Cir. 1971); Mushroom Transport Co. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 383, 385 (3d Cir. 1964), or on behalf of a group of employees in a representative capacity. ARO, Inc. v. NLRB 596 F.2d 713, 718 (6th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Guernsey-Muskingum Electric Co-op, Inc., 285 F.2d 8, 12–13 (6th Cir. 1960). See Pelton Casteel, Inc. v. NLRB, 627 F.2d 23, 28, & n. 10 (7th Cir. 1980).

This court reviewed these interpretations of section 7 in Krispy Kreme Doughnut

Corp. v. NLRB, 635 F.2d 304(4th Cir. 1980). There we declined to enforce a Board order finding protected concerted activity in an individual employee's refusal to forego a workmen's compensation claim. We recognized in Krispy Kreme that individual action may constitute protected concerted activity when it is " 'intended to enlist the support and asssistance of other employees' * * *." at 308 (quoting Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. NLRB, 407F.2d 1357, 1365 (4th Cir. 1969)). But there was no evidence that the employee involved in Krispy Kreme had contemplated group activity. And because of the absence of a collective bargaining agreement, the Interboro rule—deeming protected an individual employee's efforts to enforce a collective bargaining agreement—was inapplicable.

Here, as was the case in Krispy Kreme, the record fails to reveal protected concerted activity under any standard. Jordan was neither attempting to enforce a collective bargaining agreement, seeking to induce group action, nor acting on behalf of a group. His altercation with foreman Lewis manifested a purely personal concern. Such personal missions are not deemed concerted activity under any test. Joanna Cotton Mills Co. v. NLRB, 176 F.2d 749, 753 (4th Cir. 1949). See NLRB v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., 481 F.2d 714. 717 (5th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Ben Pekin Corp., 452 F.2d 205, 206–07 (7th Cir. 1971).

Unlike the situation in Interboro, nothing in the evidence here suggests Jordan was seeking to implement the terms of the agreement between the Company and the union when he confronted Lewis. He made no reference to the collective bargaining agreement during the confrontation. Instead of seeking out a union representative or even his own supervisor, Jordan went directly to Lewis. The vague threat to "take some sort of action or steps necessary to get something done about it" does not evince reliance on any substantive rights guaranteed in the agreement. See NLRB v. C & I Air Conditioning, Inc., 486 F.2d 977 (9th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Ben Pekin Corp., 452 F.2d 205 (7th Cir. 1971).

However chivalric Jordan's actions, his purpose was personal and private; it was not to induce group activity. After thrusting himself upon the scene, Jordan disassociated himself from the incident and its principals. He told Lewis that any further action was "up to you and Sharon [Asher]" and that "if you never touch her, I won't have to come over to your area again." He took no part in Asher's grievance. In so quickly eschewing any representative role, Jordan revealed not concern for the welfare of workers generally, but rather the personal object of his brief intervention. We do not believe Jordan's actions can be deemed "concerted" for the purpose of section 7.

Considering the record as a whole, we conclude that the decision and order of the Board in this case are not supported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Enforcement of the decision and order of the Board is denied and the order is set aside.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED; ORDER SET ASIDE.

NLRB v. Datapoint Corporation

642 F.2d 123 (5th Cir.), April 8, 1981—246 NLRB 234

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before AINSWORTH, and SAM D. JOHNSON, Circuit Judges, and HUNTER,* District Judge

124

AINSWORTH, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board seeks enforcement of its order requiring Datapoint Corporation to reinstate former employee R. Bradley Clark with backpay and to restore all seniority rights lost as a result of his discharge. The Board, disagreeing with the conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge who heard the case, found that Clark was terminated for having engaged in concerted activities protected under Section 7 of the labor act, 29 U.S.C. § 157,[1] and thus held that Datapoint had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1),[2] 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 (1979). The company contends that the Administrative Law Judge correctly found that Clark had not been engaged in protected concerted activity, "but rather was discharged because of a series of temper displays indicating his inability to work with some of his fellow employees which culminated in an arrogant act of insubordination toward his immediate supervisor." Record on Appeal at 346. We agree that there was not substantial evidence to indicate that Clark was involved in concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 and therefore deny enforcement of the Board's order.

[1] Section 7 provides, in pertinent part, that "[e]mployees shall have the right * * * to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157.

[2] Section 8(a)(1) provides that "[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(1) to interfere with, restraint, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

The Facts

Datapoint Corporation, a manufacturer of computer systems, employs approximately 2300 workers at its San Antonio, Texas, plant. This case, however, involves only one of the approximately twenty-two production employees in the printing services department. On Friday, July 14, 1978, Mrs. Lois Jeane Davis, the manager of the department, met with the production employees and announced that the long-rumored move of the department to larger quarters was to take place during the first week of August. In addition to describing the new location and answering questions about the facilities, Davis informed the employees that all but three of the employees would either have to use vacation time or take the week off without pay while the department was relocated. Clark, the operator of a high-speed photocopying machine used to print urgently needed items, was among the three who would not be laid off during the week of the move. After the meeting with Davis, the employees returned to work but continued to discuss the move and the layoff. At this time, Clark told other employees that the layoff was illegal and contrary to company policy. Word filtered back to Davis that "Brad [Clark] was rather loudly proclaiming all over the Printing Production area that the action Mrs. Davis had taken was illegal * * *." (T. 94.)

Davis decided to discuss the matter with Clark the following Monday; since Clark was not at work on Monday, she met with him early Tuesday morning.[3] The accounts of that meeting vary considerably, but both the Administrative Law Judge and the Board found that the meeting included topics other than the layoff,[4] and that Clark raised his voice in the meeting. Although Clark flatly denied discussing the Tuesday meeting with any of the other employees, there was considerable testimony, and both the Board and the Administrative Law Judge found, that Clark "gave an account of the meeting to fellow employees," stating "that he had stood up to Davis and told her what he thought about the layoff." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 2. The uncontradicted testimony, again credited by the Board and the hearing judge, indicated that Davis was told "that Clark, using profanity, had loudly proclaimed for all to hear that he had told her off in no uncertain terms." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 2. Davis was told that Clark was "bragging" that he "cussed her out" at the meeting. That afternoon, Davis discussed Clark's behavior with James Simonsen, Datapoint's Vice President of Industrial Relations, and they jointly decided to terminate Clark as part of a "reduction in force" then in progress. (Tr. 91-94, 323-24, 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 2.) Clark was discharged the next day.

The NLRB Proceedings

Clark filed charges with the NLRB on July 20, 1978, alleging that Datapoint had violated Section 8(a)(1) by discharging him on account of concerted activities protected under Section 7. The NLRB Regional Director issued a complaint on September 1, and the matter was heard before an Administrative Law Judge on January 9 and 10, 1979. The judge heard over three hundred transcript pages of testimony from Clark, Davis, Simonsen and six other present or former Datapoint employees. After reviewing the testimony and the exhibits, and making the necessary credibility choices based on first-hand observation of the witnesses, the judge found that Clark had been discharged not because of any protected activity, and not merely because he believed the layoff was illegal or because he expressed that belief to other employees, but instead because he, "in a deprecating, insulting and insubordinate manner, had arrogantly told other employees how he had told Mrs. Davis off * * *." The Administrative Law Judge found that the incidents surrounding the relocation layoff were merely the culmination "of a series of temper displays indicating his inability to work with some of his fellow employees," and that he was discharged because of his overall poor attitude.

[3] Mrs. Davis held another meeting with the department employees on Monday, July 17, which Clark missed. While details of the relocation were discussed at that meeting, the layoff apparently was not discussed.

[4] Mrs. Davis testified, and the Administrative Law Judge found, that Clark complained about the failure of Buddy Sauls, his supervisor, to give him overtime work when he wanted it, and also criticized the overall performance of his supervisor, stating "that he, Bradley Clark, could run the print shop a lot better than Buddy Sauls."

A three-member panel of the Board disagreed with the judge's conclusions. The Board apparently accepted most of the Administrative Law Judge's credibility choices, for example finding, despite his denials, the Clark raised his voice during the July 18 meeting with Davis and that he told other employees "that he had stood up to Davis and told her what he thought about the layoff." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 2. Nevertheless, the Board, essentially giving credence to Clark's version of why he was discharged, discrediting the version given by Datapoint officials and credited by the Administrative Law Judge, found that Datapoint discharged Clark not for insubordination but because he "refus[ed] to accept [Davis's] explanation that the layoff was proper" and continued to make statements to fellow employees that the layoff was illegal. 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 5. Even though Clark acted alone, the Board specifically found that he was engaged in concerted activity:

> [A] conversation may constitute concerted activity although it involves only a speaker and a listener. Further, an individual's actions may be considered concerted in nature if they relate to conditions of employment that are matters of mutual concern to the affected employees * * *. Nor does the fact that Clark's fellow employees chose not to take any action disqualify Clark's statements from protection. Discussion among employees concerning working conditions is a necessary initial step in concerted activity and to deny protection to this type of discussion because of a lack of fruition would be to nullify the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 5-6 (footnotes omitted). The Board therefore ordered Datapoint to reinstate Clark with back pay and all lost seniority rights.

Were Clark's Statements Concerted Activities?

In proceedings to enforce an order of the National Labor Relations Board, we must defer to the Board if there is substantial evidence in the record to support its factual findings. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456(1951). However, in cases where the Board does not accept the findings of the Administrative Law Judge, our examination of the record and the Board's findings must be especially critical. Syncro Corp. v. NLRB, 597 F.2d 922, 924–25 (5th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, Inc. 576 F.2d 666, 674 (5th Cir. 1974). Particular scrutiny is appropriate where the Board disagrees with some of the credibility choices made by the judge who had the opportunity to see and question the witnesses himself. Cf. NLRB v. Brazos Elec. Power Co-op, Inc., 615 F.2d 1100, 1101–02 (5th Cir. 1980).

In this case, the difference between the Board and the Administrative Law Judge rests on both a credibility determination and a conclusion of law. The Board disagreed with the judge's determination of the underlying reasons for the termination of Clark (basically a credibility determination) and also disagreed with the judge's legal conclusion that the statements made by Clark constituted protected concerted activity. After throughly examining the record, we hold that there is not sufficient evidence to support the Board's conclusion that Clark was terminated "in an attempt to muzzle him regarding his statements to fellow employees about their working conditions * * *." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 6. We also hold, as a matter of law, that even if Clark was terminated for his statements about the layoff, the termination did not violate Section 8(a)(1) since the statements did not constitute protected concerted activity.

In support of its finding that Clark was not discharged because of insubordination the Board quoted extensively from the testimony of Mrs. Davis.[5] Although these excerpts do make Davis's motivation seem

[5] The Board cited the following testimony:

Upon examination by the General Counsel regarding Clark's contention that the layoff was improper, Davis testified as follows:

> Q: What did you do?
> A: I told him that it was not illegal, that I would not do anything knowingly that was illegal or immoral or hurtful to the corporation, or anything like that, and that I had checked it with Personnel, the Industrial Relations Department, and it was approved before I announced it to the employees.
> Q: And so, based on his challenging the legality of that decision, you determined to discharge him.

127

ambiguous, and may lend some support to the Board's conclusion that Clark was discharged because of his continuing assertion that the layoffs were illegal, upon reading the whole record we cannot agree that Davis's testimony supports the Board's position. Her testimony, taken as a whole, clearly indicates that she was upset with the rude and belligerent manner Clark displayed in the Tuesday meeting and that she was even more aggravated by the reports of Clark, using profanity, "loudly proclaiming for all to hear in the production area that he had told [her] off in no uncertain terms * * *." (Tr. 92, 290—91).

Davis reported the incident to James Simonsen, Vice President of Industrial Relations, and they jointly decided to discharge Clark. Simonsen testified about the reasons for the discharge:

> JUDGE RASBURY: I have a question. Mr. Simonsen, can you tell me why Brad Clark was terminated?
>
> THE WITNESS: Brad Clark was terminated as a result of, I think, a series of incidents over a period of his employment that made it, as far as an employee, he was not an acceptable employee.
>
> JUDGE RASBURY: Was the incident in connection with the moving of the Printing Shop sort of a culmination of a series of events, in your opinion?
>
> THE WITNESS: Well, that was the last incident. I say that that certainly had some bearing on it.
>
> JUDGE RASBURY: Would you classify this as insubordination or inability to get along with his fellow workers?

128

> THE WITNESS: I would say it was more in the area of insubordination and inability to work and be part of a productive work team.

(Tr. 331-332.) There is extensive testimony in the record, and several exhibits, relating to other incidents of the failure of Clark to cooperate and get along with his fellow employees. In light of all of the testimony of Davis and Clark, we cannot agree that the rather ambiguous testimony cited by the Board substantially supports its conclusion that Clark was discharged in an effort to "muzzle" his criticism of the layoffs.

Even if we assume, for the sake of argument, that Clark was terminated for the statements he made in regard to the layoffs, we hold that the statements did not constitute protected concerted activity. The Administrative Law Judge found that there could be no concerted activity absent at least the contemplation of group action:

> A: No, sir. No, sir.
> Q: Well, can I find out, please—
>
> A: You surely can, becasuse if—if he had accepted that and gone on to work, everything would have been fine because I had had previous incidents with Brad, we've had altercations with different people in the department, he has, that I have had to resolve.
> But he continued to say that it was illegal, and to say his before all the group. [Emphasis supplied.]

Upon questioning by the Administrative Law Judge, Davis further testified as follow:

> Judge Rasbury: Mrs. Davis, I would like for you to reflect very carefully on this question, but I want to know when did you first determine that Brad Clark should be terminated?
>
> The Witness: I determined it on Tuesday, July the 18th. I believe it was.
> Judge Rasbury: Now, was that following the meeting you had with Mr. Clark, or at what time?
>
> The Witness: It was that afternoon.
> Judge Rasbury: And what has caused you to make up your mind in the afternoon?
>
> The Witness: After I had learned from him that he still said the actions were illegal and that it was presenting a problem, then I made my call to Mr. Simonsen and talked it over with him, and I told him I felt like he should be terminated. And that's when he reminded me of the corporate reduction-in-force that was in effect.

Finally, Davis gave this account of her conversation with Simonsen.

> Q: Would you tell us what you said to Mr. Simonsen, please?
>
> A: I'll do my best to recall it, to the best of my knowledge. "Jim, this is Lois Jeanne. I have a great problem that I want to discuss with you and you can probably guess the nature of the person involved, because it's one I have discussed with you before. It's Bradley Clark.
> "He is insisting that we have taken an illegal action in asking our production people to take vacation, or time without pay, during the time the department was to make a move from one location to the other.
> "I had talked to Bradley that morning * * *. He was very belligerent in his discussions with me, very rude, and other adjectives of that type, and that the discussion became very heated because Bradley raised his voice. He began to challenge the supervison of Mr. Sauls; who is the supervisor of Printing Production, and intimated that he could run the Printing Services Department much better than Mr. Sauls, and could schedule things in a lot better manner."
> Q: Now, is that what you told Mr. Simonsen?
>
> A: Yes, in essence it is, yes.
>
> And that Bradley—well, I completed by telling him that Brad said that he still—that it was still illegal, and I told him that he had a right to his opinion, but that it was not illegal action; that I had, of course, discussed it with the Personnel officals before taking that action.

Record at 371-73.

> In order to be protected, group talk or activity must look toward some kind of group action. There is not one scintilla of evidence in this case to indicate that the employees of the printing services department of Datapoint desired, contemplated or even wished to take any kind of group action or have an individual represent them in their gripes regarding the one week's plant closure. In other words this was nothing more than the griping of a group of employees to the announcement of a change in working conditions, but hardly rises to the level of concerted activities.

Record at 345. In holding that Clark's actions did constitute concerted activity, the Board applied a standard which would, in effect, protect any actions "relate[d] to conditions of employment that are matters of mutual concern to the affected employees." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 39 at 6. The Board apparently believes that griping about working conditions is a necessary precursor to any concerted activity and therefore must itself be protected as concerted activity.

The Board's notion of concerted activity run contrary to the law of this circuit, however. In NLRB v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., 481 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1974), this court squarely faced the identical issue involved in the present case and held that, absent substantial evidence that the discharged employee "was seeking to instigate some form of group action," griping or complaning by a single employee does not constitute concerted activity. The court explicitly adopted that standard for determining concerted activity established by the Third Circuit in Mushroom Transportation Co. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 683, 685 (3d Cir. 1964):

> It is not questioned that a conversation may constitute a concerted activity although it involves only a speaker and a listener, but to qualify as such, it must appear at the very least that it was engaged in with the object of initiating or inducing or preparing for group action or that it had some relation to group action in the interest of the employees.
> This is not to say that preliminary discussions are disqualified as concerted activities merely because they have not resulted in organized action or in positive steps toward presenting demands. We recognize the validity of the argument that, inasmuch as almost any concerted activity for mutual aid and protection has to start with some kind of communication between individuals, it would come very near to nullifying the rights of organization and collective bargaining guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act if such communications are denied protection because of lack of fruition. However, that argument loses much of its force when it appears from the conversations themselves that no group action of any kind is intended, contemplated, or even referred to.
> Activity which consists of mere talk must, in order to be protected, be talk looking toward group action. If its only purpose is to advise an individual as to what he could or should do without involving fellow workers or union representation to protect or improve his own status or working position, it is an individual, not a concerted, activity, and, if it looks forward to no action at all, it is more than likely to be mere "griping."

The present case clearly fails to meet the Mushroom Transportation standard.

The Board, in its brief, argues that the precedential value of Buddies Supermarkets was weakened, if not eliminated, by this court's decision in Anchortank, Inc. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir. 1980). In dicta, that case implied that the Mushroom Transportation standard may have been discarded by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 95 S.Ct. 959, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975). However, the Anchortank court explicitly declined to decide whether Weingarten overruled the Mushroom Transportation standard, noting that the results in the two cases were consistent with each other. Anchortank, Inv. v. NLRB, supra, 618 F.2d at 1161 & n.10. Without a clearly contrary opinion of the Supreme Court or of this court sitting en banc, we cannot overrule a decision of a prior panel of this court, and we decline to hold that the dicta of Anchortank did so. Moreover, we would not overrule Buddies Supermarkets even if we could do so. The Board asks us to set too far-reaching a precedent, one by which virtually any action taken by a single employee in any way related to wages, hours or the terms and conditions of employment would be considered protected concerted activity. If Congress had intended Section 7 to be read so broadly, it certainly could have done so with much more definite language, and courts would have discovered that intent long ago.

Accordingly, enforcement of the order of the National Labor Relations Board is hereby DENIED.

NLRB v. E-Systems, Inc., ECI Division

642 F.2d 118 (5th Cir.), April 8, 1981—244 NLRB 231

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before GODBOLD, Chief Judge, TUTTLE and HILL, Circuit Judges

119

JAMES C. HILL Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) found that the ECI Division of E-Systems, Inc. (E-Systems) violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3) (1976), by refusing to place on a preferential rehire list and eventually discharging four economic strikes who had engaged, E-Systems believed, in strike misconduct. The NLRB ordered E-Systems to rescind its termination of the four strikers' recall rights, to offer immediate and full reemployment to those strikers who would have been recalled had their recall rights not been terminated, to pay their lost wages, and to post appropriate notice concerning this disposition of the dispute. E-Systems, Inc., ECI Division, 244 N.L.R.B. No. 36 (Aug. 15, 1979). E-Systems, seeking judicial review, has refused to obey the order. Thus the NLRB petitions for enforcement. We have decided to enforce the order insofar as it concerns two of the employees, but to deny enforcement insofar as it concerns the remaining two.

The Strike

The United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, (Union) represents the production and maintenance employees at E-Systems' St. Petersburg, Florida plant. The Union, seeking agreement on the terms of a new collective bargaining contract, called for a strike. There is evidence in the record indicating that the ambience at the plant during this economic strike, which began on February 7, 1978, was tense.[1] Over two months later, on April 11, accord was reached and the strike ended. A "settlement agreement" provided, inter alia, that the strikers be placed on a preferential rehire list. Four days earlier, however, E-Systems informed the Union that a number of striking employees would not be included on that list because, E-Systems maintained, those employees had engaged in strike misconduct. On April 13, E-Systems formally discharged them.

This appeal concerns four of the discharged strikers: John Ferguson, William Chapman, Edwina L. Russ, and Antoinette Rhoads. The administrative law judge (ALJ) found, and the NLRB agreed, that the discharge of these employees was a violation of the Act.

Judicial Review of the NLRB's Conclusions

Both statutory and case law circumscribe our factual review of the NLRB's conclusions: we are to determine only if those conclusions are supportd by substantial evidence on the record as a whole.[2] Thus, "[i]f the evidence before the Board is conflicting, and the Board's decision rests on credibility, then we are bound by the credibility choice." N.L.R.B. v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835 843 (5th Cir. 1978). The issue is not whether this court, confronted by the same evidence, would have come to different factual conclusions, but whether substantial evidence[3] supports the factual conclusions of the NLRB.

120

[1] During the administrative hearing concerning the allegations leading to this litigation, the administrative law judge (ALJ) properly narrowed the issue to whether the discharged employees had engaged in strike misconduct, not whether the strike itself was violent. Nevertheless, we think some consideration must be given to the context in which the events precipitating the discharges took place. See generally N.L.R.B. v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835 (5th Cir. 1978).

[2] "The findings of the Board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive" 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976). See Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

[3] "Substantial evidence is more than a mere scintilla. It means such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion." Consolidated Edison Co. v. N.L.R.B., 305 U.S. 197, 229, 59 S.Ct. 206, 216, 83 L.Ed. 126 (1938). However, this court is not > to determine the substantiality of evidence suporting a Labor Board decision merely on the basis of evidence which in and of itself justified it, without taking into account contradictory evidence or evidence from which conflicting inferences could be drawn * * *. The substantiality of evidence must take into account whatever in the record fairly de-

Continued

There is, however, a purpose to this appellate review. This court is not so constrained that we must uncritically accept the NLRB's order. As we have explained, "[i]f * * * The credibility choice is based on an inadequate reason or no reason at all, we are not compelled to respect it, and shall not do so. Obviously, if the order is based on an invalid legal reason it will not be enforced." Id. With this in mind, we turn to cases of the discharged strikers before us.

John Ferguson

Melvin Frank Brown, an E-Systems employee who did not participate in the strike,[4] testified that he saw John Ferguson "shooting a slingshot towards the main entrance of the plant" during the strike. Record, Vol. II, at 135. Brown reported the incident to a security guard. On the basis of the report, E-Systems discharged Ferguson.

The evidence in the record concerning the incident, however is conflicting. William J. Peterson, the personnel manager at the plant, testified somewhat vaguely that Brown reported "[s]omething to the effect that he [Brown] did observe him [Ferguson] attempting to load a slingshot." Id. at 80. Brown himself admitted that he could not state whether there was anything in the slingshot when Ferguson allegedly shot. Id. at 137. Ferguson, on the other hand, denied having or discharging a slingshot at the plant. Id. at 156–57.

The ALJ, finding Ferguson "a most truthful and forthright witness," concluded "that he did not engage in the act of strike misconduct of which he was accused * * *." See id., Vol. I, at 304 (Decision of the Administrative Law Judge). The ALJ accordingly concluded that E-Systems had violated the Act by discharging Ferguson. The NLRB adopted this conclusion and added that E-Systems had further violated the Act by not including Ferguson on a preferential rehire list.

These findings and conclusions are not based on inadequate reason and they are supported by substantial evidence. Thus we will not disturb them. We want to emphasize, however, that there is nothing in the record suggesting that E-Systems was not acting in good faith when it discharged Ferguson (or, not incidentally, any of the strikers before us). Substantial evidence, reading the record as a whole, does support the conclusion that Ferguson did not engage in strike misconduct, but there is also evidence supporting E-Systems' allegation that he did. Nevertheless, it is clear that an employer's good faith belief that he is acting lawfully is not a defense to an unfair labor practice charge:

> § 8(a)(1) is violated if an employee is discharged for misconduct arising out of a protected activity, despite the employer's good faith, when it is shown that the misconduct never occurred * * *. In sum, § 8(a)(1) is violated if it is shown that the discharged employee was at the time engaged in a protected activity, that the employer knew it was such, that the basis of the discharge was an alleged act of misconduct in the course of that activity and that the employee was not, in fact, guilty of that misconduct.

N.L.R.B. v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21, 23, 85 S.Ct. 171, 172, 13 L.Ed.2d 1 (1964) (citations omitted).[5]

Thus we enforce the order of the NLRB insofar as it concerns Ferguson.

William Chapman

Rocky Rothwell, another non-striking E-Systems employee,[6] reported that the side of his truck was scratched while he was passing through the picket line. Rothwell identified William Chapman as the picketing employee who scratched his truck; Rothwell testified that Chapman "stuck his umbrella in the right-rear quarter panel of my truck and scratched it." Record, Vol. II, at 142. Chapman did not deny that he had scratched Rothwell's truck.

> tracts from its weight. This is clearly the significance of the requirement * * * that courts consider the whole record.

[4] Brown was employed as a design engineer and as such was such was not included in the bargaining unit.

[5] We note the line of cases decided in this circuit in which it has been held that section 8(a)(1) or (3) is not violated when an employer discharges an employee for good cause, unless it is proved that the discharge was motivated by antiunion animus. See, e.g., Florida Steel Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 587 F.2d 735 (5th Cir. 1979); Firestone Tire & Rubber v. N.L.R.B., 449 F.2d 511 (5th Cir. 1971). These cases must be distinguished from the one before us. Althought E-Systems' discharge of Ferguson was in good faith, the ALJ properly found that there was not good cause for the discharge.

[6] Rothwell, like Brown, was neither covered by the collective bargaining contract nor employed in a managerial capacity.

Rather, he testified that if he did, he did so unintentionally. He explained that is was cold, raining and windy the day of the incident and that at the time Rothwell's truck passed by him his "umbrella turned inside out because of the wind. I lowered it and adjusted it * * * and the truck passed and I proceeded to picket." Id., Vol. III, at 204–05. Later Rothwell and Chapman appeared at a voluntary proceeding before a citizen's dispute settlement board. Chapman agreed to make restitution in the amount of $36.92; he testified he did so in order to keep his "involvement in the strike to a minimum." Id. at 206.

The ALJ concluded, and the NLRB agreed, that Chapman had misconducted himself during the strike, but that the misconduct was accidental in nature and thus not sufficiently serious to disqualify him for employment. See id., Vol. I, at 305–06 (Decision of the Administrative Law Judge). Although we are not comfortable with the ALJ's labeling of accidental conduct as misconduct, we do accept his legal appraisal of the incident and find that the conclusion that E-Systems did not have good cause to discharge Chapman is supported by substantial evidence. Thus, we enforce the order of the NLRB insofar as it concerns Chapman.

Edwina L. Russ

Peterson, the personnel manager, testified "[t]he basis of [Edwina L. Russ'] termination was destruction of property and tearing of an aerial off of a vendor's car as he was leaving the vicinity. This was reported to us by the vendor." Id., Vol. 11, at 61. Robert J. Braher, an employee of the vendor,[7] witnessed the incident. Braher was following the vendor in another car as both left the plant through the main gate. He saw a picket, whom he later identified as Russ, bend the aerial. The aerial was rendered unusable. Id., Vol III, at 183, 196.

Russ testified that, as the cars approached the gate, she and the other pickets stepped aside to allow passage. As they did so, according to her testimony, the "car speeded up * * * to get to the street, and as it did it brushed me and I * * * it hit me and as it hit me my hand reached up and I just happened to grab that antenna and I bent it." She explained that "[i]t was just a reflex, and I was angry, I guess, because he was trying to get out in a hurry and he did brush me as he went out." Id. 219–20. Criminal action based on this incident was later instituted against Russ. She pleaded nolo contendere to a criminal mischief charge, agreed to make restitution in the amount of $146 to the vendor, and was put on probation for three months. Id. at 224–25.

The ALJ concluded, and again the NLRB agreed, that Russ' behavior was reflexive and provoked, and thus not sufficiently serious to warrant her discharge. We agree insofar as substantial evidence indicates that Russ' behavior was impulsive, but we disagree that such impulsive, uncontrolled behavior is protected by the Act. Therefore we reject the ALJ's legal appraisal of the incident and do not enforce the order of the NLRB insofar as it concerns Russ. See NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 374 F.2d at 844 (Neida Morrow).

Antoinette Rhoads

Two incidents led to the discharge of Antoinette Rhoads. Evidence in the record indicates that she blocked passage of automobiles at the plant while picketing and that she hit another E-Systems employee who had abandoned the strike and was returning to work. Peterson, the personnel manager, testified that on March 7, 1978, he was informed that strikers at the plant's main gate were preventing automobiles from leaving the plant. He observed the incident, noting that one of the strikers was Rhoads, and called the police. The police spoke to the pickets and the blocked automobiles were driven out through the gate. Record, Vol. II, at 32–33. The driver of one of the blocked cars, an E-Systems employee named Deloras Lees, who had joined the strike initially but later opted to return to work, testified that her egress was prevented partly by the pickets and partly by a stalled car; she further testified that Rhoads was not in the picket line during the entire incident, but that Rhoads replaced one of the pickets who had initially blocked the cars. Id. at 99–100. The testimony of another driver buttresses this testimony. Id. at 120–21. Both drivers however, testified that Rhoads prevented their passage.

The following morning, pickets, again including Rhoads, prevented some cars from entering the plant. Peterson testified that when he came to work he noticed two cars one of which was driven by Lees, in the plant's main gate driveway. Rhoads again was not initially on the picket line, but she later joined it and blocked the passage of one car "by standing in front of it; [the pickets] were not walking, as pickets had been directed to walk." Id. at 35. The pickets directed other cars around the ones stopped in the driveway. Management personnel eventually escorted the drivers of the blocked cars into the plant. Id. at 37–39. Lees' testimony echoes Peterson's, id, at 100–102, as does that of another driver, id. at 121–23.

[7] Neither the vendor nor Braher was employed by E-Systems.

Rhoads herself testified that, while picketing the gates, she and other pickets "moved back and forth from one end of the driveway to the other" and that she did not stop "in front of [Lees'] car" but was "walking in front of [Lees'] car." Id. at 235–36. Rhoads admitted, however, that on the morning of March 8 she in fact stood in front of Lees' car, thus blocking its passage for some fifteen minutes. Id. at 239.

The second incident occurred the morning of March 8, while Lees was being escorted from her car and into the plant by a management employee. Lees testified that as she passed Rhoads, she "felt something hit me, and I winced and turned my head * * * . I saw [Rhoads'] hand coming down—her arm coming down." Id. at 103. Lees later felt some stiffness in her shoulder, so she reported to the plant nurse, who discovered a bruise. Rhoads testified that, at the time Lees passed her, she carried a piece of string in her hand and that she "threw [her] arm out and shook [her] hand and hollered 'Scab!' " Id. at 245. She further testified that she did not intend to hit Lees and, to the best of her knowledge did not do so. Id. Another picket's testimony concurs with Rhoads' description of the incident. Id. at 280. No one testified that he had in fact seen Rhoads strike Lees.[8]

The ALJ concluded "that the operative course of the Rhoads discharge was, solely, Respondent's belief that that employee had assaulted Lees." See id., Vol. I, at 307 (Decision of the Administrative Law Judge). Thus the ALJ discounted the car blocking incidents.[9] He did find that the evidence warranted the inference that Rhoads struck Lees and thus that Rhoads had engaged in strike misconduct. He concluded, however, that the incident was not so serious that it required a forfeiture of her reemployment. The NLRB agreed.

We agree that substantial evidence indicates that Rhoads engaged in strike misconduct. That evidence, however, indicates that Rhoads misconducted herself both by blocking the passage of employees going to and from work and by striking Lees. We will not condone such conduct. See Mosher Steel Co. v. N.L.R.B., 568 F.2d 436 (5th Cir. 1978). Enforcement of the order insofar as it concerns Rhoads is therefore denied.

Enforcement GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

[8] It is worth mentioning that E-Systems filmed much of the strike activity. We have not viewed the films, but they apparently reveal that Rhoads did have string in her hands and that she did throw her arm out toward Lees, they do not prove that Rhoads struck Lees.

[9] The NLRB, however, disagreed with the ALJ's conclusion that the traffic blocking incidents were not an operative cause of Rhoad's dismissal. "Nevertheless," the NLRB maintained, "even assuming without deciding that Rhoads engaged in such conduct, we do not believe that such conduct, whether considered alone or with Rhoads' other conduct described above, was sufficiently serious to deny her the protection of Sec. 8d(a)(3) of the Act." E-Systems, Inc., v. ECI Division, 244 NLRB No. 36, at 2, n.1.

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, ROSENN and SLOVITER, Circuit Judges

179

SEITZ, Chief Judge: North Cambria Fuel Company (NCF) petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) finding NCF guilty of violating section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by wrongfully discharging Hans Wuchina, a striking employee. Seven former NCF employees (the Baughman group) petition for review of that portion of the Board's order finding that they were lawfully discharged by NCF because they had engaged in serious strike misconduct. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order.

I.

NCF and United Mine Workers of America Local 1880 (the Union) were parties to the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of 1974. When that agreement expired on December 6, 1977, the Union engaged in an economic strike against NCF. The Union returned to work on March 26, 1978, when a new national agreement was reached with the Bituminous Coal Operators Association. NCF, which is not a member of the Association, refused to accept this agreement and continued negotiating with the Union. When an agreement could not be reached, the Union resumed its economic strike.

The strike was marred by violence and vandalism, and NCF obtained two state-court injunctions prohibiting the Union from maintaining more than four pickets at any NCF worksite and enjoining any Union intereference with the company's operations. On July 10, 1978, the day after a heated union meeting in which the Union's members were told to put on a "show of force," a group of union members, including Wuchina and the Baughman group, gathered near the entrance to NCF's I-22 coal-loading facility. When six coal trucks approached the facility the union members assembled at the entrance in an attempt to prevent the trucks from entering. The strikers shouted obscenities at the drivers, made obscene gestures, and picked up rocks.

Soon after the strikers blocked the entrance to the I-22 facility, the county sheriff arrived and ordered the strikers to disperse because they were violating a state-court injunction. The strikers moved across the highway and stayed there until after the sheriff left with four of the coal trucks. When the remaining two trucks attempted to leave, the lead truck was attacked by a group of strikers throwing rocks. Some of the rocks hit the truck breaking its windshield but not causing any injuries.

Following the incident at the I-22 facility, NCF filed contempt charges in state court. The court found the strikers, including Wuchina and the Baughman group, in contempt of court and ordered four strikers not involved in these appeals to pay for the damages to the truck. NCF also brought criminal charges against the strikers, charging them with riot, criminal trespass, and the propulsion of missiles into an occupied vehicle. The Baughman group entered guilty pleas to the reduced charge of disorderly conduct, and their fines were paid by the Union. Following entry of the pleas, NCF's attorney indicated that the guilty pleas could result in discharge because they were admissions of guilt with regard to the violence at I-22. The company subsequently discharged the Baughman-group employees because of their "criminal activity" at the coal-loading facility. Wuchina pleaded not guilty at his preliminary hearing and was bound over for trial. The day after his hearing Wuchina also was discharged by NCF because of his involvement in the incident at I-22. The charges against Wuchina were later dismissed for failure of the state to prosecute.

180

The discharged employees filed complaints against NCF with the Board. After a hearing, the administrative law judge (ALJ) concluded that NCF had violated section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging the employees because they had been engaged in protected strike activity. The Board agreed that Wuchina's discharge was wrongful, but it overturned the ALJ's finding that the Baughman group had not engaged in serious strike misconduct. The Board found that Wuchina left the I-22 facility when the sheriff ordered the strikers to disperse, but it concluded that the Baughman group had remained and was present during the rock-throwing incident.

II.

A. NCF Petition

NCF first argues that the record does not support the Board's finding that Wuchina left the I-22 facility after the sheriff ordered the strikers to disperse. We must, of course, uphold the Board's finding if it is "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f) (1976); see Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). NCF directs our attention to evidence indicating that Wuchina not only remained at the I-22 facility but also participated in the rock-throwing incident. Nevertheless, we find that the Board's finding is supported by substantial evidence on the record. For example, Wuchina's testimony that he left the loading facility when the sheriff arrived was corroborated by the testimony of two other strikers, and a third union member testified that he saw Wuchina at a local ice cream stand fifteen minutes after Wuchina testified that he left I–22 and twenty minutes before the other strikers began to arrive. In addition, Wuchina was the only striker who pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges, and NCF allowed Wuchina to return to work after he signed a statement that he had not been involved in the violence at the coal-loading facility. Although the evidence presented at the hearing was conflicting, our review of the record indicates that the evidence supporting the Board's finding is not "overborne by evidence calling for contrary inferences." NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 340 U.S. 498, 502, 71 S.Ct. 453, 455, 95 L.Ed. 479 (1951).

Moreover, the ALJ made specific credibility determinations to support her finding that Wuchina left the I–22 facility before the rock-throwing incident. The ALJ emphasized that Wuchina's testimony was persuasive because he had been more candid about the events of July 9 and 10 than the other union witnesses and had made various admissions concerning those events. These findings were adopted by the Board. NCF asks this court to overturn these credibility determinations because they are "based on an inadequate reason, or no reason at all." NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 843 (5th Cir. 1978). This court, however, will not disturb the credibility findings of an ALJ as long as the ALJ considers all relevant factors and sufficiently explains his or her resolutions. See NLRB v. W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 552 F.2d 519, 526 n. 14 (3d Cir. 1977). In this case, the ALJ fully explained her credibility findings, and these explanations show that she considered various factors relevant to credibility, such as demeanor, admissions, and self-interest.

NCF contends that even if Wuchina was not present at the I–22 facility during the rock-throwing incident, his actions before the sheriff's arrival constituted serious strike misconduct justifying termination of his employment. NCF disputes the ALJ's finding that Wuchina's only misconduct was crossing the road with the other strikers and congregating at the entrance to the loading facility in violation of the state-court injunction. Wuchina's testimony that he did not threaten or harass the truck drivers is "not believable" according to NCF. The ALJ, however, apparently credited Wuchina's testimony in this regard, and we hold that substantial record evidence supports this finding.

NCF argues, however, that even if Wuchina did not use obscenities or attempt to provoke or threaten the truck drivers, his discharge was lawful because he aided and abetted fellow strikers who engaged in such strike misconduct. Union members who actively cooperate with strikers engaged in serious misconduct are equally culpable. See, e.g., W. J. Ruscoe Co. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 725 (6th Cir. 1969); Oneita Knitting Mills, Inc. v. NLRB, 375 F.2d 385 (4th Cir. 1967); cf. NLRB v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp., 306 U.S. 240, 59 S.Ct. 490, 83 L.Ed. 373 (1939) (union members who delivered food and supplies to sitdown strikers occupying plant were aiders and abettors). However, even assuming that Wuchina's participation in the blocking of the facility's entrance is sufficient to show that he actively cooperated with the strikers who provoked and harassed the truck drivers before the sheriff's arrival, his discharge was not lawful unless the actions of those strikers amounted to serious strike misconduct. The ALJ found that these strikers shouted obscenities, used obscene gestures, picked up rocks, and attempted to provoke the truck drivers. NCF maintains that the caselaw demonstrates that these actions constitute serious misconduct because strikers have no right to intimidate nonstriking employees or to interfere with the employer's operations. The Board and the intervenors distinguish the cases relied on by NCF, arguing the they involved "substantially more egregious conduct" than that which occurred prior to the sheriff's arrival.

In Republic Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 107 F.2d 472 (3d Cir. 1939), modified on other grounds, 311 U.S. 7, 61 S.Ct. 77, 85 L.Ed. 6 (1940), this court stated that Congress must have contemplated that the protection of the National Labor Relations Act would extend to employees who commit minor acts of misconduct while exercising their right to strike. This court subsequently has found that the following do not constitute serious strike misconduct: a minor scuffle amounting at most to disorderly conduct, see NLRB v. Buitoni Food Corp. 298 F.2d 169 (3d Cir. 1962); abusive, vulgar and profane language, see McQuaide, 552 F.2d 519; and ambiguous threats, see id. The actions of the strikers before the sheriff's arrival fit within these cases. There was neither any violence nor any damages or injuries. Although the strikers used obscenities and attemped to provoke the truck drivers, these actions are not serious strike misconduct. In addition, interference with the employer's operations was slight and lasted only for a short time, and the strikers stopped blocking the entrance to the facility as soon as the sheriff arrived. The Board is entitled to deference in drawing the line between strike misconduct and protected activity. Therefore we uphold the Board's conclusion that the actions of the strikers before the sheriff's arrival did not constitute serious strike misconduct.

Finally, NCF argues that the Board abused its discretion by ordering it to pay twelve percent interest on back wages owed to Wuchina. NCF contends that this interest rate is improper because it bears no relation to the loss sustained by an employee who has not had the use of his money, does not reflect the cost of money to the average consumer, and exceeds the six percent legal rate of interest in Pennsylvania, which more closely approximates the interest rate paid on bank savings accounts. The Board, however, has broad discretion in fashioning remedies, and this discretion extends to the imposition of an interest rate. See Local 777, Democratic Union Organizing Committee, Seafarers International Union v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862, 891 n. 84 (D.C. Cir. 1978). The interest rate imposed by the Board reflects an employer's cost of borrowing. Therefore, it is rationally related to the Board's objective of discouraging employers from "borrowing" from employees instead of paying backpay awards promptly. Furthermore, the legal rate of interest in Pennsylvania has no bearing on what interest rate is appropriate to effectuate the goals of federal labor legislation. Thus, we hold that the Board did not abuse its discretion by imposing a twelve percent interest rate on the backpay award.

B. Baughman Group Petition

The seven employees in the Baughman group challenge the Board's finding that they engaged in serious strike misconduct justifying termination of their employment. They contend that their actions at the I-22 facility did not constitute serious strike misconduct as a matter of law. The Board's factual findings with respect to the Baughman group, which are not contested, are as follows: They went to the I-22 facility in response to the Union's call for a "show of force"; they participated in the initial blocking of the facility with approximately twenty other union members; one of them admitted picking up a rock and testified that "everybody else picked up a rock"; some of them shouted obscenities at the truck drivers; they did not leave I-22 after the sheriff ordered the strikers to disperse; they were in the group of fifteen strikers who remained across the road from the facility's entrance and attacked the coal truck with rocks after the sheriff left; they were held in contempt of the state-court injunction; and they pleaded guilty to disorderly conduct charges.

Unlike the activities at the I-22 facility before the sheriff's arrival, the rock-throwing attack rises to the level of serious strike misconduct. The strikers present engaged in violence that created a substantial risk of bodily injury and caused property damage. In addition, these strikers pleaded guilty to criminal charges stemming from this incident. We find that the actions of the strikers who remained after the sheriff's arrival would "reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act." McQuaide, 552 F.2d at 528.

The Baughman-group employees appear to rest their argument on the fact that the Board did not establish that they, as opposed to the other strikers, actually threw the rocks. However, as noted earlier, union members who actively cooperate with strikers engaged in serious strike misconduct are equally culpable. Active cooperation has been show here. The Baughman group constituted one-half of the strikers remaining after the sheriff ordered the union members to disperse, and they crossed the road with the other strikers as the remaining coal trucks attempted to leave. The Board found that at least twenty rocks thrown by this group of fifteen strikers hit the truck in a very short time. Moreover, the guilty pleas to the criminal charges also support a finding that the Baughman group participated in and supported the strike misconduct. Therefore, the Board did not err in concluding that the employees in the Baughman group has engaged in serious strike misconduct.

The Baughman group also contends that the Board erred in placing upon the General Counsel the burden of establishing that the strikers had not engaged in serious misconduct. In placing this burden upon the General Counsel, the Board cited its decision in Ohio Power Co., 215 NLRB No. 133 (1975). Ohio Power provides that if the employer shows that it reasonably held an honest belief that an employee engaged in serious strike misconduct, the General Counsel must show that such misconduct did not occur. The Baughman group argues that this procedural rule is improper because it "deprives employees of statutory rights without an affirmative showing of wrong-doing." The Baughman group apparently contends also that this rule in effect establishes a good faith defense for an employer and requires the General Counsel to rebut the employer's good faith.

The Board, however, did not require the General Counsel to rebut NCF's good faith belief, but only to bear the burden of proving that the strikers had not engaged in serious misconduct. It is settled that the burden of proving a violation of the National Labor Relations Act is on the General Counsel. See, e.g., Arthur L. Morgan Union, Local 3 v. NLRB, 463 F.2d 818, 819 n. 3 (D.C.Cir 1972); NLRB v. St. Louis Cordage Mills. 424 F.2d 976, 979 (8th Cir. 1970); cf. 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976) (Board must dismiss complaint unless it finds upon preponderance of evidence unfair labor practice has been committed). Because the General Counsel must establish the essential elements of an unfair labor practice, it is not incorrect to require that the General Counsel prove that employees have not engaged in serious strike misconduct justifying their discharge. As a result, the procedural rule imposed by the Board in this case does not conflict with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act or improperly deprive employees of protected rights. See Dallas General Drivers, Local 745 v. NLRB, 389 F.2d 553 (D.C. Cir. 1968); NLRB v. Plastic Applicators, Inc., 369 F.2d 495 (5th Cir. 1966).

The petitions for review of the order of the Board will be denied. The Board's cross-petition for enforcement of its order will be granted.

Pedro's Inc., d/b/a Pedro's Restaurant v. NLRB

652 F.2d 1005 (D.C. Cir.), April 13, 1981—246 NLRB 567

On petition to review Board Order

1006

Before McGowan, Chief Judge, and Robinson and Edwards, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the court filed by Circuit Judge Harry T. Edwards

Harry T. Edwards, Circuit Judge: Pedro's, Inc. (the "company") here seeks review of a decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or the "Board").[1] The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order. For reasons set forth below, we hold that only certain of the Board's unfair labor practice findings are entitled to enforcement, and remand this case to the Board for further proceedings.

I. BACKGROUND

Pedro's is a restaurant and bar located in Los Gatos, California. On about January 18, 1978, an employee of the restaurant contacted the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 19, to discuss the possibility of organizing Pedro's employees. ALJ 3.[2] The union held a number of employee meetings, and several employees signed cards authorizing the union to serve as the exclusive bargaining representive of Pedro's employees. On February 2, 1978, a union representative hand-delivered to the company a letter stating that the union had obtained authorization cards from a majority of Pedro's employees. ALJ 4. On February 17, after company management had responded that they had a good faith doubt that the union represented an uncoerced majority of the employees, the union filed a petition for an election with the NLRB. An election was held on April 21, 1978, and the union was defeated by a vote of 56 to 36. ALJ 1.

The union challenged the results of the election, and filed unfair labor practice charges against the company. After a hearing, the Board found that Pedro's had committed several violations of Section 8(a)(1)[3] of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA" or the "Act")[4] during the course of the union campaign. ALJ 4–17. In addition, the Board ruled that this unlawful conduct undermined the union's majority and rendered doubtful or impossible the holding of a free and fair second election. ALJ 22-32. As a result, and pursuant to standards announced in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Board ordered the company to bargain collectively with the union. Pedro's challenges the unfair labor practice determinations made by the Board, and the issuance of a bargaining order in this case.

II. THE SECTION 8(a)(1) VIOLATIONS

1. Introduction

With two important exceptions set forth below, we hold that substantial evidence exists to support the findings of the Board that the company committed several violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act during the union campaign.[5] Although each of these findings is vigorously contested by the company, it is firmly established that findings of the Board are entitled to judicial enforcement if supported by substantial evidence. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 546, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

We are unable to find substantial evidence, however, to support a finding of the Board that the company violated Section 8(a)(1) by implementing a health insurance plan for its employees during the union organizational drive. Proper resolution of this issue requires a detailed review of the facts surrounding the implementation of the plan.

2. The Facts Relating to the Establishment of the Health Insurance Plan

The subjects of health insurance coverage for employees of the restaurant first arose in either late 1975 or at some unspecified time in 1976. ALJ 7. Employees were told on this first occasion that the restaurant was not in a suitable financial position to provide insurance. Id. However, on April 23, 1977, the subject again arose during an employee meeting, and Peter S. Ramirez, president and co-owner of the company, told employees that the company was in a position to begin to collect bids from insurance companies. ALJ 8. Ramirez stated that he thought coverage could be secured by the end of the year. No date was mentioned, however, as to when such a plan would go into effect. Id.

Although the company contends that several insurance companies were contacted unsuccessful after the April 23 meeting, the only documentary evidence to support this contention is a letter dated November 18, 1977, indicating that State Farm Insurance had been requested to submit a bid. ALJ 8. In mid-December 1977, however, Harold Hobson, an experienced insurance broker, was introduced to company management and agreed to solicit additional bids. Id. Hobson contacted the Prudential Life Insurance Company. Another broker, Jack Montgomery, also solicited bids from three additional underwriters. Id. During January, 1978, several meetings were conducted between company officials and representatives of the insurance companies. ALJ 8; A. 99, 263.[6] On February 1, 1978, Prudential submitted a formal, written proposal. ALJ 8. The company compared this proposal with the others subsequently received from other underwriters, and, on March 6, 1978, Pedro's executed an application with Prudential and tendered the initial premium that commenced coverage of the plan. ALJ 10.[7]

---

[3] Section 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees" in the exercise of rights protected by the Act.

[4] 29 U.S.C. §§ 151–69 (1976 & Supp. III 1979).

[5] These findings are described at length in the opinion of the Administrative Law Judge. See ALJ 4–17. In particular, the Board found that the company had violated the Act by coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities; threatening an employee with discharge because of his union activities; soliciting grievances from employees in order to discourage them from supporting the union; promulgating a no-solicitation/no-distribution rule in order to discourage employees from engaging in union activities; and promising, announcing and granting benefits in order to induce employees to reject the union.

[6] "A." refers to the Appendix submitted in this case.

In mid-March, Ramirez held a meeting with the employees and informed them that they had been insured for a week. ALJ 7. He introduced Hobson and a representative from Prudential, who in turn explained the new health insurance coverage and gave the employees forms to fill out. No reference to the union was made at this meeting. Id.

3. The Legality of the Grant of Insurance Benefits

It is firmly established that an employer may not grant benefits to employees during an organizational drive in an attempt to influence the outcome of a pending election. In NLRB. v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 84 S.Ct. 457, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964), the Supreme Court held:

> We have no doubt that [Section 8(a)(1)] prohibits not only intrusive threats and promises but also conduct immediately favorable to employees which is undertaken with the express purpose of impinging upon their freedom of choice for or against unionization and is reasonably calculated to have that effect.

375 U.S. at 409, 84 S.Ct. at 459. However, a benefit granted in the normal course of the business of an employer, without any motive of inducing employees to vote against the union, does not violate the Act. NLRB v. Tommy's Spanish Foods, Inc., 463 F.2d 116 (9th Cir. 1972); Jervis Corp., Bolivar Division v. NLRB, 387 F.2d 107 (6th Cir. 1967).[8] The question presented, therefore, is whether the disputed insurance benefit was granted in the normal course of business by the employer, or outside the normal course of business in an attempt to influence the outcome of the election. In Free-Flow Packaging Corp. v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1124, 1130 (9th Cir. 1978), the court stated that "[t]he question quite simply is whether the employer in good faith sought to comply with the requirements of law."[9]

In the present case, the Board acknowledged that preparations for the implementation of a health insurance plan had begun well in advance of the union organizational drive. The ALJ concluded that the company "had commenced serious attempts to secure health insurance coverage prior to the commencement of the union organizational campaign." ALJ 15. The Board here contends, however, that Pedro's "accelerated" its efforts to locate and implement a plan upon learning of the union activities of its employees.

In reviewing the record in this case, we are unable to find any evidence that the company accelerated its efforts to implement a health insurance plan because of the union's organizational drive. The company had initially announced the possibility of an insurance plan in April of 1977. At least one insurer was contacted between April and November, 1977. Then, in December 1977, well before the union campaign began, the company secured the services of an experienced insurance broker. From the moment that Hobson entered the picture, substantial progress was made in obtaining bids and securing a plan. In addition, there was nothing unusual about the amount of time that it took Hobson to secure an insurance plan for the company, and the plan was implemented within a time frame that was consistent with industry practice. ALJ 10. In short, the Board has produced no evidence that the health insurance plan was implemented outside the normal course of business, in an attempt to induce employees to vote against the union.[10] [7] Hobson testified that, according to his experience with restaurants the size of Pedro's, a minimum of two months is required to execute a formal application for insurance coverage from the time that he is initially contracted to solicit bids. ALJ 10. We note that the insurance plan in this case was implemented approximately two months after Hobson began soliciting bids for the company.

---

[8] Indeed, it is unlawful for an employer to withhold a benefit during a union campaign that is customarily granted to employees. In May Department Stores Co., 174 N.L.R.B. 770 (1969), the Board held that "an employer confronted with a union organizing campaign should decide the question of granting or withholding benefits as he would if a union were not in the picture; if his course of action in granting or withholding benefits is prompted by the Union's presence, he violates the Act." Courts have recognized the "dilemma" facing an employer considering a grant of benefits during a union campaign, for "to hold that in judging employer motive one must hypothesize a case where no union is watchfully present is to ask the employer to behave in an extraordinarily disinterested fashion and to ignore a company problem that management simply cannot be expected to ignore." Free-Flow Packaging Corp. v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1124, 1130 (9th Cir. 1978).

[9] A violation of the Act may also be found where benefits, although granted for business reasons, are announced "right before an election and sprung on the employees in a manner calculated to influence the employees' choice." NLRB v. Styletek, Division of Pandel-Bradford, Inc., 520 F.2d 275, 280 (1st Cir. 1975), See also J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 461 F.2d 490, 492 (4th Cir. 1972). Thus, both the granting of the benefit and the timing of the grant must occur in the normal course of business.

We are aware that certain courts have imposed a heavy burden on an employer to justify a grant of benefits during a union election campaign.[11] In this case, the company presented evidence that it was the introduction of insurance broker Hobson, and not the union organizational drive, that advanced the implementation of the health insurance plan. The Board has found nothing to rebut this evidence. Thus, to the extent that the company had a burden to justify the implementation of the health insurance plan is a case of this sort,[12] that burden has been met.

In NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 410, 84 S.Ct. 457, 460, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964), the Supreme Court stated that "[o]ther unlawful conduct may often be an indication of the motive behind a grant of benefits while an election is pending, and to that extent it is relevant to the legality of the grant." Thus, if uncertainly exists as to employer motive, an improper motive may be inferred from the presence of unlawful conduct with respect to other events. In the present case, however, the company produced ample evidence that preparations for the implementation of a health insurance plan were begun well in advance of the union campaign, and that a plan was implemented in the normal course of business when negotiations were completed.

The Board has found nothing to rebut this evidence. Therefore, we do not believe that an inference of improper motive may be drawn from the fact that the employer has been found guilty of unfair labor practices relating to incidents that arose after the union campaign had commenced and that had nothing whatsoever to do with the insurance plan.

Our ruling here is consistent with the Board's own recent decision in American Sunroof Corp., 248 N.L.R.B. 748 (1980). In American Sunroof, the company considered implementing a new pension plan for its employees for over two years. After a union organizational drive began at one plant, the company agreed on a final plan. Although this plan was announced to employees one day before a scheduled election, the Board found no violation of the Act. As stated by the Board:

> In sum, whatever dividend Respondent received from the announcement of the pension plan, it is clear that Respondent granted this benefit for reasons unrelated to the union activity and that it lawfully announced this benefit when, in the normal course of business, the plan was finalized.

Similarly, it is clear on the record before us that Pedro's implemented a health insurance plan for reasons unrelated to the union activity, and that it lawfully announced this benefit when, in the normal course of business, the plan was finalized. The Board simply has failed to present sufficient evidence that the company accelerated its efforts to implement a health insurance plan as a result of the union campaign. As a result, we decline to enforce the finding of the Board that the implementation of the plan violated Section 8(a)(1).[14]

---

[10] Nor is there any evidence that the timing of the announcement that health insurance coverage had been secured was intended to influence the employees' choice. Employees were informed of the coverage one week after the plan was implemented, and well over a month before the April 23 election. In NLRB v. Styletek, Division of Pandel-Bradford, Inc., 520 F.2d 275, 281 (1st Cir. 1975), the court noted that "[i]t is obvious that the closer a wage benefit comes to the day of the election, the harder it will be for the union to answer, and the greater the danger that the benefit will be manipulated to sway the election."

[11] For instance, the First Circuit has stated:

> We think when an employer, without having some fairly rudimentary factual explanation for the timing, anounces benefits after the petition for election is filed and two weeks before a representation election, it must take the chance that the Board will ascribe to it improper motives.

NLRB v. Styletek, Division of Pandel-Bradford, Inc., 520 F.2d 275, 282 (1st Cir. 1975).

The burden of proving unlawful employer motivation in granting a benefit is of course on the Board. Jervis Corp., Bolivar Division v. NLRB, 387 F.2d 107, 113 n.4 (6th Cir. 1967). The implementation of a benefit before a scheduled election, however, without a showing of business justification, has itself been deemed evidence of improper motive. J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 461 F.2d 490, 493 (4th Cir. 1972). In Free-Flow Packaging Corp. v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1124, 1129 (9th Cir. 1978), the court held that this rebuttable inference of anti-union motive could not be drawn in cases in which an employer is placed in a "dilemma" as to whether to grant the benefit because a withholding of the benefit could be found to violate the Act. See note 6, supra.

[12] See note 11, supra.

[13] Although the pension plan in American Sunroof was implemented on a companywide basis while the union organizational activity was limited to one plant, we do not believe that the case is distinguishable on that basis. No showing is apparent in American Sunroof that the timing of the announcement, one day before a scheduled election at one plant, was not chosen to affect the outcome of the election at that plant. Cf. NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 675 (1st Cir. 1979) (Section 8(a)(1) violation found in announcement of corporatewide benefit during union campaign at one plant, since no showing made that timing of the announcement had not been chosen to affect the outcome of that campaign.).

III. THE BARGAINING ORDER

The Board concluded in this case that the Section 8(a)(1) violations committed by company undermined the union's majority and prevented the Board from holding a fair rerun election. ALJ 22–23. As a result, the Board ordered the company to recognize and bargain collectively with the union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the company's employees. Pedro's challenges the issuance of a bargining order in this case.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 610–16, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1938–1941, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court made it clear that the Board may issue bargaining orders in (1) "exceptional" cases marked by "outrageous" and "pervasive" unfair labor practices, 395 U.S. at 613, 89 S.Ct. at 1939, and in (2) "less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have a tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes." Id. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940.[15] With respect to this first category of cases, the Court left open the possibility that a bargaining order could issue without need of inquiry into the union's majority status. However, with respect to the second category of cases, the Court held that a showing must be made that the union once held a majority status and that > the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order.

Id. The Supreme Court cautioned that the election process remains the preferred and most satisfactory method of ascertaining wheter a union has majority support, id. at 602–03, 89 S.Ct. at 1934, and emphasized that > under the Board's remedial power there is still a third category of minor or less extensive unfair labor practices, which, because of their minimal impact on the election machinery, will not sustain a bargaining order.

Id. at 615, 89 S.Ct. at 1940.

Relying on these standards in Gissel, courts have refused to enforce bargaining orders issued by the Board where substantial evidence did not exist that unfair labor practices were serious enough, or pervasive enough, to have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process. Rapid Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 144, 150 (3d Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d 110, 120 (1st Cir. 1978). In NLRB v. Ship Shape Maintenance Co., 474 F.2d 434 (D.C. Cir. 1972), this court recognized that even though an unfair labor practice may justify setting aside the results of a Board conducted certification election, this > does not mean that the effects of [an] unfair labor practice were sufficently pervasive and lingering to warrant a determination that a subsequent election could not be held which would be reasonable free from the adverse influence of the Company's unlawful action.

474 F.2d at 442. See also Peoples Gas System, Inc. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 35 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

In the present case, the Board appeared to base the bargaining order largely on its belief that the implementation of the health insurance plan violated Section 8(a)(1). See ALJ 31. The Board found that Pedro's actions concerning the health insurance plan "would reasonably tend to encourage a belief on the part of the employees that the health insurance plan was instituted in specific redress of their grievances, thereby exerting a strong and lingering coercive effect on the employees' freedom of choice." Id. The Board argues in this court that Pedro's "conduct in soliciting employee grievances, promising that the most commonly expressed problems would be remedied, and granting benefits to employees is of particular significance in assessing the propriety of the Board's bargaining order in the instant case, since these these types of unfair labor practices are an especially effective means of destroying employee support for unionization and are likely to have longlasting effects." Brief for NLRB at 46.

[14] Similarly, we decline to enforce a finding of the Board that the company violated § 8(a)(1) in informing employees at a January 26 employee meeting of progress made in securing health insurance coverage. As held in NLRB v. Tommy's Spanish Foods, Inc., 463 F.2d 116 (9th Cir. 1972), an employer has the right to notify employees of efforts to improve employment conditions and benefits that were in progress before a union campaign commenced.

With these two exceptions, we enforce the § 8(a)(1) violations found by the Board, described in detail by the Administrative Law Judge. See ALJ 4–17.

[15] It is in this second category that the present case falls. As the Board concluded, Pedro's conduct "undermined the Union's majority and rendered doubtful or impossible the holding of a free and fair second election." ALJ 31.

We have held that the Board's finding that the implementation of the health insurance plan violated Section 8(a)(1) is not supported by substantial evidence and may not be enforced. As indicated above, the Board appeared to rely heavily on this violation to sustain the issuance of a bargaining order. Thus, absent a finding that the implementation of the health insurance plan violated the Act, a significant question is presented whether the remaining unfair labor practices in this case are serious enough, or pervasive enough, to have the tendency to undermine majority strength and prevent the holding of a fair rerun election.

We believe that it proper, however, to remand this case to the Board for a determination of whether a bargaining order remains appropriate in this case. In Gissel, the Supreme Court stated that it is for the Board, and not the courts, to determine the appropriateness of a bargaining order, "based on its expert estimate as to the effects on the election process of unfair labor practices of varying intensity." 395 U.S. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32.[16] Therefore, we express no opinion here on whether a bargaining order may issue on the facts of this case, and leave that question to the Board to determine in the first instance.[17]

In considering whether a bargaining order may issue, absent a finding that the implementation of the health insurance plan violated the Act, we emphasize that the Board must also consider the conditions in the bargaining unit at the time it renders its decision on remand. Peoples Gas System, Inc. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 35, 48 (D.C. Cir. 1980) ("[T]he Board should formulate its remedy in light of the violation with which it is faced and the conditions in the bargaining unit at the time it renders its decision.") (emphasis in original). As stated by this court in Peoples Gas, "[w]e think it clear that no responsible decision-making body can formulate a reasonable remedy without taking into account conditions at the time its order is entered." 629 F.2d at 45 n.18.

The order of the Board is enforced in part. The case is remanded to the Board for further proceedings.

SO ORDERED.

E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Company v. NLRB

International Union, United Automobile Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, (UAW), Local 1020

650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir.), April 13, 1981; rehearing denied June 25, 1981; certiorari denied 455 U.S. 939—246 NLRB 1143

On petitions to review Board order

Before ADAMS and SLOVITER, Circuit Judges, and BROTMAN, District Judge*

464

I.

SLOVITER, Circuit Judge: This matter is before us on cross-petitions for review filed by the Union and employer and the NLRB's cross-application for enforcement. It arises from the employer's action in terminating payment of sickness and accident (hereafter "S and A") benefits to disabled employees during a strike by the bargaining unit of which they were members. The National Labor Relations Board found that the employer's action constituted an unfair labor practice and ordered that the employer make such retroactive payments to each employee disabled as of the beginning of the strike for the period until that employee actively participated in strike activity or showed public support for the strike. We find substantial evidence in the record to support the finding of the Board that the employer committed an unfair labor practice in terminating S and A benefits to employees when the strike began.

465

---

[16] See also NLRB v. Ship Shape Maintenance Co., 474 F.2d 434, 442 n.23 (D.C. Cir. 1972) ("[I]t is generally for the Labor Board, and not the reviewing courts, to make the determination of whether the circumstances of a particular case warrant issuance of a remedial bargaining order.")

[17] All other aspects of the Board's remedial order are entitled to enforcement.

*Hon. Stanley S. Brotman, United States District Court Judge for the District of New Jersey, sitting by designation.

We cannot, however, approve the Board's order insofar as it permits payments to be halted to disabled employees on the basis of public support of the strike, and to that extent grant review and modify the Board's order.

II.

On October 31, 1977 the collective bargaining agreement between Local 1020 of the UAW (the Union) and the E. L. Wiegand Division, Emerson Electric Company ("the employer" or Wiegand) expired. As of that date, 23 of the unit's approximately 1100 employees were receiving S and A payments from the employer under a plan established by the 1971–1974 and the 1974–1977 collective bargaining agreements.[1] The plan provided for payments by the employer to disabled hourly employees of sixty percent of the employee's average weekly wages for up to thirty-nine weeks of disability, the length of time of such payments dependent on seniority. "Disability" was defined by reference to a written benefits policy as meaning that the employee is "prevented, solely because of injury or disease from engaging in his regular or customary occupation and is performing no work of any kind for compensation * * *."

Negotiations begun in the fall of 1977 were unsuccessful, and the Union called a strike to commence on November 1. During a negotiation session on the afternoon of October 31, the Union requested that the employer continue to pay premiums for hospitalization, insurance and major medical on behalf of striking Union members, with the understanding that the Union would reimburse the employer for those premiums. That evening, in the final bargaining session, the employer proposed that it pay and be reimbursed for these premiums and for continued S and A payments to employees then on sick leave. The S and A payments had not previously been raised in the negotiations. The Union asserted that employees on sick leave were not participants in a strike and that the employer had a legal obligation to continue making such payments. The employer responded that S and A payments would be halted "if [the Union] went out on strike."

On November 1, 1980 the Union went out on strike and the employer immediately halted all disability payments. The strike was 100% effective. During the strike's four month duration, the circumstances with respect to the 23 disabled employees varied. Several of the disabled employees contacted the employer to inform it that they were still disabled and not participating in the strike. Seven of the disabled employees sent medical certification to the employer that they were recovered and able to return to work. At least one of those employees obtained certification of his ability to return to work and later was seen on the picket line. Other employees who were disabled as of October 31, 1977 but able to work at the conclusion of the strike were identified as on the picket line or otherwise engaged in strike activity.[2] At least one employee was in the hospital before the strike began and remained there for a substantial time after the strike ended.

After the disabled employees were without S and A payments for six weeks, the Union modified its policy not to pay strike assistance to employees on sick leave. It announced that it would extend strike assistance to them to alleviate the hardship caused by the employer's action in terminating benefits, contingent on reimbursement by the employees from any later Board award against Wiegand. The Union then filed charges with the Board, and the General Counsel of the Board filed the complaint which led to these proceedings.

The strike continued until February 28, 1978. As part of the strike settlement, the parties agreed that "all pending grievances, charges, civil and/or criminal proceedings arising out of or in relation to actions taken or occurring during the strike * * * shall be withdrawn with prejudice or the parties shall cause them to be so withdrawn." When the strikers returned to work, the employer resumed payment of S and A benefits to those employees who were still disabled.

The administrative law judge concluded that the employer committed an unfair labor practice within the meaning of sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by withholding payment of S and A benefits from disabled employees. The administrative law judge reasoned that these disabled employees were not in a position to choose to withhold labor on the day the strike began; only when they were again able to work did they have the choice and could they become strikers. Each disabled employee was therefore entitled to S and A payments from the date on which the strike began to the date on which he or she was well enough to return to work. The administrative law judge also refused to dismiss the complaint notwithstanding the provision in the strike settlement agreement stipulating that all grievances, charges, and proceedings would be withdrawn. He relied on section 10(a) of the Act and cases interpreting it which held that the parties cannot divest the Board of jurisdiction over unfair labor practices by private agreements.

[1] The Board and the parties refer to 23 employees receiving Sickness and Accident (S and A) benefits. The ALJ referred to 22 employees. The exact number can be determined at the compliance proceedings.

[2] On the record before us we cannot determine which of such participants in the strike were still medically disabled at the time of their strike activity. The parties in these cross-petitions are agreed that such employees will be identified in the compliance phase of these proceedings.

The Board affirmed the rulings, findings and conclusions of the administrative law judge and adopted his recommendations except with regard to the remedy ordered. The Board stated that, "For all practical purposes, any employee, disabled or sound, who affirmatively demonstrates his support of the strike by picketing or otherwise showing public support for the strike, has enmeshed himself in the ongoing strike activity to such an extent as to terminate his right to continued disability benefits." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 162, slip op. at 4, 103 L.R.R.M. 1073, 1074, [1979-80] N.L.R.B. Dec. (CCH) ¶16,619 at 31,033 (1979). Therefore, the Board determined that payments should end either on the date on which an employee was well enough to work, or when the employee had actively participated in strike activity or shown public support for the strike, whichever was earlier.

The employer petitions for review and contends that the Board erred in refusing to dismiss the complaint, that the Board lacked substantial evidence for its finding of an unfair labor practice, and that it abused its discretion in overruling a prior decision with retroactive effect. The Union petitions for review on the ground that the Board improperly declined to order payments for the periods after employees showed public support for the strike but before they were well enough to work. The Board requests enforcement.

III.

As an initial matter we must consider whether the Board properly denied the employer's motion to dismiss the unfair labor practice charges on the basis of the strike settlement agreement in which the Union agreed to the withdrawal of all charges relating to the strike. Assuing arguendo that the employer correctly construes the agreement, its operation is subject to section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations

467

Act which provides that the Board's power to remedy unfair labor practices shall not be affected "by any other means of adjustment * * * that has been or may be established by agreement, law, or otherwise * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 160(a) (1976).

By well established principle, private contracts may not be used to legitimate unfair labor practices nor to divest the Board of jurisdiction over such practices. NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421, 87 S.Ct. 559, 17 L.Ed.2d 486 (1967); J. I. Case Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 332, 64 S.Ct. 576, 88 L.Ed. 762 (1944). In J. I. Case Co., the Supreme Court affirmed that the Board acts as a public body charged in the public interest with the duty of preventing unfair labor practices, and stated, "[w]herever private contracts conflict with its functions, they obviously must yield or the Act would be reduced to a futility." Id. at 337, 64 S.Ct. at 580. In International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, Local 613 v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 723 (3d Cir. 1964), this court rejected the company's argument that a term in its post-strike collective bargaining agreement restricted the Board's power to enter prospective relief only and divested it of power to enter an order of reinstatement with back pay. We held that the power of reinstatement with back pay was exercised in vindication of the public policy encompassed by the Act, and thus "the rights of discriminatorily discharged employees under the statute are not subject to private adjustment. Such an adjustment, if made, cannot bar the Board's exercise of its statutory authority." Id. at 727. See also Lodge 743, International Association of Machinists v. United Aircraft Corp., 337 F.2d 5, 8-9 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 380 U.S. 908, 85 S.Ct. 893, 13 L.Ed.2d 797 (1965).

The policy reflected in the precedent and expressed in section 10(a) prevents a party from engaging in unfair labor practices that may coerce a favorable labor agreement and then insulating itself from Board sanctions by exculpatory provisions in that agreement. The Board properly refused to dismiss the complaint and proceeded to the merits, as we also do.

IV.

The first issue on the merits of this appeal is whether substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that the employer, Wiegand, committed an unfair labor practice. The Board's conclusion that an unfair labor practice occurred is based on two findings. First, it found that the disability payments were accrued benefits rather than current wages. Second, it found that these benefits were cut off by Wiegand with the intention of coercing and restraining protected union activity with respect to the strike through the imposition of a sanction against certain employees if other employees engaged in strike activity.

The parties agree that these findings, if correct, would support a conclusion that an unfair labor practice was committed. The Supreme Court held in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967), that a refusal to pay accrued vacation benefits to those participating in an economic strike was an unfair labor practice, even absent proof of an improper motivation by the employer. The Court found two principles controlling:

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives > since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.

Id. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1798 (emphasis in original).

The Supreme Court had held earlier in NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963), that the Board might properly infer the existence of discriminatory motivation or improper intent without evidence of illegal subjective intent. Where the employer has engaged in conduct that is "inherently discriminatory or destructive" by its very nature, the employer must be held to intend the consequences which foreseeably and inescapably flow from it. Id. at 228, 83 S.Ct. at 1145. The employer may offer evidence of proper motivation, but it must prove a business purpose of overriding significance. Id. at 231, 83 S.Ct. at 1147. In Erie Resistor, the Court found that a grant of additional seniority (super-seniority) to employees working through a strike could not be justified as necessary to continued operation during the strike.

Although acknowledging these legal principles, the employer argues that the S and A benefits at issue here are wages rather than accrued benefits, and that the record cannot support a conclusion of antiunion motivation. Our standard of review is whether the Board's findings are supported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). As the Court has frequently noted, the Board has been delegated the function of balancing the conflicting interests of employer and employees, subject to limited judicial review. NLRB v. Erie Resistor, Corp., supra, 373 U.S. at 236, 83 S.Ct. at 1149.

A.

The relevant precedents establish the posts between which this issue falls. On one side, as the employer argues, it is not required to finance a strike against itself by paying wages or other similar expenses. General Electric Co., 80 N.L.R.B. 510 (1948) (wages); Towne Chevrolet, 230 N.L.R.B. 479 (1977) (insurance policy premiums); Ace Tank and Heater Co., 167 N.L.R.B. 663 (1967) (medical insurance premiums). On the other side, an employer may not withhold payment of already earned or accrued benefits contingent upon the cessation by employees of a legitimate economic strike. This situation has arisen most frequently in the context of accrued vacation benefits. See NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, 388 U.S. at 32, 87 S.Ct. at 1796; Allied Industrial Workers, Local 289 v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 868, 875–876, 878 (D.C. Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Jemco, Inc., 465 F.2d 1148 (6th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1109, 93 S.Ct. 911, 34 L.Ed.2d 690 (1973); NLRB v. Frick Co., 397 F.2d 956 (3d Cir. 1968). Accord, Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 236 N.L.R.B. 986 (1978) (employer unlawfully withheld accumulated leave pay until employee ceased strike), enforced without opinion, 610 F2d 812 (4th Cir. 1979).

In determining whether the S and A benefits in question fall most closely to one side or the other, the Board adopted the findings and conclusions of the ALJ that:

> the benefits being paid the sick people were not compensation for contemporaneous delivery of services at all, but rather payment for past work performed. Their entitlement to that money depended not one wit upon their working at that time. That it was deferred payment for work—albeit conditional upon their being sick and disabled—is true, but for work performed by them in the past, not in the present. Indeed, this is why the man who worked 30 years received more weeks of S and A benefits while sick than the man who had only performed as an employee a year, or two, or three. If the sick man must come out of the hospital and work during a strike to receive a benefit he sweated for in prior years, must the retiree, who is collecting the pension he earned over 35 years, also come back, merely because the working complement is striking at the moment? To ask the question is to answer it.

Accrued benefits, in contrast to wages, are deferred compensation for work already done. They may take the forms of wages due for past work, vacation time, seniority rights and other conditions of employment linked to past service. E.g., NLRB v. Darling & Co., 420 F.2d 63 (7th Cir. 1970), enforcing 170 N.L.R.B. 1068 (1968) (severance pay); Swift Service Stores, Inc., 169 N.L.R.B. 359 (1968) (Christmas bonus). Such benefits may be defeasible; for example, vacation time may be forfeited if not taken within a calendar year. The test in deciding if benefits have accrued is whether they are due and payable on the date on which the employer denied them. Allied Industrial Workers, Local 289 v. NLRB, supra, 476 F.2d at 876.

The S and A benefits in this case have the distinguishing characteristic of accrued benefits. As the ALJ and the Board found, the right to and the total amount of benefits are tied to the duration of past services and the wages paid for them. Although they are conditional on the employee suffering and continuing to suffer a disabling illness or injury, they do not depend on any return to work or on any future services to the employer.

Wiegand contends that the continued payment of benefits is conditional also on no strike occurring because the applicable benefit plan defines disability as the condition of being unable to work "solely because of" illness or injury. It argues that here the employees would not have worked during the strike because they were union members and because the strike was fully effective. Since they were not absent from their jobs solely because of physical disability, it claims they are not entitled to benefits.

We agree with the Board that the employer's reading of the disability definition is not tenable. The plan defines disability in terms of the employee being prevented from engaging in his or her "regular and customary occupation" because of illness or injury. This definition turns on the physical capacity to carry on one's occupation. Nor can we accept the employer's suggestion that payment of S and A benefits is dependent upon the availability of work for that particular employee. It has pointed to no language limiting the right to benefits in such a way.

In short, nothing in the record of this case indicates that the benefit plan contemplated that employees who were incapable of performing their usual occupations for the employer would not be deemed disabled for the purposes of receiving benefits. Rather, if an employee is certified as disabled, the only relevant consideration within the period for which benefits are due is whether the employee has again become able to work. Therefore, we find substantial basis supporting the Board's conclusion that the S and A benefits were accrued benefits and not wages, and were due and payable within the period of the strike.

B.

Wiegand contends that the Board had no basis for its conclusion that Wiegand intended to coerce and restrain protected activity by its termination of the S and A benefits. Pointing to evidence of its announced reliance on Southwestern Electric Power Co., 216 N.L.R.B. 522 (1975), Wiegand claims that its action can only be construed as properly undertaken in good faith reliance on the advice of its counsel.

Under NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, an intent to encroach upon protected rights may be found when discriminatory consequences foreseeably flow from an action; it is unnecessary to show specific illegal intent. Similarly, the test of coercion or interference with protected rights under Section 8(a)(1) is whether the action undertaken by the employer reasonably tends to restrain or interfere with the employee's exercise of those rights. NLRB v. Clearfield Cheese Co., 322 F.2d 89, 94 (3d Cir. 1963). Under NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, the Board may find the necessary intent even if the employer shows its conduct had a proper motivation, so long as the impact of the discrimination by the employer is "inherently destructive" of section 7 rights. Only when the adverse effect is "comparatively slight" must antiunion motivation be proven as a separate element of the unfair labor practice if the employer raises the issue.

Where, as here, the employer's action affected a benefit that could amount to as much as 45% of an employee's annual income, one might argue that it is so destructive of important rights that subjective intent could be deemed irrelevant. However, we need not decide the issue of intent on that basis because the Board has specifically found antiunion motivation in this case, finding that "[Wiegand's] announcement of the termination of these benefits was intended to coerce and restrain the protected union activity with respect to the strike, by imposing a sanction against certain unit employees if others in the unit engaged in strike activity." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 162, slip op. at 2, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1073. The Board expressly relied on Wiegand's "declaration that these benefits would not be paid to employees who would otherwise receive them came at a time when a strike at its facility was imminent, but before there was any showing of how widespread the strike would be, and before [Wiegand] was aware that any of the employees who were unable to work ratified or actively supported the strike." Id. The Board also relied on the fact that "[Wiegand] terminated these benefits immediately upon the commencement of the strike despite a union representative's clear protest that the individuals who were unable to work were not participants in any strike."[3] Id. The context of the employer's decision as conveyed in the final negotiation session adequately supports the Board's conclusion that antiunion motivation was present.

Although Wiegand introduced evidence of its having proceeded on the basis of legal precedent for its actions, this evidence does not invalidate the inference drawn by the Board. Such evidence is self-serving and may be weighed together with all other evidence by the Board. As this court has said in the context of unlawful discharge cases, > [t]here is clearly no obligation on the Board to accept at face value the reason advanced by the employer. The concurrent existence of an otherwise valid reason for the discharge of an employee does not preclude a factual determination that his discharge was discriminatory if it appears from a preponderance of evidence, and the reasonable inferences drawn therefrom, that the discharge was in fact motivated by the employer's opposition to the employee's union activities.

NLRB v. Buitoni Foods Corp., 298 F.2d 169, 174 (3d Cir. 1962). Accord, NLRB v. G & J Co., 346 F.2d 960 (3d Cir. 1965). See also NLRB v. Garry Manufacturing Co., 630 F.2d 934, 945 (3d Cir. 1980) (In spite of a concurrent permissible justification, an action is an unfair labor practice if it is partly motivated by reaction to the employee's protected activity); Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 363, 368 (3d Cir. 1978). This is equally applicable where an employer offers a rationale for other discriminatory action. Therefore, even if Wiegand might properly have relied on Southwestern Electric to immunize its action, a question we consider hereafter, the Board might still conclude that Wiegand did not in fact do so. We find substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion that Wiegand intended to coerce and restrain protected activity.

[3] The record also includes evidence that Wiegand attempted to use its threatened cutting off of disability benefits to secure concessions from the union on the conduct of the strike, and itself brought up the question of these benefits at the last bargaining session without any earlier indication of its position that these were not in fact accrued benefits. Appendix at 91-92, 200-05.

V.

Wiegand vigorously asserts that the Board acted improperly in retroactively changing its rule in Southwestern Electric Power Co., 216 N.L.R.B. 522 (1975). In its decision in this case, the Board expressly overruled Southwestern Electric to the extent it was inconsistent with the result in this case. While we believe that under the circumstances of this case, application of the NLRB's new approach would not be arbitrary or capricious, we also believe that Wiegand misperceives both the relevance and the effect of the Board's reference to Southwestern Electric in the decision here.

In Southwestern Electric the Board, acting through a three member panel, held that "on the basis of the facts presented, [the employer] did not violate the Act by treating as strikers the six unit employees on sick leave at the beginning of the strike." Id. at 522. The decision, by a 2 to 1 vote, was based on the reasoning that the employer had no way of knowing for certain that the employees on sick leave, all of whom were members of the Union, did not support the strike activities of their colleagues. Since the Board agreed with the ALJ that the employer's belief that the employees in question ratified and supported the strike was reasonable, the complaint against the employer was dismissed. The Board expressly rejected a claim that cancellation of sick leave benefits represented discrimination against union members, saying that there was "no basis" in the case upon which to predicate such a finding. Member Fanning, then Acting Chairman, dissented on the ground that the majority opinion would require that employees on sick leave disavow legal strike action in order to receive their sick pay, which would constitute a clear violation of the section 7 rights of the employees.[4]

In the present case the Board, by a 3 to 1 majority on this issue, took the opportunity to express its agreement with Chairman Fanning's dissenting opinion in Southwestern Electric that the employees had a section 7 right to refrain from declaring their position on a strike while they were medically excused. 216 N.L.R.B. at 523. The Board here stated, "an employer may no longer require its disabled employees to disavow strike action during their sick leave in order to receive disability benefits. To allow the termination of such benefits to certain employees as a result solely of the strike activities of others is to penalize the employees who have not yet acted in support of the strike." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 162, slip op. at 3, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1073. One member of the Board dissented, expressing his adherence to the analysis in Southwestern Electric.

Retroactive application of newly adopted administrative rules or interpretations is not per se arbitrary. Instead, "retroactivity must be balanced against the mischief of producing a result which is contrary to a statutory design or to legal and equitable principles." SEC v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 203, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 1580, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947). See also NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., 416 U.S. 267, 294–95, 94 S.Ct. 1757, 1771–72, 40 L.Ed.2d 134 (1974). In essence, the courts analyze whether the inequity of retroactive applications is counterbalanced by sufficiently significant statutory interests.[5] See, e. g., Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union v. NLRB, 466 F.2d 380 (D.C.Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Majestic Weaving co., 355 F.2d 854 (2d Cir. 1966).

In this case, even were the Board's order requiring payment of S and A benefits to those employees disabled during the strike to be considered as a retroactive application of a changed interpretation, we would not find its impact to be inequitable. The employer is merely being required to pay an accrued benefit, a form of deferred compensation for service it has already received. The effect therefore does no more than prevent unjust enrichment to an employer by its retention of benefits due to its employees.

[4] Section 7 provides:

"Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in § 158(a)(3) [section 8] of this title."

29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976).

[5] In Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union v. NLRB, 466 F.2d 380, 390 (D.C.Cir. 1972), the court enumerated the following factors to be considered in resolving the problem of retroactive application of a Board holding: (1) whether the particular case is one of first impression, (2) whether the new rule represents an abrupt departure from well established practice or merely occupies a void in an unsettled area of law, (3) the extent to which the party against whom the new holding is applied in fact relied on the former rule, (4) the degree of the burden imposed, and (5) the statutory interest in application of this new rule.

Another apparent difference between this case and the decision in Southwestern Electric is the nature of the benefit that was denied. In that case, the "sick pay" consisted of "wages being paid to six employees pursuant to a wage continuation policy whereby employees who are sick and unable to work continue to receive, for specified periods and under certain conditions, the wages they would have earned had they been working." 216 N.L.R.B. at 524 (Decision of the ALJ). Therefore, the issue was whether discontinuance of benefits comparable to wages during a strike constituted an unfair labor practice. There was no indication in Southwestern Electric that the sick pay was an accrued benefit. In this case, we have already decided that the benefits discontinued fall into the category of accrued benefits. Therefore, the employer had no more right to discontinue such benefits than it would have had to deny strikers their accrued vacation time.

The ALJ recognized the distinction between the case before him and that presented in Southwestern Electric. He found this case more analogous to the Board's decision in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 236 N.L.R.B. 986 (1978), enforced without opinion, 610 F.2d 812 (4th Cir. 1979), where the Board found the employer committed an unfair labor practice by withholding leave pay due employees on the basis of work previously performed. Thus the ALJ here stated that the "employees named in this complaint had already earned their S and A benefits before the strike started."

The fact that the Board has chosen this case as the vehicle for repudiating its prior interpretation in Southwestern Electric cannot give the employer any basis for complaint. This case is distinguishable on its facts because of the finding by the Board of intent by the employer to coerce or restrain protected activity, a finding not made in Southwestern Electric.[6] The difference is illustrated by the Board's decision in Pease Co., 237 N.L.R.B. 1273 (1978). There the Board found that an employer committed an unfair labor practice when it halted disability benefits notwithstanding the employee's protest of termination of benefits statement that he was not participating in the strike. The Board held that because of these facts, the case was not governed by Southwestern Electric, which involved the reasonable belief of an employer. In light of the foregoing differences the Board was justified in rejecting Wiegand's defense of good faith reliance on Southwestern Electric.

VI.

Having concluded that the Board was warranted in finding that Wiegand had committed an unfair labor practice and in requiring Wiegand to pay S and A benefits to the disabled employees, we must still decide whether there is any basis for the Board's decision that such benefits can be withheld for the periods after the employees actively participated in strike activity or showed public support. We conclude that this limitation cannot be supported.

The Board justified its order that no payment of S and A benefits shall be due for the periods subsequent to any employee's active participation in strike activity or public support for such activity on the ground that such affirmative demonstration of support "enmeshed" an employee "in the ongoing strike activity to such an extent as to terminate his right to continued disability benefits." 246 N.L.R.B. No. 162, slip op. at 4, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1074. It concluded that its limited remedy represented a fair accommodation between employees' rights to disability benefits without disavowing the strike and the employer's right to refuse to finance a strike against itself.

Member Jenkins dissented from the Board's failure to order the full payment of all S and A benefits during their disability period. He stated that only the employee's recovery would terminate the employer's "fully vested obligation to continue [S and A] payments for all employees on disability prior to the strike", id. at 7, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1074; that disabled employees are inherently unable voluntarily to withhold services from the employer in support of a labor dispute; and that the employer's prior commission of an unfair labor practice in terminating the benefits may have caused, and therefore excuses, the strike participation of the disabled employees.

[6] As the Board and the Union argue, the employer here had significantly different information when it announced its decision to terminate S and A benefits than the employer had in Southwestern Electric. This employer had received an explicit statement before the strike that employees on sick leave were not strike participants. After the termination, the employer received protests from at least some of the disabled employees who stated they were not on strike, precisely the evidence that the Board noted was absent in Southwestern Electric.

Both petitioners attack the remedy ordered by the Board. We have already rejected Wiegand's contention that no S and A payments are proper. The Union, however, asserts that the Board's findings that these benefits were accrued, that disabled employees had non-striker status, and that employees have a section 7 right to refrain from strike action while disabled are inconsistent with the Board's determination that S and A benefits may be cut off by a showing of strike support. It argues that benefits should be continued until employees are no longer eligible or are no longer physically disabled.

Our review of the Board's choice of remedy is necessarily limited by deference to its administrative competence in deciding what means best serve the purposes of the NLRB. Under section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976), the Board, upon finding that a person has committed an unfair labor practice, shall require such person to cease and desist from its unfair labor practice and to "take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of the Act * * *." However, it is patent that the Board's remedy cannot be inconsistent with the reasoning of the decision itself, or with its still applicable principles enunciated in other cases. If it is, then its choice of the remedy may not be enforced. As we have recently said, "[i]t is our duty to insure that the Board adheres to its established criteria unless it clearly decides to modify or alter those standards." NLRB v. Pincus Bros., Inc.—Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367, 372 (3d Cir. 1980).

The Board asserts that its remedy serves the well established policy of protecting an employer from financing a strike against itself. E.g., General Electric Co., 80 N.L.R.B. 510 (1948). However, the entire basis of the Board's decision was that the S and A payments were to be considered as accrued benefits. Since an employer may not deny a striking employee accrued benefits, such as vacation pay, because of his or her active participation in a strike, it follows that the employer may not deny the S and A benefits merely because of the disabled employee's approval of or participation in strike activity. The Board's reliance on its decision in Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., 241 N.L.R.B. No. 5, 100 L.R.R.M. 1470, enforcement denied on other grounds, 612 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1979), is unpersuasive. In that case the Board held that an employer may avoid back pay liability by showing that the employee would not have accepted a reinstatement offer or is otherwise willfully withholding his or her services. Back pay is distinguishable from accrued benefits. Back pay is a statutory remedy that shifts the risk of loss of wages from the employee to the employer if it has committed an unfair labor paractice, generally an unlawful discharge. It cannot be analogized to accrued benefits which are payments for services the employer has already received. Even though such benefits, whether disability payments, vacation pay, or previously earned wages, may provide the living expenses of those who oppose the employer, they do not represent unfair strike financing by an employer, and the Board may not justify its order on that basis.

Moreover, the Board's decision contravenes the reasoning it applied in Abilities & Goodwill, Inc., supra, where it refused to limit the remedy to an employee who, after being illegally discharged, engaged in strike activity. The Board was unwilling to presume the absence of a connection between the employee's conduct and the unfair labor practice. There, the Board stated, "[B]ecause the uncertainty [of the motives of the striker] is caused by the employer's unlawful conduct, we will not indulge in the presumption that the discharge itself played no part in keeping the employees out of work. Rather, it seems to us more equitable to resolve the ambiguity against the wrongdoer * * *." 241 N.L.R.B. No. 5, slip op. at 5, L.R.R.M. at 1471. Here where the employer's termination of the S and A benefits was found to be an unfair labor practice, it follows that such unlawful conduct may have induced strike participation and the employer should not be allowed to benefit from a presumption that its conduct did not induce the participation. See International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, Local 613 v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 723, 726 (3d Cir. 1964) (Where employer commits an unfair labor practice during an economic strike, it may be required to give back pay for the time the strike was prolonged).

Furthermore, the Board's order in this case is inconsistent with its holding, still viable, that an employee who pickets during off-duty time cannot be regarded as a "striker" against whom an employer can act. See M Restaurants, Inc., 223 N.L.R.B. 725 (1976); Shoppers Drug Mart, Inc., 226 N.L.R.B. 901, 910 (1976); Edir, Inc., 159 N.L.R.B. 686 (1966). See also NLRB v. Circle Bindery, Inc., 536 F.2d 447 (1st Cir. 1976) (boycott support); Coors Container Co., 238 N.L.R.B. 1312, 1319 (1978) (display of boycott signs on vehicle); Sears, Roebuck & Co., 168 N.L.R.B. 955, 956–57 (1967) (boycott leafleting after hours). So long as the employee meets the work commitment to the employer, the employer cannot act against the employee for his or her off-time actions, or section 7 rights would be merely empty promises.

Obviously, the employer need not continue to pay S and A benefits once the employee is no longer disabled. Active participation in strike activity may be telling, or even presumptive, evidence of cessation of disability. However, whether such activity in fact reflects the end of the disability period may depend on the nature of the activity and the physical demands of the particular employee's job. Such details can be resolved in the compliance proceeding. On the other hand, use of the mere expression of public support for the strike by a disabled employee, such as one still in the hospital, as the basis for termination of benefits is inherently destructive of the employee's section 7 rights.

Accordingly, the Board's decision to end benefits on the basis of active participation or public support for strike activity cannot stand. It is internally inconsistent with the Board's own rationale in this case. It varies from the Board's policies as set out in previous board decisions, and frustrates effectation of section 7 rights.

VII.

We have found that the Board properly concluded that Wiegand had committed an unfair labor practice and ordered payments of sickness and accident benefits, but improperly limited those payments. Accordingly, we will grant review and enter a decree modifying the order of the Board to authorize payment of sickness and accident benefits for the maximum period of each disabled employee's eligibility or for such employee's period of disability as defined in the plan, whichever is shorter. As so modified, we will enforce the order of the Board pursuant to our power under section 10(f), 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) (1976).

ADAMS, Circuit Judge, concurring: I concur in the judgment of the Court because I believe there is sufficient evidence to support the conclusion of the National Labor Relations Board that the sickness and accident benefits (S&A benefits) were accrued and that Wiegand committed an unfair labor practice when it terminated these benefits. Under the circumscribed scope of judicial review of Board orders, we may not substitute our judgment for that of the agency; rather, we are constrained to uphold findings supported by substantial evidence. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Although I agree with the reasons expressed by the majority for upholding the Board's findings on the accrued nature of the benefits, I write separately to emphasize a finding that in my view is crucial to the resolution of several issues in this case. Significantly, the Administrative Law Judge and the Board found that the employer intentionally terminated sickness and accident benefits for the purpose of coercing and restraining the employees' protected right to engage in concerted activity.

Substantial facts support this finding of intentionally coercive anti-union animus. As the Board recounted the chronology of events, the employer declared that it would cease paying S&A benefits in direct response to a strike call by the union. The union promptly protested this decision, and informed the employer that the disabled workers were not strike participants. Despite these protestations, Wiegand persisted in cutting off the S&A benefits. The employer acted before it could have acquired any knowledge of how effective the future strike would be or whether the sick employees would ratify the strike. Under these circumstances the ALJ and the Board could have reasonably found that the employer's announcement amounted to a retaliatory threat to sanction certain workers if the other employees went on strike.

The import of the finding of coercive intent is that it serves to distinguish the present situation from that involved in Southwestern Electric Power Co., 216 NLRB 522 (1975), a matter in which the Board found that the employer had not committed an unfair labor practice when it ceased paying sick leave after a strike began. Notably absent from Southwestern Electric is any indication that the employer threatened to terminate benefits before the strike commenced, or that the eventual cutoff, which occurred after the strike was called, was an intentionally coercive measure. Indeed, the focus of the inquiry in Southwestern Electric was whether the employer acted reasonably in assuming that all workers, well or disabled, actually supported the strike. In concluding that the employer's belief was reasonable, the Board found it significant that no Southwestern employee had registered a protest over the termination of sick leave payments. 216 NLRB at 522. The contrast with the events in the present case is quite significant. Not only did the Board find that Wiegand's threat to cut off benefits was designed to dissuade the union from striking, but the company adamantly adhered to its position despite indications that some disabled workers were not strikers. The union protested to the company that the sick individuals were not strikers, and the record also shows that at least three workers on disability actually telephone the company to complain when their benefits stopped coming. These callers specifically told the company that they were not on strike, but their inquiries were met with the answer that the cut-off was a firm company policy. This affirmative indication in the present situation that the disabled workers were not in the same position as strikers was, as the Board remarked, absent in Southwestern Electric. Moreover, there was no finding in Southwestern, as there was here, that the sick leave payments were accrued compensation linked to services rendered in the past.

Factual differences between Wiegand's intentionally retaliatory action and the circumstances in Southwestern Electric illustrate that, to the extent Wiegand may have based its action on the prior Board precedent, its reliance was not justified. The narrow decision in Southwestern cannot fairly be interpreted to give employers carte blanche to issue coercive pre-strike threats to terminate accrued benefits. Such a construction would appear to run afoul of the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). Consequently, the Board's determination to overrule Southwestern Electric in the present case has not visited an undue hardship on Wiegand. The employer has not been subjected to fines or other penalties. See NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., 416 U.S. 267, 295, 94 S.Ct. 1757, 1772, 40 L.Ed.2d 134 (1974). Rather, it merely has been ordered to pay benefits that it was always obligated to pay, because the workers had earned the right to S&A payments before a strike was imminent.

It is firmly settled by the Supreme Court that the Board may overrule its previous decisions in subsequent adjudicatory proceedings, as cumulative experience and wisdom gleaned from legal and industrial evolution warrant rethinking earlier held views. See e. g., NLRB v. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 264–67, 95 S.Ct. 959, 967–68, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975); NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., supra. Reliance by one party on past Board decisions does not alter the Board's authority to set aside precedents and apply the new principle to the case at hand. Bell Aerospace, 416 U.S. at 295, 94 S.Ct. at 1772. Accordingly, Supreme Court decisions compel the conclusion that, in this case, Wiegand cannot be excused from having committed an unfair labor practice on the basis of possible reliance on a previous Board ruling.

I also write separately to highlight why, in this particular proceeding, we may modify the Board's remedial order despite the extensive deference courts normally accord to such orders.

The Supreme Court has often attested to the breadth of the Board's discretion to devise "remedies to effectuate the policies of the Act." NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953). As the Court explained in Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 406, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964), "[t]he Board's power is a broad discretionary one, subject to limited judicial review. . . . 'In fashioning remedies to undo the effects of violations of the Act, the Board must draw on enlightenment gained from experience.' Labor Board v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346 [73 S.Ct. 287, 288, 97 L.Ed.

377]. The Board's order will not be disturbed 'unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act.' Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Labor Board, 319 U.S. 533, 540 [63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568]" (some citations omitted).

This synthesis reveals that although the Board's remedial authority is extensive, it is confined by the very policies that the Board is charged with implementing. Thus, there are two primary constraints on remedial discretion. First, the remedy selected must "undo the effects of violations of the Act," id., rather than perpetuate the unfair labor practice. Second, the Board is not free to adopt a remedy that is at odds with the purposes of and the rights guaranteed by the national labor laws. The Board exceeded both limitations in the present case. Here, the policy that the remedy should have effectuated was the right of employees to support a strike without losing accrued benefits. Yet, the Board's order that the employer could discontinue S&A benefits for active strike supporters in and of itself is inconsistent with the protected right of employees to engage in concerted activity in furtherance of collective bargaining efforts. 29 U.S.C. §§ 157, 158(a)(1) (1976). Moreover, rather than redressing the violation, the Board's remedial order permitted the employer to continue the unfair practice of withdrawing accrued benefits from strike supporters. Thus, the remedy adopted by the Board stands in irreconcilable conflict with its underlying finding that the termination of accrued benefits constituted an unfair labor practice.

Having found that S&A benefits are accrued compensation tied to past service, the Board is not free nevertheless to permit the employer to terminate such benefits for those disabled workers who show support for the strike. The right of employees to support legal strike activity without suffering retaliation or discrimination is at the heart of the protection embodied in 29 U.S.C. §§ 157 and 158. See NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963). The Supreme Court has squarely held that an employer may not deny accrued benefits to workers who support a strike. NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967).

The remedial order adopted by the Board, however, leads to the precise result prohibited by the Supreme Court in Great Dane; it authorizes the withdrawal of accrued benefits to workers who indicate support for the concerted efforts of fellow employees to withhold their services. Such an actions is likely to inhibit strike support, an effect which is fundamentally contradictory to rights protected by 29 U.S.C. § 157. Because the Board's order patently fails to effectuate the policies of the national labor laws, it is not entitled to the respect which appellate courts usually must great to remedial choices. The only remedial order consonant with the finding that the S&A benefits were accrued is one that directs the employer to pay these benefits for the entire time a worker remains disabled.

Although I am concerned that an employer should not be placed in the position of finanicing a strike, the apprehension of the Board that such an order there would be tantamount to requiring Wiegand to finance the strike is not consonant with the finding that the benefits were accured. An employer can be deemed to be financing a strike against itself only when it must pay compensation that bears the characteristics of wages. Wages are unaccrued payments for current services rendered. Since striking employees are withholding current services, the employer need not pay them wages. In contrast, Wiegand's duty to pay the accrued disability insurance arises in return for efforts expended by employees in the past. Inasmuch as these benefits are not given in return for current services, the employer's continued payment of S&A benefits to disabled workers, during a strike engaged in by nondisabled workers, cannot fairly be viewed as financing the strike.

Accordingly, I agree with the majority that we should enforce the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice because, under the substantial evidence standard of review, the Board's determination that the S&A benefits were accrued is adequately supported in the record. Once the Board found the S&A benefits to be accrued, the unfair labor practice finding was mandated by the Supreme Court's holding in Great Dane Trailers. Similarly, modification of the remedial order is consistent with Supreme Court precedents.

NLRB v. Suburban Ford, Inc.

646 F.2d 1244 (8th Cir.), April 15, 1981—248 NLRB 364

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before BRIGHT, STEPHENSON and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges

1245

BRIGHT, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) petitions this court under section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), for enforcement of its order directing Suburban Ford, Inc. (the Company), to bargain collectively with Local 604 of the Automobile Transport Chauffeurs, Demonstrators & Helpers Union (Local 604), representing the Company's salesmen, and Local 618 of the Automotive, Petroleum and Allied Industries Employees Union (Local 618), representing the Company's clerical workers. The NLRB found that after a majority of the Company's salesmen and clerical workers had signed authorization cards designating Local 604 and Local 618 as their collective bargaining representatives, the Company engaged in unfair labor practices that would tend to undermine the Unions' majority strength and impede the election processes. We conclude that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the NLRB's findings as to Local 604 but not as to Local 618. Accordingly, we deny enforcement of the Board's order as it pertains to Local 618 and grant enforcement of the order in all other respects.

1246

I. Background.

On April 19, 1979, representatives of Local 604 met with five of the nine salesmen employed by Suburban Ford. By the next day, the Union received signed membership cards from six salesmen designating Local 604 as their collective bargaining representative. Shortly thereafter, a majority of the Company's clerical workers signed authorization cards designating Local 618 as their collective bargaining agent. After the Company declined to recognize the Unions on the basis of the signed authorization cards, Local 604 and Local 618 separately petitioned the Board for representation elections among each unit's employees.

On April 28, two days after the Unions' demand for recognition, new-car sales manager James Fitzgerald called salesman Robert Hawkins into the Company-owner's office to express his displeasure that Hawkins had joined a union. In particular, Fitzgerald stated, "Hawk, you of all people, I didn't think you'd do this to me." Fitzgerald also stated that he expected loyalty from his employees and that "he could have blown [Hawkins] out of [the Company] any time he wanted to when [Hawkins] was having bad months." That same day Fitzgerald also called salesman D. W. Van Ronzelen into the office and complained, "Van, you stabbed me in the back. * * * [Y]ou know very well that Mr. Hildebrand and I did not want a union in this store. * * * Have [you] looked up the definition of the word loyalty lately?"

Two days later at the Company's weekly sales meeting, Fitzgerald initiated a number of unprecedented actions. After indicating that the Company had experienced its worst April sales record in history, he ordered the replacement of the salesmen's demonstrators with less desirable vehicles and the transfer of new and used car salesmen between the two departments. Fitzgerald also canceled for "lack of interest" an ongoing bonus contest that offered the salesmen an opportunity to win a trip to Las Vegas or to a Missouri resort. Finally, the Company hired five new salesmen, most of whom had little or no experience in automobile sales, and four new clerical employees, three of whom were at least indirectly related to management officials.

During May, used-car sales manager Jerry Gilliam initiated at least a half-dozen conversations with Company salesmen concerning their support for Local 604. On one occasion, Gilliam approached Van Ronzelen in a tavern and commented, "[I]f you'll forget all this union nonsense, I'll make it very well worth your while." On several occasions, Gilliam made similar comments to Hawkins and during one conversation added, "[I]t won't do any good to bring a union in." In late May, when Hawkins indicated that he had joined Local 604 for the medical, dental, and pension benefits, Gilliam responded, "I can give you that", wrote on a paper napkin that Bob Hawkins would be guaranteed a job for five years if he sold ten or more cars a month, and signed his name.

Finally, on June 6, Gilliam chastized Hawkins for lending a demonstrator to a customer. When Hawkins attempted to explain that he had acted in accordance with Company policy under the circumstances and had received the permission of Company-owner Hildebrand to lend the vehicle, Gilliam refused to listen to these justifications and fired Hawkins. Two days later, Hawkins filed an unfair labor practice charge with the NLRB and delivered a copy of the complaint to Gilliam. Immediately after Gilliam showed the copy to Hildebrand and other management officials, the Company rehired Hawkins.

On the basis of this evidence, the NLRB found that the Company had violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), by accusing salesmen of disloyalty because of their union activity, soliciting grievances from salesmen to discourage union membership, threatening to discharge salesmen who engaged in union activity, promising benefits to salesmen who would abandon their support for Local 604, advising salesmen that unionization would be futile, and hiring new salesmen and clerical employees solely for the purpose of destroying the majority status of both Local 604 and Local 618. The NLRB also found that the Company had violated section 8(a)(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976), by replacing the salesmen's demonstrators with less desirable vehicles, canceling the bonus contest, and discharging Hawkins for participation in union activities. The NLRB then determined that the salesmen and clerical employees constituted appropriate bargaining units, that Local 604 represented a majority of the salesmen and Local 618 held majority status among the clerical employees before the Company committed its violations of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3), and that the issuance of bargaining orders would better protect the employees' expression of support for the Unions than the use of traditional remedies to ensure fair representation elections.

II. Discussion.

A. Clerical Employees.

The NLRB's order to bargain with Local 618 primarily rests on the Board's admittedly novel theory that an employer violates section 8(a)(1) by hiring new employees solely for the purpose of destroying a union's majority status in the bargaining unit. The Board premises this theory on the view that "discrimination in hiring is twin to discrimination in firing." Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 187, 61 S.Ct. 845, 849, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941). Just as an employer may not discharge prounion employees to prevent them from voting in a Board election, neither should the employer be permitted to hire unnecessary antiunion employees for the purpose of diluting the voting strength of those employees already in the bargaining unit who support the union.

The Company answers that the Board cannot establish a violation of section 8(a)(1) upon a mere showing that an employer hired new employees solely for the purpose of destroying a union's majority status. To establish that the employer's addition of employees to the work force might dilute the union's majority status in the bargaining unit, the Board must also show that the new employees would be eligible to vote in the upcoming representation election under the Board's election rules and that these employees would likely vote against the union in a greater proportion than the existing employees in the bargaining unit.

We need not determine the merits of the Board's theory in this case because, in any event, the record does not support the Board's order to bargain with Local 618. To warrant the issuance of a bargaining order, the Board must find that > the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order. [NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., Inc., 395 U.S. 575, 614–15, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1940–41, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).]

The record in this case contains no substantial evidence that the Company's addition of four clerical employees to the bargaining unit after Local 618 had obtained majority status through signed authorization cards so tainted the election process as to justify supplementing traditional remedies with a bargaining order.

The Board argues, however, that it could reasonably find that the Company's unlawful conduct against the salesmen would also affect the fairness of the clerical workers' representation election because the two units worked in close contact with each other. This argument may carry some validity under some circumstances, but in this case the Board's finding lacks substantial evidentiary support in the record. Accordingly, we deny enforcement of the Board's order to bargain with Local 618.[1]

B. Salesmen.

The Board's order to bargain with Local 604, however, rests on several violations of section 8(a)(1) and section 8(a)(3) that would warrant the issuance of a bargaining order. For this reason, we grant enforcement of this order and need not determine whether the Company violated section 8(a)(1) by hiring additional salesmen solely for the purpose of destroying Local 604's majority status.

We recognize that for each violation of section 8(a)(1) and section 8(a)(3) charged by the Board, the Company presents an alternative view of the evidence or a legitimate business justification for its actions.[2] On factual issues, however, the Board's findings will be conclusive if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). This court cannot overturn the Board's choice between two fairly conflicting views of the evidence, even though we might justifiably take a different view were the matter before us de novo. Buffalo Bituminous, Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 267, 270 (8th Cir. 1977). Nor can this court pass on the credibility of the witnesses, weigh the evidence, or reject reasonable inferences made by the Board because other inferences might also be reasonably drawn.[3] Singer v. NLRB, 429 F.2d 172, 179 (8th Cir. 1970).

Applying these standards to the present case, we conclude that substantial evidence in the record as a whole supports the Board's findings that the Company engaged in unfair labor practices against its salesmen. In particular, the Board might reasonably infer from the coincidence in time between the salesmen's union activities and the Company's conduct that the employer acted with the intent of impeding the salesmen's efforts at unionization. Fitzgerald's conversations with Hawkins and Van Ronzelen occurred within two days after Local 604's request for recognition had been rejected by the Company. At the next weekly sales meeting, Fitzgerald canceled the bonus contest, transferred the salesmen between new and used car sales, and recalled the salesmen's demonstrators. In addition, Gilliam's efforts to dissuade the salesmen from union membership began during this period and continued until he ultimately fired Hawkins. Finally, the Company's reinstatement of Hawkins occurred only after it learned that Hawkins had filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board. The Board could reasonably infer from the

[1] Because of our disposition in this matter, we need not consider the Company's other challenges to the Board's order to bargain with Local 618.

[2] As to Fitzgerald's conversations with Hawkins and Van Ronzelen, the Company contends that Fitzgerald's references to disloyalty should be read as disloyalty to him, a long-time friend, not disloyalty to the Company. Similarly, Fitzgerald's statement to Hawkins that he could have fired Hawkins in prior months for low productivity arose in the context of personal loyalty to Fitzgerald rather than as a threat of discharge. As to Gilliam's statements, the Company argues that the employees to whom Gilliam spoke had no reasonable basis to believe that Gilliam, a low-ranking supervisor, spoke or acted on behalf of management in soliciting grievances and promising benefits to those employees who would abandon their support for the Union. As to the Company's hire of new employees, cancellation of the bonus contest, issuance of less desirable demonstrators to the salesmen, and transfer of salesmen between new and and used car sales, the Company attributes its actions to economic necessity rather than antiunion animus. Finally, the Company maintains that Gilliam fired Hawkins without authority and merely out of a personal pique, a decision which the Company immediately rectified upon learning of the discharge.

[3] The Company urges us to review the entire record rather than accept the administrative law judge's findings and credibility resolutions at face value because the administrative law judge allegedly manufactured evidence, disregarded parts of testimony from witnesses he claimed to have credited, credited testimony that was contradicted by other credited witnesses, ignored uncontradicted testimony from witnesses not discredited, quoted his own statements made at the hearing rather than the testimony of witnesses, quoted testimony out of context, repeatedly argued with witnesses during the hearing, and effectively prohibited the Company from making an offer of proof. See NLRB v. Huntington Hospital, Inc., 550 F.2d 921, 924 (4th Cir. 1977) (trial examiner's report and Board's findings will not be accorded presumption of correctness usually attributed to trier of fact if material uncontradicted evidence has been ignored or if evidence has been disregarded or eliminated by casual expedience of discrediting an employer's witnesses); NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 222 F.2d 341, 345 (5th Cir. 1955) (bias of administrative law judge requires court review of credibility resolutions); Local No. 3, United Packinghouse Workers of America v. NLRB, 210 F.2d 325, 330 (8th Cir. 1954) (manifest prejudice, bias, and hostility of examiner goes far to weaken or destroy presumption of correctness usually attributed to findings of trier of fact).

Having carefully reviewed the record in light of these allegations, we reject the Company's alllegations as substantially without merit.

timing of these events that the Company interfered with, restrained, or coerced the salesmen in the exercise of their right to self-organization, in violation of section 8(a)(1), and discriminated against the salesmen in the terms and conditions of employment to discourage them from membership in Local 604, in violation of section 8(a)(3).

III. Conclusion.

We grant enforcement of the Board's order to bargain with Local 604, but deny enforcement of the order as to Local 618. The Company does not challenge any other remedial provisions of the board's order, and these provisions will be enforced.[4]

[4] Company counsel has advised us that the Company has recently ceased operations, although nothing to this effect appears in the record. Under settled precedent, however, the Company's closing does not render this case moot. See NLRB v. Bell Co., 561 F.2d 1264, 1266 n.2 (7th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Aircraft Engineering Corp., 419 F.2d 1303, 1304 (8th Cir. 1970).

Koch Supplies, Inc. v. NLRB

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before HEANEY, and HENLEY, Circuit Judges, and PECK,[*] SENIOR CIRCUIT JUDGE

1258

PER CURIAM: Koch Supplies, Inc., asks this Court to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board. The Board found that Koch had violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq., by discharging Elke Musy for protected union activities. Koch Supplies, Inc., 249 N.L.R.B. 160, 104 L.R.R.M. 1334 (1980). The Board asks that we enforce its order. We refuse to do so because we do not believe that substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the Board's findings that Musy was discharged because she engaged in protected union activities.

1259

The critical issue is whether Musy, a highly competent bilingual secretary, was discharged because of her own personal persistent griping, or because she presented employee complaints to management in order to benefit herself and her fellow workers. Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act grants to employees the right "to engage in * * * concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). Section 8(a)(1) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7." 29 U.S.C. § 158 (1976). Thus, for employees' activities to be protected under the Act, the activities must be concerted. See N.L.R.B. v. Dawson Cabinet Co., 566 F.2d 1079, 1082 (8th Cir. 1977). The concerted activities need not take place in a union setting and it is not necessary that a collective bargaining agreement be in effect. It is sufficient that the employee intends or contemplates, as an end result, group activity which will also benefit some other employees. Keokuk Gas Serv. Co. v. N.L.R.B., 580 F.2d 328, 333-334 (8th Cir. 1978). To state the matter simply, if an employee's actions constitute mere personal griping or complaining, then the actions are not entitled to protection. On the other hand, if the employee's efforts are intended to gain more favorable contract terms for himself or herself, then there is some element of collective activity or contemplation thereof, and the employees' efforts are protected. See N.L.R.B. v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., 481 F.2d 714, 717-718 (5th Cir. 1973); Mushroom Transportation Co. v. N.L.R.B., 330 F.2d 683, 684-685 (3rd Cir. 1964).

We are convinced from a careful review of this record that substantial evidence on the record as a whole does not support the Board's finding that Musy intended or contemplated, as an end result of her conversations with management, to benefit employees other than herself in their status as employees.

Musy was upset because she did not receive a promotion. Thereafter, she vigorously protested the company's promise of vacation benefits to a new employee, benefits which she stated were contrary to established company policy. No group action was ever discussed and all of the employees who testified denied any interest in Musy's gripes. There is no evidence in the record from which it can be inferred that such action was contemplated.

[*] John W. Peck, U.S. Senior Circuit Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, sitting by designation.

The Board justifies its holding, in part, on the theory that because vacations are generally a matter of common interest, Musy's complaints with respect to them are protected. This theory is insufficient justification; something more is required. It must be shown that Musy intended that her activities would relate to group action. N.L.R.B. v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., supra, 481 F.2d at 718. The requisite showing was not made.

Koch Supplies' petition to review and set aside the order of the Board is granted; the Board's cross-application for enforcement of its order is denied.

On petitions to review and enforce Board Order

1304

CANBY, Circuit Judge: These cases raise important questions concerning the scope of § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(e), which prohibits "hot cargo" agreements. The primary issue is whether the construction industry proviso to § 8(e) renders lawful clauses in collective bargaining contracts forbidding the employers to subcontract work at any construction site to a firm not having a contract with the signatory union. Additional issues are whether unions may picket or strike to induce an employer to enter these agreements and whether the agreements, once entered, may be enforced by picketing or strikes. We conclude that the subcontracting clauses fall within the construction industry proviso and consequently do not violate § 8(e). We also conclude that unions may picket or strike to obtain such agreements, but not to enforce them. The orders of the National Labor Relations Board are accordingly enforced.

I.

Facts.

Two orders of the Board are under review here pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) and (f). The first concerns a collective bargaining agreement between Oregon-Columbia Chapter of the Associated General Contractors of America, Inc. (AGC) and Local 701 of the International Union of Operating Engineers (Engineers). AGC is an association of some 200 employers engaged in construction in Oregon and southwest Washington. These employers have delegated their collective bargaining authority to AGC. AGC and Engineers entered into a collective bargaining agreement effective from June 1, 1975, through May 31, 1980, which contained the following clause:

> Article VIII
> Subcontractors and Other Employers.
> Section 1. Employers shall not contract any work covered by this Agreement to be done at the site of the construction, alteration, painting or repair of a building, structure or other work to any person, firm or company who does not have an existing labor agreement with the Union covering such work.

Subsequent clauses [1] provide for a grievance procedure leading to arbitration and further provide that should the parties fail to comply with the arbitrator's decision, then "[e]ither party may take such action as they deem necessary to enforce the findings * * *." The effect of the latter provision is to permit either party to employ self-help, such as strikes or lockouts, that would otherwise be prohibited by another article of the agreement.

Upon complaint by Pacific Northwest Chapter of the Associated Builders & Contractors, Inc., Engineers and AGC were charged with violating § 8(e) [2] of the National Labor Relations Act, which prohibits agreements between a labor organization and an employer in which the employer agrees to refrain from using the products of another employer or to cease doing business with any other person. The case was submitted to the Board upon stipulated facts and the Board found that, while the agreement fell within the prohibition of § 8(e), it was exempted from the coverage of that provision by the construction industry proviso applicable to agreements "between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction, alteration, painting, or repair of a building, structure, or other work * * *." The Board also ruled that the clause authorizing enforcement of the subcontracting provision by self-help was invalid. All parties petitioned for review and the Board sought enforcement of its order.

The second decision of the Board concerns Woelke and Romero Framing, Inc., (Woelke), a framing subcontractor in the construction industry in Southern California. Woelke was a party to a collective bargaining agreement entered on July 5, 1974, with the United Brotnerhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (Carpenters), a group which included Local Number 235 and 944 involved in this litigation. That agreement expired on June 15, 1977. From about June 3, 1977, to August 4, 1977, Carpenters and Woelke engaged in collective bargaining for the purpose of negotiating a successor agreement. They broke off negotiations when they reached an impasse over several issues.[3] One such issue was the union's demand for a clause in the contract that prohibited Woelke from subcontracting work at any construction jobsite "except to a person, firm or corporation, party to an appropriate, current labor agreement with the appropriate union, or subordinate body signatory to this Agreement."[4] In support of Carpenters' demand for this contract provision, Locals 235 and 944 picketed Woelke's construction sites, causing some work stoppages. The two locals were charged with violation of § 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) of the Act[5] for

Should the parties involved fail to comply with the [arbitrator's] findings within five (5) days after such written notification by either party * * *, then all means of arbitration shall be considered exhausted. Either party may take such action as they deem necessary to enforce the findings * * * and they shall not be considered in violation of any part of this Agreement.

ARTICLE X

Strikes and Lockouts

Section 1. Unless otherwise provided herein, it is mutually agreed that there will be no strikes or lockouts, or cessation of work by either party, for the duration of this Agreement. All disputes arising under this Agreement shall be submitted to the procedures for the settlement of disputes as provided in this Agreement * * *.

[2] Section 8(e), 29 U.S.C. § 158(e), provides in pertinent part:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using, selling, transporting or otherwise dealing in any of the products of any other employer, or to cease doing business with any other person, and any contract or agreement entered into heretofore or hereafter containing such an agreement shall be to such extent unenforceable and void: Provided. That nothing in this subsection shall apply to an agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contraction or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction, alteration, painting or repair of a building, structure, or other work * * *.

[3] Another issue over which the parties reached impasse was Carpenters' demand to include Woelke's foremen in the bargaining unit. The Board found that picketing to enforce this demand violated § 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act. The union has not contested that ruling in this court. We therefore enforce the Board's order concerning this issue.

[4] The proposed clause provides:

> The Contractor agrees that neither he nor any of his subcontractors on the jobsite will subcontract any work to be done at the site of construction, alteration, painting or repair of a building, structure or other work (including quarries, rock, sand and gravel plants, asphalt plants, ready-mix concrete plants, established on or adjacent to the jobsite to process or supply materials for the convenience of the Contractor for jobsite use) except to a person, firm or corporation, party to an appropriate, current labor agreement with the appropriate Union, or subordinate body signatory to this Agreement.

[5] Sections 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) and (B), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) and (B), provide:

> (b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—
>> (4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any good, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services; or (ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof is—picketing to require an employer "to enter into any agreement which is prohibited by section 8(e)."

The case was submitted to the Board upon stipulation and the Board found that the proposed subcontracting agreement was not prohibited by § 8(e) because it fell within the construction industry proviso, and that picketing to obtain such a clause therefor did not violate § 8(b)(4). Woelke petitions for review of the Board's order, and the Board seeks enforcement.[6]

Both decisions of the Board were reviewed by a panel of this court. 609 F.2d 1341 (9th Cir. 1979). On the authority of Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers & Steamfitters Local Union No. 100, 421 U.S. 616, 95 S.Ct. 1830, 44 L.Ed.2d 418 (1975), the panel held that the subcontractor clauses were prohibited by § 8(e) and did not fall within the protection of the construction industry proviso because there applicability was not limited to jobsites where members of the signatory union were employed at some time during the construction project. Having found the present clauses unenforceable, the panel did not reach the questions whether picketing or striking either to obtain or enforce a lawful subcontractor clause would violate § 8(e). 609 F.2d at 1351. This court subsequently ordered rehearing before a limited en banc panel as provided by Public Law 95–486, 92 Stat. 1629, 1633 and Rule 25 of this court.

II.

Issues.

Four issues are presented for determination in these cases:

(1) Are the subcontracting clauses "secondary" and therefore within the scope of § 8(e)?

(2) If the clauses are within the scope of § 8(e), are they exempted from its proscription by the construction industry proviso?

(3) If the subcontracting clauses are lawful, does it nevertheless violate § 8(b)(4) for a union to picket or strike to induce an employer to agree to one?

(4) If the subcontracting clauses are lawful, does it nevertheless violate § 8(b)(4) to enforce them by picketing or strikes?

III.

Applicability of § 8(e).

The subcontractor clauses in the present case clearly require the signatory employer to cease or refrain from using the products of another employer or to cease doing business with another person. The clauses consequently fall within the literal language of § 8(e). In National Woodwork Manufacturers Association v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 18 L.Ed2d 357 (1967), however, the Supreme Court held that § 8(e) is not to be read as expansively as its language seems to indicate. The Court pointed out that the purpose of Congress in enacting § 8(e) was to prohibit voluntary arrangements that reached the same result as coercive secondary boycotts prohibited by § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act. The Court therefore held that an agreement between a union and an employer which prohibited certain kinds of subcontracting was permissible so long as the objective was to preserve work traditionally performed at the jobsite by employees of the primary employer. Such a "work preservation" clause was viewed as primary and therefore did not constitute an unfair labor practice.[7] The test

(A) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization or to enter into any agreement which is prohibited by subsection (e) of this section:

(B) forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, tranporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer or to cease doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 159 of this title: Provided, That nothing contained in this clause (B) shall be construed to make unlawful, where not otherwise unlawful, any primary strike or primary picketing. * * *

[7] "Union standards" clauses, which require that an employer not subcontract with anyone whose wage and benefit scale does not meet union standards, have also been held primary. The purpose of such clauses is deemed to be protection of the pay and benefit scales of the workers of the primary employer. Truck Drivers Union Local No. 413 v. NLRB 334 F.2d 539, 548 (D.C. Cir), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 916, 85 S.Ct. 264, 13 whether an agreement was primary and permissible was "whether the agreement or its maintenance is addressed to the labor relations of the contracting employer vis-a-vis his own employees." Id. 386 U.S. at 645, 87 S.Ct. at 1268–69. An agreement was secondary and prohibited when "the agreements and boycotts were tactically calculated to satisfy union objectives elsewhere." Id. at 644, 87 S.Ct. at 1268.

By the National Woodwork test, union signatory clauses such as those in issue here are secondary in objective. They do not seek to preserve work for the employees of the contracting employer by limiting the amount of subcontracting. Nor do they seek to protect the wage and benefit standards of those same employees in their present employment by merely limiting subcontracting to third parties who maintain equivalent standards. Instead, these union signatory clauses permit unlimited subcontracting so long as the subcontractors have an agreement with the contracting union. Such clauses are properly viewed as secondary, for they are intended to satisfy union objectives employees and employers outside of the bargaining or work unit. Griffth Co. v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 1194 (9th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 854, 98 S.Ct. 171, 54 L.Ed.2d 124 (1977); NLRB v. National Maritime Union, 486 F.2d 907 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 970, 94 S.Ct. 1993, 40 L.Ed.2d 559 (1974).

It is contended by Engineers that the objective of preserving work within the entire multi-employer bargaining unit of AGC is a primary goal and that this fact should take its subcontracting clause outside of the scope of § 8(e). This argument fails for two reasons. First, the clause in question does not limit subcontracting to firms that are members of AGC. Outsiders having an agreement with Engineers are eligible, even though they and their employees are wholly foreign to the multi-employer bargaining unit. The clause therefore is not a primary work preservation clause. NLRB v. National Maritime Union, 486 F.2d at 914. Second § 8(e) applies in any event to an agreement which attempts to preserve work for an entire multi-employer unit rather than for single employers' employees. This court dealt with the issue in NLRB v. Joint Council of Teamsters No. 38, 338 F.2d 23, 28 (9th Cir. 1964):

> Respondents seem to argue that [the clause] falls within the exception to section 8(e) because it preserves the job opportunities of employees within the multi-employer bargaining unit by prohibiting subcontracting to any employer outside that unit. But if this argument were accepted, the exception to section 8(e) would permit precisely what the section itself was intended to prohibit: An agreement by an employer to boycott another unless the latter entered into a union contract.

Accord, NLRB v. National Maritime Union, supra.

The union's further contention that work preservation of the employees of each contractor was one of the objectives underlying the union subcontracting clause, does not compel us to alter our conclusion. Regardless of the union's other objectives, if "an object of a clause is to aid union members generally rather than members of the unit, the object is secondary and unlawful." National Maritime Union, 196 N.L.R.B. 1100, 1101 (1972), enforced, 486 F.2d 907 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 970, 94 S.Ct. 1993, 40 L.Ed.2d 559 (1974) (emphasis supplied).

It is true that the primary-secondary distinction is particularly difficult to maintain in the construction industry, where contractors and subcontractors assemble their work forces for specific short-term jobs. There is a great deal of flexibility and interchangeability of employees between bargaining units. As a result, a subcontractor clause may well serve the interests of union members in the primary bargaining unit who may later find themselves working for a subcontractor. While we believe that fact to be of great significance for purposes of determining the scope of the construction industry proviso, we do not view it as determinative of the initial applicability of § 8(e) itself. See NLRB v. National Maritime Union, supra, 913–14. The primary-secondary distinction between separate employers working the same jobsite in the construction industry has been adhered to in the past, NLRB v. Denver Building & Construction Trades, 341 U.S. 675, 71 S.Ct. 943, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951), and we do not feel free to disregard it here. Moreover, the consequences of viewing union signatory clauses as primary would be not only to remove them from the scope of § 8(e) but also to remove picketing to enforce such agreements from the prohibition of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B). For reasons stated in Section VI of this opinion, we believe that permitting coercive enforcement of union signatory clauses would be contrary to the intent of Congress.

We accordingly hold that the union signatory clauses in these cases are secondary and within the scope of § 8(e). Their validity consequently depends upon their eligibility for inclusion within the construction industry proviso to that section.

IV.

Scope of the Construction Industry Proviso to § 8(e).

In order to ascertain the scope of the construction industry proviso, it is necessary to examine its legislative history in the light of the practices existing in the industry at that time and the law then applicable. In so reviewing the origins of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act of which § 8(e) and its proviso were a part, we recognize that our initial conclusions as to its meaning are subject to any modifications or corrections that may be compelled by a fair reading of Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers & Steamfitters Local Union No. 100, 421 U.S. 616, 95 S.Ct. 1830, 44 L.Ed.2d 418 (1975). Indeed, it is the effect of Connell that provides the primary ground of controversy in 1309 the present litigation. We believe, however, that the Connell decision is best analyzed after a review of the state of the industry and legislative and administrative history of the proviso governing it.

(A) Construction Industry Background.

The primary characteristics which differentiate the construction industry from most others are well stated in the Senate Report on the 1959 amendments:

> The occasional nature of the employment relationship makes this industry markedly different from manufacturing and other types of enterprise. An individual employee typically works for many employers and for none of them continuously. Jobs are frequently of short duration, depending upon various stages of construction.

S.Rep.No. 187, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 27 (1959), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin. News 1959, pp. 2318, 2344; I Legislative History of The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 423 (hereinafter Leg. His.). These peculiarities of the construction industry created special problems for both unions and employers long before 1959. Unions had to overcome difficulties of organizing temporary workers and of maintaining wage and benefit standards in unstable employment conditions. Employers required a ready source of skilled workers available for each new job, and had to be able to forecast labor costs accurately. To satisfy these needs, unions and employers hammered out a number of mutual accommodations. One such arrangement was the closed shop, which was prevalent in the industry by the 1920's.[8] A second was negotiation of area-wide agreements covering all construction work of a certain type, with multiple contracting employers agreeing to the standards set in those agreements.[9] Of necessity, these contracts dealt with wages, hours and working conditions of employees yet to be hired for particular jobs by particular employers.[10] A third device was the agreement to restrict subcontracting in various ways—to firms maintaining union standards, or to firms that were unionized,[11] or to firms that agreed to bind themselves to contracts with the union signatory to the subcontracting clause.[12]

Some of these devices were not necessarily consistent with the organizational scheme of the National Labor Relations Act in its original form. The Act initially caused no disruption in the pattern of collective bargaining in the construction industry, however, because the National Labor Relations Board declined to exercise jurisdiction over the industry.[13] The Taft-Hartley Amendments to the Act, passed in 1947, led to a reversal of the Board's position. Those amendments prohibited striking or picketing to coerce an employer to refraim from dealing in the products of any other emloyer or to cease to do business with any other person. § 8(b)(4)(A).[14] Subsequent to the amendments, the Board's General Counsel determined that the construction industry would be regulated by the Board.[15]

One effect of applying the amended Act to the construction industry was the invalidation of collective bargaining agreements entered before any employees were hired on the job. Guy F. Atkinson Co. and J.A. Jones Construction Co., 90 N.L.R.B. 143 (1950), enforcement denied on other grounds, 195 F.2d 141 (9th Cir. 1952). The amended Act was also applied to prohibit a construction union from picketing a jobsite in order to force the general contractor with whom it had a collective bargaining agreement to cease doing business with a particular subcontractor on the job whose employees were non-union. NLRB v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675, 71 S.Ct. 943, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951). The picketing was found to violate § 8(b)(4)(A)'s prohibition of coercive secondary boycotts.

These applications of the amended National Labor Relations Act to the construction industry were sufficiently disruptive of existing practices that there was agitation for modification of the Act, particularly in regard to prehire practices and secondary activity. In 1954, President Eisenhower called for amendments to permit prehire agreements and to shorten to 7 days the time by which a nonunion worker could be required to join a union under a union-shop agreement. 100 Cong.Rec. 111, [1954] U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 1531, 1532. Again in 1959, when calling for amendments to tighten the prohibition against secondary boycotts, the President added that provisions were needed "to make clear that secondary activity is permitted * * * under certain circumstances, against secondary employers engaged in work at a common construction site with the primary employer." S.Doc. 10, 86th Cong., 1st Sess.; 105 Cong.Rec. 1297; I Leg.Hist. 82.

Accommodation to the special conditions of the construction industry was consequently an important consideration that found expression in the 1959 amendments to the Act. Those amendments, however, also embodied another major goal of Congress at the time—that of limiting "hot cargo" agreements.

In June 1958, the supreme Court had decided Local 1976, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. NLRB, (Sand Door), 357 U.S. 93, 78 S.Ct. 1011, 2 L.ED.2d 1186, Sand Door stated that a union did not violate § 8(b)(4)(A) by securing the voluntary participation of an employer in a boycott of another employer's product. Although the Court said it found no occasion to determine the legality of "hot cargo" clauses (by which an employer agreed to boycott nonunion firms) as such, id. at 107, 78 S.Ct. at 1020, Sand Door was widely interpreted as permitting them. The decision was seen as creating a loophole in the Act, and it contributed heavily to the move toward amending the secondary boycott provision of the Act.

The 1959 revisions of the Act accomplished th congressional purposes in various ways. The clearest accommodation to the peculiar conditions o the construction industry was found in § 8(f),[16] which authorized unions and employers in that industry to enter prehire agreements fixing terms and conditions of employment of workers yet to be hired. This provision amounts to an exception to §§ 8(a)(1), (2) and 8(b)(1)(A), which make it an unfair labor practice for both the employer and the union to enter a collective bargaining agreement before the union, represents a majority of employees in the unit. International Ladies Garment Workers Union v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731, 81 S.Ct. 1603, 6 L.Ed.2d 762 (1961); see NLRB v. International Association of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, 434 U.S. 335, 344–45, 98 S.Ct. 651, 657–58, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978). Section 8(f) also shortened to 7 days the period for nonunion workers to join the union under a union-shop agreement.

Conflicting policies were reflected clearly in the passage of § 8(e), which was intended to narrow or close the loophole for "hot cargo" agreements created by the Sand Door decision. The Senate bill prohibited such agreements only in the trucking industry,[17] while the House bill outlawed them everywhere.[18] The Conference Committee adopted the House version, but added the provisos creating exceptions for the garment and construction industries.[19] The garment industry exception was unlimited as to time and place,[20] while the construction industry proviso excepted agreements "relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction, alteration, painting or repair of a building, structure or other work * * *."

It is the nature and meaning of the construction industry proviso's restriction to the jobsite that gives rise to the present controversy. The contractors assert that the proviso is intended to authorize subcontracting clauses in collective bargaining agreements only when union workers are present at the jobsite, so that the presence of nonunion workers there might lead to friction. The unions claim that the intent was to authorize subcontracting clauses whether or not union workers were at the jobsite, so long as the clauses refer to work to be performed at the construction site. Although the matter is not free from doubt, we believe that the legislative history favors the latter view.

(C) Legislative Discussion of the Construction Industry Proviso.

The legislative history regarding the construction industry proviso is much less exhaustive than that surrounding the garment industry proviso,[21] but there are nevertheless indications of congressional intent in the records. Senator Kennedy, the chairman of the Conference Committee, said of the two provisos, that "[b]oth changes were necessary to avoid serious damage to the pattern of collective bargaining in these industries." 105 Cong.Rec. 17899; II Leg.Hist. 1432. Unlike the garment industry, the construction industry was not exempted from the provisions of § 8(b)(4) that prohibited striking or picketing to coerce a secondary boycott; it was merely exempted from § 8(e)'s prohibition of agreements between a union and an employ-

[20] The garment industry proviso to § 8(e), 29 U.S.C. § 158(e), states: Provided further, That for the purpose of this subsection and subsection (b)(4)(B) of this section the terms "any employer", "any person engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce", and "any person" when used in relation to the terms "any other producer, processor, or manufacturer", "any other employer", or "any other person" shall not include persons in the relation of a jobber, manufacturer, contractor, or subcontractor working on the goods or premises of the jobber or manufacturer or performing parts of an integrated process of production in the apparel and clothing industry * * *.

[21] There is a substantial explanation in the legislative history of the highly integrated subcontracting arrangements in the garment industry and the problem of "sweatshop" conditions. See, e. g., 105 Cong.Rec. 17381, II Leg.Hist. 1385 (Senators Javits and Goldwater); 105 Cong.Rec. 15538, II Leg.Hist. 1576 (Memorandum of Reps. er by which the employer would boycott others. The Conference Committee stated its intent in regard to the proviso as follows:

> The committee of conference does not intend that this proviso should be construed so as to change the present state of the law with respect to the validity of this specific type of agreement relating to work to be done at the site of the construction project or to remove the limitations which the present law imposes with respect to such agreements * * *. To the extent that such agreements are legal today under section 8(b)(4) * * *, the proviso would prevent such legality from being affected by section 8(e).

H.R.Rep.No. 1147, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 39, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin. News 1959, p. 2511; I Leg.Hist. 943. Senator Kennedy analyzed the proposed § 8(e) as follows:

> The first proviso under new § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act is intended to preserve the present state of the law with respect to picketing at the site of a construction project and with respect to the validity of agreements relating to the contracting of work to be done at the site of a construction project.

> Agreements by which a contractor in the construction industry promises not to subcontract work on a construction site to a nonunion contractor appear to be legal today. They will not be unlawful under § 8(e) * * *.
> It should be particularly noted that the proviso relates only to the "contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction." The proviso does not cover boycotts of goods manufactured in an industrial plant for installation at the jobsite, or suppliers who do not work at the jobsite.

105 Cong.Rec. 17900; II Leg.Hist. at 1433 (emphasis supplied).

As Senator Kennedy made clear, unions continued to be forbidden to picket or strike at a construction site for secondary 1313 objectives, which meant that the holding of Denver Building Trades, supra, was left in effect. On the other hand, the Conference Report and Senator Kennedy made it equally clear that unions and employers could enter subcontracting agreements as permitted by law prior to the enactment of the new § 8(e).

It seems more likely than not that the "present law" referred to by the Conference Committee did not restrict the agreements that Senator Kennedy said "appear to be legal" to jobsites where union workers were present. The Sand Door decision, supra, which supplied much of the inpetus for § 8(e), had legitimized secondary boycotts the objectives of which clearly went beyond the mere avoidance of shoulder-to-shoulder friction between workers. It is true that the construction industry proviso narrowed the geographical scope of the Sand Door rule by introducing the jobsite limitation, but we do not interpret the words of the proviso as indicating an intent to narrow the substantive scope of the Sand Door rule on the jobsite.

It should be noted that shortly before enactment of the proviso, the District of Columbia Circuit had upheld a subcontractor agreement the terms of which were as broad as those presently in issue. Operating Engineers Local Union No. 3 v. NLRB, 266 F.2d 905 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. St Maurice v. NLRB, 361 U.S. 834, 80 S.Ct. 86, 4 L.Ed.2d 76 (1959).[22] While that case dealt with an interunion dispute, the terms of the secondary agreement were not restricted to that or any other situation of jobsite conflict. In upholding the agreement, the Court referred to the Board's reasoning "that the preclusion of future work to a prospective subcontractor in the circumstances did not justify the Board in holding that the rights of unidentified employees of such prospective employer were adversely affected." 266 F.2d at 908.

[22] The Engineers decision was submitted to the House committee investigating labor practices as part of the testimony of Paul H. Robbins, Executive Director of the National Society of Professional Engineers. 2 Hearings Before a Joint Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. on H.R. 3540, H.R. 3302, H.R. 4473 and H.R. 4474 and Related Bills Regarding Labor-Management Reform Legislation, 803-07 (1959) (hereafter House Hearings).

In addition, Edward M. Carlton, office manager of St. Maurice, Helkamp and Musser, the subcontractor involved in Engineers, appeared before the Committee and testified as to the scope of the subcontracting clause:

> The contract also contains a clause which is referred to in the industry as the subcontractor clauses. In effect, that clauses (sic) says that any time an AGC contractor subcontracts work the subcontractor must agree to apply the terms and conditions of the AGC Operating Engineers' agreement to his employees. This, of course, means that the subcontractor's employees must become members of Operating Engineers local 3.
> Since about 1955, the AGC and the Operating Engineers have enlarged the subcontractor clauses so that an AGC contractor will not subcontract any work unless the subcontractor agrees in advance to be bound by the AGC Operating Engineers' agreement.

5 House Hearings 2366 (Emphasis supplied).

Although the Engineers decision was not directly referred to in the Senate Hearings, the problem of union signatory clauses was brought to the committee's attention. Senate Hearings 752 (Testimony of Sen. Curtis).

Moreover, a survey of major labor contracts in existence in 1959 revealed that more than 50 of them contained clauses restricting subcontracting to firms complying with the terms of the prime employer's agreement. Lunden, Subcontracting Clauses in Major Contracts, 84 Monthly Labor Review 579 (Part I), 715 (Part II) at 715 (1961). While the survey does not adequately differentiate between union signatory clauses and union standards clauses, it is nevertheless clear that numbers of broad subcontractor agreements were in existence.[23] The survey canvasses various limitations appearing in subcontracting clauses in the construction industry, but makes no mentions of any restrictions to the jobsite or references to the problem of friction between union and nonunion workers there. Id. at 715–16. That there may not have been a consistent pattern of subcontractor agreements of the type in issue here is not crucial. What does emerge from the contemporaneous scene is that some such agreements existed and were legal and that Congress did not appear to intend a change in that condition.

V.

(A) The Connell Decision.

It was against this industrial and legislative background that the Supreme Court decided Connell Construction Co. v. Plumbers & Steamfitters Local Union No 100, 421 U.S. 616, 95 S.Ct. 1830, 44 L.Ed.2d 418 (1975). Connell was an antitrust suit brought by a general contractor against a union that was picketing in order to coerce the contractor to enter an agreement to deal only with subcontractors having a a collective bargaining agreement with the union. The union expressly disclaimed any interest in representing the general contractor's employees. The picketing was successful and the contractor sought to annul the ensuing agreement on the grounds that it violated the antitrust laws.[24] One of the defenses raised by the union was that the agreement could not be a violation of the antitrust laws because it was authorized by the proviso to § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Supreme Court rejected that defense and held that broad subcontracting agreements applicable to every jobsite where the general contractor might hire subcontractors were invalid when entered outside of the context of a collective bargaining relationship between the union and the general contractor.

The employers who attach the subcontracting clauses in the present case argue that Connell's language necessarily requires a conclusion that subcontracting clauses are permissible only when they serve the purpose of avoiding jobsite friction between union and nonunion workers employed at the same jobsite. So interpreted, Connell would invalidate the agreements in issue here at least until the presence of union workers at a particular jobsite triggered their application. We concede at the outset that the Connell opinion contains considerable emphasis on problems of shoulder-to-shoulder friction between union and nonunion workers at the jobsite, and additional emphasis on antagonism of the 1959 Congress to "top-down" organizing that is one of the effects of subcontractor agreements. Nevertheless, we believe that this reading of the Connell decision misconstrues the Supreme Court's view of § 8(e) and gives too narrow a scope to the construction industry proviso. We think that the prevail-

[23] Office of the General Counsel, Memorandum 76–57, December 15, 1976, reprinted in Labor Relations Yearbook 1976, p. 295. Because Lunden failed adequately to distinguish between union signatory and union standards caluses, the General Counsel found that study "inconclusive." Id. at 308. The General Counsel's own study concluded that there was no "pattern" of collective bargaining in the industry, but that the existing clauses constituted only a "mosaic." Union signatory clauses, not restricted to a particular jobsite, were part of that mosaic. Id. at 309.

[24] Connell was another chapter in the dispute in Dallas between building contractors and trade unions. In Dallas Building & Construction Trades Council v. NLRB, 396 F.2d 677 (D.C Cir.1968), a clause similar to the one in Connel was at issue. Unlike Connell, however, the general contractor that was picketed had nonunion employees. Although the Trades Council expressly disavowed any interest in organizing the general contractor's workers, both the Board and the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals concluded otherwise. The court held that because there was an organizational objective the picketing was limited to thirty days by § 8(b)(7), a period which the unions had exceeded.

The court's opinion left open the possibility of picketing more than thirty days if the unions could conclusively show no organizational objective. In order to avoid the § 8(b)(7) problem, the union picketed contractors who had no employees of their own. The contractors sought to challenge this practice before the Board, but the General Counsel refused to issue a complaint. See Connell, 483 F.2d 1154, 1158 (5th Cir. 1973), and 421 U.S. at 631–32 n. 10, 95 S.Ct. at 1839 n. 10.

When Local 100 began picketing Connell, the contractor did not file a complaint with the Board, but immediately sued the union for violating both federal and state antitrust laws.

ing thrust of Connell is to the contrary and favors a broader view of the exemption. Our conclusion is supported in particular by the Connell opinion's emphasis on the absence of a collective bargaining relationship, its references to legislative history, and its characterization of the interests served by the proviso.[25] Our view is reinforced by the adverse practical consequences that would follow from the narrower reading of the proviso. Each of these factors bears elaboration.

The first and most obvious distinction of Connell from the present cases is that the agreements in Connell arose outside of the context of a collective bargaining relationship. This fact was of course crucial for antitrust purposes, because the national policy of encouraging collective bargaining has served as the basis for a judicially created labor exemption from the antitrust laws.[26] The absence of such an interest was pointedly referred to in Connell:

> In this case, Local 100 had an interest in representing Connell's employees. The federal policy favoring collective bargaining therefore, can offer no shelter for the union's coercive action against Connell or its campaign to exclude nonunion firms from the subcontracting market.

421 U.S. at 626, 95 S.Ct. at 1837.[27] The focus of the Connell decision was therefore understandably upon the situation created by subcontracting clauses in the absence of a collective bargaining agreement with the prime contracting employer.

That focus on the part of the Court was not merely the product of the antitrust setting of Connell, however. The parties themselves had framed the issued toward the same end. The union contended that all subcontractor agreements were validated by the plain words of § 8(e). The employer responded by urging that "despite the unqualified language of the proviso, Congress intended only to allow subcontracting agreements within the context of a collective-bargaining relationship * * *," but not those involving a "stranger" contractor. Id. at 627, 95 S.Ct. at 1837.[28] The subject of controversy, then, was the validity of subcontractor agreements outside of the collective bargaining context, and the Connell opinion must to a large degree be read in that light. The Court's conclusion, reached after a discussion of the legislative history and policies behind § 8(e), was clearly limited to the situation before it:

> We therefore hold this agreement, which is outside the context of a collective bargaining relationship and not restricted to a particular jobsite, . . . may be the basis of a federal anti-trust suit. . . .

[25] But for the Connell decision, we would have no difficulty in enforcing the Board's order. Prior to Connell, this court, other circuits and the Board had upheld broad subcontracting clauses in collective bargaining agreements. See, e.g., Construction, Production & Maintenance Laborers Union, Local 383 v. NLRB, 323 F.2d 422 (9th Cir. 1963); Suburban Title Center Inc., v. Rockford Building & Construction Trades Council, 354 F.2d 1, 2–3 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 960, 86 S.Ct. 1585, 16 L.Ed.2d 673 (1966); United Association of Journeymen & Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry Local 48, 190 N.L.R.B. 415, 416–17 (1971).

[26] See Connell, 421 U.S. at 622–23, 95 S.Ct. at 1835; St. Antoine, Connell: Antitrust Law at the Expense of Labor Law, 62 Va.L.Rev. 603 (1976). Labor unions also have a statutory exemption from the antitrust laws by virtue of sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 17, 29 U.S.C. § 52, and sections 4, 5 and 13 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 104, 105, 113. These statutes declare that labor unions are not combinations in restraint of trade and exempt specific union activities including secondary boycotts from the antitrust laws and from certain kinds of injunctive relief. These statutes do not, however, exempt concerted activity or agreements between unions and non-labor parties. Connell, supra, 622–23, 95 S.Ct. at 1835. See generally, R. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law, 621–31 (1976).

[27] The fact that Connell was an antitrust case outside of the context of collective bargaining led to a natural emphasis by the Court on the pursuit of market efficiency through competition. This emphasis reappears in the dissent here, infra 654 F.2d 1325–1326, but we find it far less compelling in this labor case in which no antitrust issues have been raised. The thrust of the labor laws, or course, is frequently contrary to that of the antitrust laws. See St. Antoine, supra, n. 26.

[28] The briefs in Connell concentrated entirely on the distinction between the presence and absence of a collective bargaining relationship in determining the validity of subcontracting clauses. The policy of preventing jobsite, friction was raised tangentially in the appendix to Local 100's brief which included a memorandum by the NLRB General Counsel explaining why he would not issue a complaint in a case factually similar to Connell. Significantly, that memorandum, dealing with Hagler Construction Co., was distinguished in the Connell opinion as being "* * * addressed to a different argument that a subcontracting clause should be allowed only if there is a pre-existing collective bargaining relationship with the general contractor or if the general contractor has employees who perform the kind of work covered by the agreement." 421 U.S. at 632 n. 10, 95 S.Ct. at 1839 n. 10. (Emphasis in original).

Id. at 635, 95 S.Ct. at 1841. The holding of Connell, then, does not in the strict sense control the cases before us.

The Connell opinion did, however, discuss at length the reach of § 8(e) and its contruction industry proviso, upon which the present cases turn. It therefore becomes necessary to interpret the language of Connell and apply it to the situation of the cases at bar where a collective bargaining relationship existed between the unions and the contractors with whom the agreements were sought.[29] A major question is whether the presence or absence of a collective bargaining relationship, obviously significant in the antitrust context of Connell, remains pivotal when the issue is purely one of labor law.

We believe that there is a complex of factors affecting labor relations in the construction industry that renders the collective bargaining relationship crucial in the present cases and we find the underlying policies reflected in parts of the Connell opinion itself. We also believe that these factors exist at the construction jobsite but are by no means limited to the problem of shoulder-to-shoulder friction between union and nonunion workers there. These two themes—the nature of the collective bargaining relationship in the construction industry and the manner in which these characteristics are exhibited at the jobsite—are interwoven in Connell as they are in the present controversy. We will attempt, however, to discuss them separately even though each will necessarily intrude upon the other.

The legislative history already discussed should make it clear that the outstanding peculiarity of the construction industry is that the work force of any given employer—contractor or subcontactor—is highly flexible and grows or diminishes or even disappears depending on the temporary contracting or subcontracting arrangements at any particular jobsite. As Congress recognized in passing § 8(f), collective bargaining cannot even await the presence of workers on the job. Moreover, when there are workers already employed by a general contractor, the interests of those employees are not permanently or inevitably bound to that single employer. The employer has an option on any given project to use some of his own workers, to subcontract to an employer who will use those same workers, or to subcontract to one who will use others represented by the same union, a different union, or no union. Under those conditions the employees and their unions are faced with severe problems not only of maintaining wage levels, but of protecting benefits such as retirement pensions and paid vacations that depend upon continuity of employer contributions.

When a union representing a contractor's employees seeks to restrict subcontracting to firms having a collective bargaining agreement with the union, the union in fact pursues a number of objectives some of which might fairly be characterized as primary and others as secondary. The welfare of the employees in the primary bargaining unit is clearly likely to be affected by an employer's choice to hire a subcontractor who may himself employ those same employees. On the other hand the union clearly has secondary goals that may include organizing the employees of a subcontractor who have no connection with the primary bargaining unit.

It is quite true that when a union seeks to serve the interests of employees in its bargaining unit not as employees of their existing employer, but as potential employees of some other employer, the arrangement is legally viewed as secondary. National Woodwork, supra, at 644–45, 87 S.Ct. at 1268; National Maritime Union, supra. We do not quarrel with this well-established rule, nor with the rule that when primary and secondary objectives are combined, an agreement is regarded as secondary for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act. NLRB v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675, 689, 71 S.Ct. 943, 952, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951).

We do, however, find sufficient support in the legislative history of the 1959 Amendments to suggest that Congress was sensitive to both the primary and secondary considerations involved in subcontractor arrangements and wished not to interfere with these mixed union objectives when they could be achieved by agreement with the prime employer. Even though a construction union's interest in subcontracting at the jobsite is secondary so as to bring it within § 8(e), it is far more direct and involves the union's members in the primary bargaining unit far more than is the case when unions outside of the construction industry pursue secondary objectives.

[29] In Woelke, the union had entered a three-year collective bargaining agreement with the employer and the dispute arose during negotiations to renew the contract. In Pacific Northwest, the union had long had a continuous collective bargaining agreement with the Association of General Contractors. We therefore need not reach and express no opinion on the question whether a "prehire" agreement entered or sought pursuant to § 8(f) of the Act is a sufficient "collective bargaining relationship" to render permissible the entry of subcontracting agreements. We note that prehire agreements were held sufficient to legitimize subcontracting agreements in Donald Schriver Inc. v. NLRB, 635 F.2d 859 (D.C.Cir. 1980).

The importance of this fact is that it renders the existence of a collective bargaining relationship highly significant. When a union represents employees of a prime contractor and seeks a subcontracting agreement, it has the interests of the employees in its primary bargaining unit at stake to at least some degree. In the Connell situation, the union is utterly without any objective that could be characterized as primary or direct. Because the union in Connell disclaimed any interest in representing the employees of Connell, all of its goals were necessarily secondary and could not be connected to any primary representational interest.

The significance of the restriction of the § 8(e) proviso to work performed at a jobsite may now become more clear. It is at the jobsite that all of the special characteristics of the construction industry are manifested. It is true that one of these characteristics is that union workers are traditionally hostile to the presence of nonunion workers on the same job at the same time. But that is clearly not the only or even the major characteristic exhibited. It is at the jobsite where the general contractor can exercise the flexibility to use its own workers or those of a subcontractor, where the flexibility of subcontracting arrangements may lead to multiple employers hiring a few workers for short periods of time,[30] and where working conditions applicable to one set of workers may very well affect others working on the same project.[31]

We believe that the Connell opinion is sensitive both to the interconnection of interests between employees of the various contractors and subcontractors and to the broad manner in which any or all of these factors may be exhibited at the jobsite. In dealing with the legislative history of the construction industry proviso, the opinion in Connell points out that the proviso was "explained only by bare reference to 'the pattern of collective bargaining' in the industry." 421 U.S. at 628–29, 95 S.Ct. at 1838. The legislative history discussed above indicates, we believe that the pattern of collective bargaining included broad subcontracting agreements. To the extent that the just-quoted comment in Connell dismisses the history regarding the pattern of collective bargaining, it may well be explained by the fact that Connell was dealing with a case not considered by Congress, in which there was no collective bargaining relationship.[32]

In any event, the subsequent language of the Connell opinion appears quite clearly to encompass the multiple considerations affecting the construction industry at the jobsite. The opinion suggests that the construction industry proviso may have been adopted "as a partial substitute for an attempt to overrule" Denver Building Trades, 421 U.S. at [30] The 1977 Census of Construction Industries found that there were more than 288,000 "specialty trade contractors" (a category which includes fifteen different subcontracting functions). On the the average, each firm employed six construction workers. One commentator has aptly summarized the peculiar problems confronted by labor unions attempting to organize construction workers as well as the techniques which they have employed:
